I would just like to comment, backing up items that have been stated already, that people are well aware that our oilseed sector exports to the European Community now amount to something in the neighborhood of $4.2 billion; that our nongrain feed ingredient exports total something in the range of $700 million.

We are very pleased to have developed these markets in the European Community. We are concerned, of course, deeply concerned, about the proposals that have been put forth by the Commission to place a tax on fats and oils and to place some as yet undefined restriction on nongrain feed ingredients.

I do want to point out that, at least as far as we can see these EC proposals at this point—and they are certainly not laid out in any detail—we do not see any immediate large impact on the dollar level of our trade. What we are really concerned about is the sort of camel's-nose-under-the-tent kind of approach.

In order to explain a little bit why we are worried about that, I would like to go back to the beginnings of the Common Agricultural Policy in 1962. The basic type of customs union with an external import levy that was put in place in 1962 at that time did not really have any large, immediate impact on our trade with the Community.

However, it was the camel's-nose-under-the-tent as far as their overall trade policy and exports to third-country markets is concerned. Since that time, the Common Agricultural Policy, which was developed, really, to try to achieve self-sufficiency in a number of items, crossed that line into surplus production and dealt with those surpluses through the use of export subsidies in commodity after commodity.

At this point, the European Community is the No. 1 exporter in the world of poultry, of eggs, of butter, of all dairy products. They are the No. 2 exporter of beef in the world. They last year were No. 3 in wheat. We have seen new items subsidized recently, somewhat lesser things such as apples, "lesser" unless you happen to be involved in selling apples from the United States.

So we are very concerned, not necessarily with the immediate dollar impact of these proposals but with what they might mean in terms of impairing GATT bindings on our soybean complex and on our nongrain feed ingredients, and what that might mean for the future. So we want to be very clear that we are very concerned about those future effects. We have estimated that the CAP today is costing U.S. agriculture up to $6 billion per year in displaced trade and that cost could reach $8 billion by 1990.

I cannot emphasize too strongly that the United States absolutely rejects the idea that we should share a further burden of farm program adjustments in the Community. To proceed with any action based on that premise would be a grave error by the Community.

We have made two formal representations to the Commission and to member State officials. Secretary Block has written a letter expressing his strong concern to high-level agricultural officials throughout the European Community. The administration has agreed on a unified position on this issue, and ranking officials from the Departments of State, Treasury, Commerce, and, of course, Agriculture will raise U.S. concerns at all appropriate bilateral meetings with Community officials.

In addition, an interagency group has been directed to begin an examination of alternative U.S. responses should the European Community proceed to adopt the proposals. Let me assure you that there is no disagreement that our response must be strong, concrete, and immediate.

In closing, Mr. Chairman,[64] let me express my appreciation to the subcommittee for holding these hearings and giving our Department a chance to express publicly the mounting concern we feel about the momentum that has apparently developed in the Community to implement trade measures that are of grave concern to us. We feel that the question here is quite different from the problem of impact from other CAP measures and export subsidies. This is one of blatant protectionism, and the items covered are really about the only things left that are allowed relatively free entry into the Community. We feel that to cut those off is protectionism of the most blatant type.

Address by President Reagan, October 22, 1983[65]

"The Obstacle to That [Arms] Agreement We Want So Dearly Is Not Washington, and It Never Has Been; It's Moscow"

My fellow Americans, I would like to talk to you today about the deep desire we share to reduce nuclear weapons, and to make our world more safe. Just as important, I want you to know why, despite all our good faith efforts, we are being frustrated in our goal to negotiate an arms reduction agreement. No issue concerns me more and has taken up more of my time, not just in meetings with advisors, but in deliberations with members of the Congress and close, constant consultations with our allies, than this quest for a breakthrough on arms reductions.

And, believe me, I do so willingly, because as your President, and also as a husband, father, and grandfather, I know what's at stake for everyone. The trouble is, the obstacle to that agreement we want so dearly is not Washington, and it never has been; it's Moscow. And that's been the case in all our current arms reduction negotiations with the Soviet Union.

But today I'd like to focus on the longer-range INF missile negotiations now under way in Geneva. Some have asked, "If we do want an agreement, why are we, the United States, planning to base new missiles in Europe?" Well, the question reflects some basic misunderstandings. It's been the Soviet Union who has been deploying such forces for a number of years, while the West watched and worried.

In 1977, the Soviets had in place 600 warheads on their longer-range INF missiles. More significantly, they began adding the SS-20, a new, highly accurate mobile missile with three warheads, which could reach in minutes every city in Europe and many cities in the Middle East, Africa and Asia. NATO had no comparable weapons.

In October 1979 Soviet leader Brezhnev announced a balance now exists. The Soviet Union, 800 warheads; NATO, zero. Some balance. It was only at this point at the end of 1979 that the NATO Alliance, not the United States alone, decided the Soviets' large and growing advantage in both nuclear and conventional forces would threaten our safety. So the Alliance made what was called "the dual-track decision". We would redress the imbalance by deploying comparable weapons, while seeking an agreement at the negotiating table, that would eliminate the need for deployment.

Nothing more dramatically illustrates our sincere desire for peace than our willingness not to deploy, if the Soviets would stop threatening Europe with their missiles. How did the Soviets respond? By adding one new missile every week. They now have 1,300 warheads or more, and that number is growing. NATO still has zero. All along we've been negotiating in good faith. We asked the Soviets to consider the total elimination of these missiles. It took them less than 24 hours to answer, "Nyet". So we proposed an interim solution—some equal but lower number, and the lower the better. With knee-jerk speed the same answer came back again, "Nyet". And it has remained the same for all our new proposals, because the Soviets insist on a monopoly of longer-range INF missiles. They offer what can only be called "a half-zero option," zero for us, hundreds of warheads for them. As I told the members of the United Nations, that's where things stand today. We will continue our efforts to make the Soviets heed the will of the world, stop stonewalling, and start negotiating in good faith.

But that wish should not become father to the thought. We must look at Soviet words and deeds with a clear head and ask some long overdue questions. Why does a regime which says it seeks peace repeatedly reject equitable proposals that would preserve peace? What are we to think of Soviet threats against NATO countries: warning Turkey it could become "a nuclear cemetery;" telling Scandinavian countries they are "a bridgehead for aggression;" and advising West Germany if new missiles are deployed, the military threat to it will grow manifold?

These are not words of a peacemaker, but of a nation bent on intimidation. It is inconceivable that any Western leader would make such crude and provocative threats.

Finally, what is the credibility of a regime which exploits peace demonstrations in the West, but brutally puts down any demonstration for reduced weaponry in its own country. As President Mitterrand of France recently observed, "Pacifism is in the West; and Euro-missiles are in the East: I consider that an unequal relationship."

My fellow Americans, the values of Western civilization and the beliefs that bind free people together are being tested. The Soviets are engaged in a campaign to intimidate the West. But it will not work. At home, bipartisan support in the Congress remains strong. And the unity of our NATO Alliance will not break. Just this week, Prime Minister Craxi of Italy visited the White House and assured me of Italy's continued, staunch support. Earlier this year, at the Williamsburg summit, the leaders of the industrialized nations agreed the policy is correct, fair, and should go forward. The spirit of Williamsburg is as strong as ever.

There is simply no sensible alternative to the parallel goal of deterrence and arms reduction. We will remain at the negotiating table just as long as it takes to reach a breakthrough. But the Soviets must understand: NATO's mission is to defend Europe and preserve peace, which it has done for 34 years. And NATO will continue to meet its responsibilities.

Our countries will remain united, strong and we will protect the safety of our people.

Until next week, thanks for listening and God bless you.

Statement by the U.S. Trade Representative (Brock) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, October 26, 1983 (Extract) [66]

Trade Difficulties With the European Community

Let me just pick up on the basic theme on which George [67] has elaborated. The trading circumstance with Europe in terms of our bilateral trade has shifted markedly from the very high surplus that we had with Europe in 1980 of $15.8 billion down to a surplus that may reach $2.5 billion this year, or even lower.

In all honesty, that is primarily due to the continuing weakness caused by Europe's major economic problems and the surge in the value of the dollar. I do not see much change in either situation in the next year or so. I very much hope that Europe's recovery will exceed the current estimates, but it does have a very heavy burden to face.

Under those circumstances and under the difficulties with which they have to live, I do not think it is surprising that we have a considerable increase in the level of tension. Good healthy partners are going to have tension under the best of circumstances. But when they are under the pressures that the Europeans are under and we have been under the same kind of pressures with our recession, it is going to cause increasing levels of difficulty.

The CAP is the most troublesome area, not the CAP itself but the area of agriculture and the impact of the external supports that the CAP has provided. The effect on us and on third countries in agricultural exports has been extremely negative, particularly in the face of declining world demand in the recession.

Let me state what I think is the obvious: There are two very fundamentally different points of view on each side of the Atlantic on this issue, and there is a terrible lack of understanding on each side of the other side's point of view. We must recognize this if we are going to have a conversation about the agricultural situation that we face.

We believe that the United States has shown a great deal of forebearance in not criticizing the Common Agricultural Policy in terms of its domestic application within the Community, even though in so doing we have foregone the largest and most productive market opportunity in the world for many American products.

The European Community, on the other hand, believes that forebearance in terms of their internal circumstance is not nearly enough. They argue that their need to support the CAP in whatever form necessary for their internal political balance gives them the right to massively subsidize their exports, virtually without any ethical or legal constraints. That attitude obviously has made life very difficult for us and, frankly, for a great many Third World countries.

Now we face a situation where the Community is running out of money, so proposals have been made recently to threaten what is left of the access we now enjoy to the European Community markets of agricultural products, access which we secured in past negotiations and access which would be limited through import restrictions on animal feeds, corn gluten, and citrus pellets.

[67] For the testimony of George Vest, Ambassador, U.S. Mission to the European Communities, before this subcommittee October 26, 1983, see ibid., pp. 88–92.

In addition, they have suggested a consumption tax on animal and vegetable fats and oils. The combination of those two would affect about $5 billion worth of U.S. trade, which we achieved in the Tokyo round and for which we believe we paid.

We also have the very difficult problem still to be resolved in the area of specialty steel. You are aware of the action the United States took. We have settled with all other countries except Europe. The Community has said that it is not interested in negotiating an agreement with us concerning this specialty steel area and will seek compensation. There have been suggestions of retaliatory action.

I think those are the two principal areas of concern. But maybe underpinning all of that are fundamentally different views on the role of government in aiding export-oriented public corporations. It has been a source of concern, and the subsidy problem in all of these areas is going to be a source of conflict for some time to come unless we can find some way to define the issue and to rationalize our approach to it.

Let me mention a couple of things that we are trying to do to deal with these issues. In agriculture we have four parallel exercises going at the same time. First, we have brought a number of cases in the GATT against European Community trade practices.

Second, we have begun a review in the GATT on the effectiveness of existing disciplines on export subsidies. Obviously, we centered this in the GATT Committee on Trade and Agriculture.

Third, for several months we have been talking bilaterally—since the meeting we had, George, in December with the European Community Commission, about agricultural export subsidies. I have no great breakthroughs to report, but we are in agreement, at least, that there is room for more effective GATT rules.

Finally, in the GATT Subsidies Code Committee we are urging the strengthening of the rules on subsidies.

What all that says is not much has changed, and we are trying very hard to manage an extremely difficult and contentious and, I think, dangerous problem. We have managed it, but we certainly have not solved it.

We have in previous months this year found it necessary to defend our interests with more aggressive sales in third country markets. If we remain stalemated, it is obvious that we are going to have to take some further action to assure that our products remain competitive in the face of the subsidies from the European Community.

On the proposed reform of the CAP, we really are making every effort to let them know just how strongly we feel about these proposed restrictions, or any restrictions, for that matter. In recent weeks, my office, as well as the Departments of State and Agriculture and our embassies overseas, have made our views known to the Community and to the member states and to other GATT members.

It is fair to state that if the Community is unable to understand the importance we attach to this issue, it is due less to inadequate communication than to the impossible choice the European Community countries face domestically in coming to grips with their own problems.

In the steel area, we are holding consultations with the European Community in the GATT and I hope that we have sufficient good will to ultimately come to an understanding and a resolution of this particular problem. We are going to try very hard to do that.

I should mention some areas of progress. We have made real progress in the export credit area with the OECD credit arrangement. That is substantial and important. In trade in civil aircraft, we are seeking to eliminate subsidization of the officially supported credits for these items as well.

We have made some progress in expanding the purchasing commitments on both sides into the spare parts area. Improvement of the conditions of high technology trade is of fundamental importance. We remain blocked by the European Community in the GATT on that subject. We are moving in the OECD.

Finally, it is important in looking at this, the most important relationship in the world, to understand just how tough it has been for political leaders in Europe, not only with the recession that they have had to live with, but with the prospect of continuing and perhaps even increasing unemployment, and an economic circumstance which is excessively rigid and which has had so much government intervention that it has inhibited the ability to adapt to present world competitive requirements.

The European Community is under enormous pressure, all of the member governments, all of the political leaders, from those who argue for more intervention and particularly from those who suggest protectionist responses.

Maybe the most important thing we can do is to recover as rapidly as we humanly can and to maintain our stance against limiting their market access here, and perhaps we can help them recover fast enough to overcome the temptation to take more negative actions.

We have so much at stake, the United States and the EC, in maintaining a healthy and liberalizing world trading system. We both know that. But the next several months are going to be very difficult and they are going to put us to a test in terms of our ability to go beyond the commitments our leaders made at the Williamsburg Summit and to translate those commitments into some real substance and to take specific liberalizing steps.

With all of this, I think there is an understanding on both sides of the Atlantic, Mr. Chairman, that we simply have to have each other and we have to have each other healthy. We have to work together to achieve that purpose and to understand that the pressures we both face are real, and that each of us has to help the other in facing those pressures more effectively.

Final Communiqué and Annex Issued by the Defense Ministers of the North Atlantic Council, Montebello, Canada, October 28, 1983 [68]

NATO Decision To Reduce the Number of Shorter-Range Nuclear Weapons in Europe

The NATO Nuclear Planning Group (NPG) held its Autumn Ministerial meeting at Montebello, Quebec, Canada on 27 and 28 October, 1983. Spain attended as an observer.

Ministers discussed a wide range of security matters. In particular, they discussed a comprehensive study prepared by the High Level Group. The terms of the Montebello Decision taken on 27 October, 1983 which resulted from this are set out in full at Annex to this Communiqué.

Ministers reaffirmed that the supreme objective of the Alliance is the maintenance of peace in freedom. A stable military balance to be established at the lowest possible level is essential to this objective. They emphasized that it was not necessary for the Alliance to match the Soviet Union system-for-system or warhead-for-warhead. Although nuclear forces at all ranges play an important role in maintaining an unbroken spectrum of deterrence, only the minimum number of these forces necessary to support the Alliance's agreed strategy of deterrence and defence should be retained in NATO's inventory.

Ministers noted that, in contrast to NATO's policy of restraint, the Soviet build-up is continuing relentlessly at all levels. In recent months the Soviet Union has continued construction of at least three new SS-20 bases east of the Ural Mountains, in addition to the already deployed 351 operational SS-20 launcners comprising 1,053 warheads. They are also retaining older shorter-range missiles by a new generation of more accurate systems, namely the SS-21, SS-22 and SS-23, which have been under development for a number of years.

[68] Source: NATO Review, No. 5, 1983, pp. 32–33. Secretary of Defense Weinberger represented the United States at this meeting held October 27–28, 1983.

SS-21's have already been forward deployed in Eastern Europe for some time. Ministers noted that the Soviet Union has recently threatened to deploy forward additional shorter-range missiles and to adopt other military and political measures should NATO proceed as planned with the deployment of LRINF in Europe. Ministers urged the Soviet Union to match NATO's restraint and to reduce rather than increase the levels of its nuclear weapons.

Ministers supported the determination of the United States and the United Kingdom to maintain the deterrent capabilities of their strategic forces, while recognizing that only the strategic forces of the United States have the capability to provide the ultimate guarantee of security for all members of the Alliance. At the same time, they welcomed the proposals the United States has made in the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks to reduce the most destabilizing weapons and to reduce substantially the level of United States and Soviet strategic arms, including the "build-down" concept recently tabled in Geneva. Ministers agreed that such proposals could serve as the basis for an effective agreement which would enhance the stability and security of all countries concerned.

Ministers emphasized their determination to move ahead with the dual-track approach of modernization and arms control with respect to LRINF. They noted with satisfaction that the flight testing of both the Pershing II and Ground-Launched Cruise Missile (GLCM) in the United States had been successfully completed, that production of the missiles is on schedule and that the preparations in the European basing countries would permit initial operational capability, as planned. Ministers emphasized NATO's commitment and determination that, in the absence of a concrete arms control agreement obviating the need for that deployment, deployment of a mixed force of ballistic and cruise missiles as decided in the dual-track decision of 1979 will begin by the end of the year.

Ministers reaffirmed that the United States proposal in the INF negotiations, developed in close consultation with the Allies, to eliminate the entire category of United States and Soviet land-based longer-range INF missiles remains the best and most equitable outcome. They welcomed the continuing close consultations within the Alliance on the negotiations. Ministers fully supported the United States' offer of an interim agreement providing for United States and Soviet equality in missile and warhead numbers. They also supported the United States determination in Geneva to explore every proposed solution for an INF arms control agreement that meets the legitimate security concerns of the Alliance. The basic criteria of such an agreement are: significant reductions based on equality of rights and limits between the United States and the Soviet Union, no inclusion of or compensation for third-country systems, global limitations, no weakening of the United States contribution to NATO's conventional deterrence and defence, and effective verification.

Ministers welcomed the latest United States initiatives which address concerns that the Soviet Union has expressed in Geneva on aircraft, geographic scope and reductions of the Pershing II as well as cruise missiles. The Soviet Union has not yet demonstrated similar flexibility. Each Soviet modification of their original proposal made so far would have the same basic outcome: the prohibition of any NATO LRINF missile deployments while the Soviet Union retained a monopoly in such missiles. This is because of their insistence to take into account British and French forces and their refusal to accept the principle of equality in LRINF missile deployments. The Alliance cannot accept this Soviet approach which is apparently intended to further their long-term aim of dividing the Alliance and to erode seriously the linkage between the United States strategic deterrent and the defence of NATO Europe. This linkage is essential for NATO's security.

Ministers noted with attention the most recent Soviet proposals. The Soviets are invited to explain fully their proposals at the negotiating table. Ministers stated that NATO would continue to examine carefully all proposals in light of the Alliance's agreed criteria described above. As reported, however, the Soviet Union regrettably continues to insist on a monopoly in land-based LRINF missiles. The West has continued to negotiate for two years while the Soviet SS-20 build-up has continued. The Soviets therefore have absolutely no justification for breaking off negotiations as NATO's deployment goes forward, as they have threatened. Ministers stressed that the Alliance commitment to negotiations would continue even after initial deployments and that they remain willing to reverse, halt or modify deployments—including the removal and dismantling of missiles already deployed—if and when a balanced, equitable and verifiable agreement is achieved in Geneva.

Ministers accepted with pleasure an invitation from Mr. U. Haluk Bayülken, the Turkish Minister of National Defence, to hold their next meeting in Turkey in Spring 1984.

The Danish Minister of Defence repeated Danish Government support for the double track decision but at the same time he recalled the motion passed by the Folketing on May 26.

Greece has expressed its views in a statement included in the minutes.

ANNEX

The Montebello Decision

At Montebello, Nuclear Planning Group (NPG) Ministers declared that the policy of the Alliance is to preserve the peace through the maintenance of forces at the lowest level capable of deterring the Warsaw Pact threat.

Consistent with this policy the Alliance since 1977 has been conducting analyses aimed at assuring that nuclear weapons in NATO's armoury are held to the minimum number necessary for deterrence, taking account of developments in conventional as well as nuclear forces.

On the basis of the initial results of these analyses, the Alliance decided in December 1979 that, unless obviated by successful negotiation with the Soviet Union, the development of longer-range weapons (Pershing II and cruise missiles) was essential to restoring the balance and maintaining the integrity of NATO's deterrent posture. The Alliance remains committed to the dual-track decision and its implementation. [69] At the same time Ministers decided to reduce the NATO stockpile by 1,000 warheads. This withdrawal has been completed. Moreover, Ministers mandated further analysis to determine whether the withdrawal of weapons beyond the 1,000 then decided could be accomplished safely, in a manner consistent with the maintenance of deterrence at the lowest possible level of weapons.

With the Alliance analysis now complete, the Nuclear Planning Group has decided on 27th October, 1983 to withdraw 1,400 warheads during the next several years. The Ministerial decision, taken together with the already accomplished withdrawal of 1,000 warheads will bring to 2,400 the total number of warheads to be removed from Europe since 1979. Moreover, this reduction will not be affected by any deployment of Longer-Range INF (LRINF) since one warhead will be removed for each Pershing II or Ground-Launched Cruise Missile (GLCM) warhead deployed.

The detailed implementation of this decision as to the precise composition of the stockpile is a matter for the responsible military authorities to determine and a programme to effect this will be worked out and implemented over the next five to six years. In this context, appropriate consideration will be given to short-range systems. NATO's military authorities should report their findings at a future NPG meeting.

Recognizing that for this minimum level stockpile to make the most effective contribution to deterrence, both the delivery systems and the warheads must be survivable, responsive and effective. Ministers accordingly identified a range of possible improvements. Ministers established broad criteria which will remain valid for the next decade, including the continuing importance of strengthening conventional forces. The Alliance must, however, take account at all times of changes to Soviet capabilities during this period.

Contrary to the impression that NATO has been fuelling an arms build-up by adding to its nuclear armoury, this sustained programme of reductions will have reduced NATO's nuclear stockpile to the lowest level in over 20 years. Ministers urged the Soviet Union to follow the example set by the Alliance, to halt and reverse its build-up of nuclear forces, and to join NATO in the search for a safer future.

[69] Greece has expressed its views in the minutes of the NPG at Montebello. [Footnote in the source text.]

Address by President Reagan, Camp David, Maryland, October 29, 1983 [70]

Endorsement of NATO's Decision To Reduce Nuclear Weapons

My fellow Americans, before getting into today's subject I would just like to say a heartfelt word of thanks to all of you for the thousands of wires and calls that have come in supportive of the actions of the last few days and, particularly, supportive and grateful to those young men in uniform who are performing so magnificently.

Now, today I'd like to talk about a very important decision that was made Thursday by the Defense Ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or NATO, [71] as it's commonly called. This decision has great importance for us and for the NATO Alliance as a whole because it addresses the future size and composition of our shorter-range nuclear forces in Europe.

As you know, we're negotiating with the Soviets in Geneva on the longer-range missiles. The current imbalance on those systems is over 350 to 0 in their favor.

But with regard to the shorter-range missiles, the tactical missiles, I think you'll be very pleased with today's news. But, first, a little background.

The nuclear forces in Europe are fundamental to our overall strategy of deterrence and to protecting our allies and ourselves. The weapons strengthen NATO and protect the peace because they show that the alliance is committed to sharing the risks and the benefits of mutual defense.

Just by being there, these weapons deter others from aggression and, thereby, serve the cause of peace. Unfortunately, we must keep them there until we can convince the Soviets and others that the best thing would be a world in which there is no further need for nuclear weapons at all.

The alliance's goal, as General Rogers, NATO's Supreme Allied Commander for Europe, has so often said is to maintain no more military forces than are absolutely necessary for deterrence and defense.

In December of 1979, NATO reached a decision to reduce immediately the number of shorter-range nuclear weapons stationed in Europe. In 1980, we carried out that decision by removing 1,000 of these weapons. The same decision also committed the Alliance to a further review of the remaining systems of this category, and that brings us to our decision of Thursday.

Drawing on the recommendation put forward by a special, high-level study group, the NATO Defense Ministers decided that in addition to the 1,000 nuclear weapons which we withdrew in 1980, the overall size of the NATO nuclear stockpile could be reduced by an additional 1,400 weapons.

When these 2,400 weapons have been withdrawn, the United States will have reduced its nuclear weapons in Europe by over one-third from 1979 levels, and NATO will have the lowest number of nuclear weapons in 20 years. What this means is that the alliance will have removed at least five nuclear weapons for every new missile warhead we will deploy if the negotiations in Geneva don't lead to an agreement.

This step taken by the alliance as a whole stands in stark contrast to the actions of the Soviet Union. The Soviet leaders have so far refused to negotiate in good faith at the Geneva talks.

Since our 1979 decision to reduce nuclear forces, the Soviet Union has added over 600 SS–20 warheads to their arsenal. Coupled with this, they offer threats and the acceleration of previous plans, which they now call "countermeasures," if NATO carries through with its deployment plan, intended to restore the balance.

The comparison of Soviet actions with NATO's reductions and restraint clearly illustrates once again that the so-called "arms race" has only one participant, the Soviet Union.

On Thursday, NATO took a dramatic and farreaching decision, a decision that puts us a giant step along the path toward increased stability in Europe and around the world. As we reduce our nuclear warheads in Europe, and of equal importance, take the necessary actions to maintain the effectiveness of the resulting force, we will continue in the future what we've accomplished so well in the past, to deter Soviet aggression. We seek peace and we seek security and the NATO decision serves both.

Now, let me bring you up to date on the negotiations in Geneva. Progress toward an equitable, verifiable agreement on the reduction of intermediate-range nuclear missiles has been slow to come. Most recently, I proposed three initiatives, which go a long way toward meeting important concerns expressed by the Soviet Union. By our actions in the talks we have insured that all of the elements of a mutually advantageous agreement are on the table. The Soviet Union has now advanced some additional proposals of its own. We'll study these proposals and will address them in the talks in Geneva.

Unfortunately, the Soviet proposals permit them to retain SS-20 missiles while not allowing NATO to deploy its own. The proposals are also coupled with an explicit threat to break off the Geneva talks.

I hope that the Soviet Union is truly interested in achieving an agreement. The test will be whether the Soviets, having advanced their latest proposals, decide finally to negotiate seriously in Geneva.

For our part, we continue to seek an equitable and verifiable agreement as quickly as possible. We will stay at the negotiating table for as long as necessary to achieve such an agreement.

Thank you for listening and God bless you.

Statement by President Reagan, November 23, 1983 [72]

Soviet Decision To Discontinue Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Negotiations

I deeply regret that the Soviet Union has chosen to discontinue the present round of Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces negotiations in Geneva. While their decision did not come as a surprise, it is a terrible disappointment. The search for an agreement to reduce nuclear weapons is so important to people everywhere that the effort cannot be abandoned.

Common sense demands that we continue. We have negotiated for 2 years while the Soviets have continued to deploy their SS-20 missiles. There is no justification for their breaking off negotiations just as NATO is beginning to restore the balance. The United States will never walk away from the negotiating table. Peace is too important.

We are prepared to resume the talks at once. The initiatives we have placed on the negotiating table have only one objective: To reach a fair agreement that reduces the level of nuclear arms. The United States and its NATO Allies are united in our commitment to succeed.

We have no higher priority than the reduction of nuclear weapons. Arms reductions are the only sound course to a safer future. We seek sound and verifiable agreements that meet the legitimate security interests of both sides.

We are continuing other negotiations with the Soviet Union: on strategic arms reductions, on the reduction of conventional forces in Europe, on a chemical weapons ban and, soon, on confidence-building measures aimed at preventing military surprises in Europe.

The people of the world deserve and want our negotiations to succeed. We look forward to the day when the Soviet Union hears their call and returns to the INF negotiating table. Our negotiations have been on the right course. We must persevere if we are to serve the cause of peace.

Final Communiqué Issued by the Defense Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Brussels, December 7, 1983 [73]

Deterrence and Arms Control As Integral and Complementary Parts of Alliance Security Policy

1. The Defence Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation met in Ministerial Session in Brussels on 6th and 7th December 1983.

2. Ministers reaffirmed that NATO preserves the peace, freedom and security of its members through the maintenance of military forces sufficient to deter aggression and through policies designed to promote stable international relations. The strength of the Alliance derives from the cohesion and solidarity of its members in pursuing these common objectives.

3. NATO is a defensive alliance and is committed to preserve the peace at the lowest level of forces capable of deterring the Warsaw Pact threat. In this respect Ministers recalled the recent Alliance decision at Montebello to withdraw 1,400 nuclear warheads from Europe. [74] This decision, taken together with the withdrawal of 1,000 warheads in 1980, will bring to 2,400 the total number of warheads to be removed from Europe since 1979. The resulting stockpile will be the lowest in Europe for some 20 years. Furthermore any deployment of land-based LRINF missiles will be matched by one for one withdrawals. This is in clear contrast to the relentless Soviet buildup. Ministers urged the Soviet Union to match NATO's restraint and to reduce rather than continue to increase the levels of its nuclear weapons.

4. Deterrence and arms control are integral and complementary parts of the security policy of the Alliance. Both are fundamental to NATO's long-standing objectives of safeguarding the peace and pursuing, through dialogue and mutually advantageous co-operation, a constructive East-West relationship aimed at genuine détente. Therefore, while seeking a stable balance at lower levels of forces through militarily significant, equitable and verifiable arms control agreements, NATO must continue at the same time to provide the capabilities necessary to ensure deterrence of aggression by means of a strong defence.

5. The security of the Alliance depends on the maintenance of a stable military balance: this balance has been gravely disturbed by the relentless Soviet deployment of SS-20 missiles. Ministers emphasized their determination to move ahead with the dual-track approach of LRINF modernization and arms control as offering the opportunity to redress this imbalance and reaffirmed that this approach remains the most effective way of safeguarding the security of the Alliance.

—They noted with great regret that the Soviet Union had unilaterally ended the latest round of the INF negotiations in Geneva without agreeing on a date for their resumption. There is no justification for this action by the Soviet Union, which has, during the course of the negotiations since the United States proposed to eliminate this entire class of weapons, expanded its SS-20 force by over 300 warheads. Ministers emphasized their desire that the negotiations be resumed as soon as possible to achieve an agreement on equal global limits on United States and Soviet LRINF missile warheads at reduced levels, preferably zero for both sides.

—They reaffirmed that NATO is prepared, in accordance with the terms of any INF agreement that may be reached, to halt, modify or reverse its deployments, which are now underway in conformity with the 1979 decision.

—They welcomed the continuing close consultations within the Alliance on INF negotiations. The intensity of these consultations has reflected the cohesion of the Alliance. They stressed that Alliance firmness in resolutely carrying out the dual-track decision was a major factor in bringing the Soviet Union to the negotiating table and will continue to be a critical factor in inducing the Soviet Union to recommence INF negotiations in a serious fashion. [75]

6. Ministers welcomed the proposals the United States has made in the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks to reduce the most destabilizing weapons and to reduce substantially the level of United States and Soviet strategic arms, including the build-down concept recently tabled in Geneva. Ministers re-emphasized their support for the United States position in the talks, on which they have been kept fully informed, and welcomed the United States initiatives to move the talks forward. Ministers reaffirmed the need to strive for a mutually acceptable solution to the issues still barring progress in the Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (MBFR) talks in Vienna. They also stressed the importance they attach to the Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe (CDE) as an opportunity to negotiate politically binding, militarily significant and verifiable measures which will cover the whole of Europe and which would increase confidence and security and reduce the threat of surprise attack.

7. Ministers noted with concern the pace of modernization of Warsaw Pact forces across the entire spectrum, strategic to conventional. In the face of this steady accumulation of Soviet military power, the Alliance must take the necessary measures to preserve the security of its peoples. NATO's strategy of flexible response and forward defence remains valid and continues to be the basis for NATO defence. This requires a balanced triad of forces: the strengthening of the conventional component is particularly urgent. Against this background Ministers discussed the results of the 1983 Annual Defence Review and adopted the NATO Force Plan for 1984–1988. Ministers welcomed the progress achieved by nations, and agreed to do their utmost to make available the resources needed for the essential enhancement of their deterrent and defence forces.

8. They recognized that in current economic circumstances achieving the required improvements to NATO's defence posture constitutes a considerable challenge. It is imperative that national consideration of any change to existing commitments takes into account Alliance needs and priorities. The best use of scarce resources remains a central problem. Improvements to the combat capability and effectiveness of NATO's conventional forces must be achieved.

9. In this context Ministers emphasized the importance of making the most effective use of available resources and of exploiting NATO's technological strength through greater emphasis on:

—co-operation and co-ordination in defence planning and in the field of research, development and production;

—improved co-ordination of NATO infrastructure planning to bring support facilities more into line with the projected needs of NATO forces, at the same time as providing an appropriate level of funding to ensure their operational effectiveness;

—a more effective and balanced framework of transatlantic co-operation;

—the potential offered by technologies, available or emerging, to make substantial and yet affordable improvements in the conventional defence of the Alliance particularly within the context of the two-way street;

—the establishment of priorities based on the application of rigorous criteria of military value and cost effectiveness;

—adequate use of the industrial capabilities of member countries in the field of defence equipment;

—effective steps to restrict the transfer of militarily relevant technology to the Warsaw Pact.

Ministers acknowledged progress made in the appropriate NATO bodies towards co-ordinating national efforts generally and in ensuring the successful exploitation of emerging technologies.

10. Ministers again stressed the importance of Greece, Portugal and Turkey having adequate Allied assistance to carry out their missions more effectively to the advantage of all. Ministers agreed that despite commendable efforts by some Allies more aid, and by more nations, is essential.

11. While the purpose of NATO is to preserve the security of the North Atlantic Treaty area, Ministers again acknowledged that developments outside the NATO Treaty area might threaten the vital interests of members of the Alliance. They recalled their agreement to take full account of the effect of such developments on NATO security, defence capabilities and the national interests of member countries and the need to consult and to share assessments on the basis of commonly identified objectives. They also recalled the Bonn Summit statements and re-endorsed their communiqué of June 1983 [76] which stated that on the basis of national decision: those countries, such as the United States, which have the means to take action, should do so in timely consultation with their Allies; there could be cases where other individual Allied nations would make an important contribution to the security of the Alliance by making available facilities to assist deployments needed to strengthen deterrence in such areas; and member nations, as they may decide, have a wide and diverse range of possibilities from which to choose in making useful contributions to promote stability and deterrence in regions outside the Treaty area involving vital Western interests.

12. Against the background of United States planning for its rapidly deployable forces and the implications for defence of the NATO area, Ministers noted work in progress to review measures necessary to maintain deterrent and defence capabilities within the NATO area and agreed that measures that could be taken by countries would be dealt with in the defence planning process, the next stage of which is the adoption of force goals in Spring 1984.

13. NATO's task of preserving peace and freedom and preventing war requires a full spectrum of credible military forces, a stable military balance and the strategy of flexible response. The firm support of the peoples of the Alliance and the provision and effective use of adequate resources are essential to fulfil these aims. While military strength alone cannot provide long-term security it provides the foundation for the development of peaceful relations through dialogue and communication.

The Minister of Defence of Spain informed the Defence Planning Committee about the review undertaken regarding Spanish participation in the Alliance and in consequence reserved his Government's position on the present Communiqué.

Statement Issued by the Foreign Ministers at the North Atlantic Council Meeting, Brussels, December 9, 1983 [77]

Declaration of Brussels: A Call For "Comprehensive Political Dialogue" and "Cooperation" With Soviets

We, the representatives of the sixteen member countries of the North Atlantic Alliance, reaffirm the dedication of the Allies to the maintenance of peace in freedom.

Our Alliance threatens no one. None of our weapons will ever be used except in response to attack. We do not aspire to superiority, neither will we accept that others should be superior to us. Our legitimate security interests can only be guaranteed through the firm linkage between Europe and North America. We call upon the Soviet Union to respect our legitimate security interests as we respect theirs.

[77] Source: NATO Review, Vol. 31, No. 6, 1983, p. 24. Secretary Shultz attended the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Brussels, December 8–9, 1983.

We are determined to ensure security on the basis of a balance of forces at the lowest possible level. Faced with the threat posed by the Soviet SS-20 missiles, the Allies concerned are going forward with the implementation of the double-track decision of 1979. The ultimate goal remains that there should be neither Soviet nor United States land based long-range INF missiles. The deployment of US missiles can be halted or reversed by concrete results at the negotiating table. In this spirit we wish to see an early resumption of the INF negotiations which the Soviet Union has discontinued. [78]

We urge the countries of the Warsaw Pact to seize the opportunities we offer for a balanced and constructive relationship and for genuine détente. In all arms control negotiations progress must be made among the states participating, in particular in:

—the Strategic Arms Reductions Talks (START);

—the Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces Talks (INF);

—the negotiations on Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (MBFR);

—the endeavours for a complete ban on chemical weapons in the Committee on Disarmament.

We are also resolved to use the forthcoming Stockholm Conference as a new opportunity to broaden the dialogue with the East, to negotiate confidence building measures and enhance stability and security in the whole of Europe.

We shall continue to do our utmost to sustain a safe and peaceful future. We extend to the Soviet Union and the other Warsaw Pact countries the offer to work together with us to bring about a long-term constructive and realistic relationship based on equilibrium, moderation and reciprocity. For the benefit of mankind we advocate an open, comprehensive political dialogue, as well as cooperation based on mutual advantage.

Final Communiqué Issued by the North Atlantic Council, Brussels, December 9, 1983 [79]

Allies Reaffirmation of Commitment To Pursue Balance of Intermediate-Range Forces Through Arms Control Negotiations With Soviets

The North Atlantic Council met in Ministerial Session in Brussels on 8th and 9th December 1983. Ministers agreed as follows:

1. In the spirit of cohesion and solidarity, the Allies remain determined to safeguard their freedom and independence, to prevent war, and to build the foundations of lasting peace and security in the NATO area. They will maintain military strength adequate to guarantee their collective security. None of their weapons will ever be used, except in response to attack. They remain firmly committed to balanced and verifiable arms control at the lowest possible level of forces, and will work for greater stability and progress towards genuine détente in East-West relations.

2. The Allies remain resolved to deter aggression and attempts at intimidation. They will meet their legitimate security requirements with the conventional and nuclear forces necessary. They will devote resources and energy to the modernization of conventional forces, seeking a more effective and balanced transatlantic armaments co-operation. The Allies note with great concern that the Soviet Union continues its military build-up, which far exceeds defence needs, while promoting a concept of its own security which is unacceptable because it rests on maintenance of inequality in its favour. [80]

3. The Allies call on the Soviet Union to act with restraint and responsibility in its international behaviour and to co-operate with the West to promote a more constructive East-West dialogue aimed at reducing international tension. Rejecting any spirit of confrontation, the Allies reaffirm their determination to develop contacts and co-operation with the Warsaw Pact countries on the basis of mutual interest. While maintaining a firm and realistic attitude, the Allies would welcome any serious proposal aimed at restoring confidence between East and West. Ministers instructed the Permanent Council to undertake a thorough appraisal of East-West relations with a view to achieving a more constructive East-West dialogue and to report to the Ministerial Meeting in Spring 1984.

4. The Soviet Union bears a heavy responsibility in the current state of international relations. By its behaviour, as in Afghanistan and towards Poland, and by recourse to persecution of human rights supporters, it has created serious obstacles to the normal development of relations. [81]

5. The situation in Poland continues to give cause for serious concern. Some of the steps taken by the Polish authorities, such as the lifting of martial law and the amnesty for most political detainees, contrast with the introduction of other measures which reinforce a repressive system. The Allies call on the Polish authorities to respect the aspirations of the people for reform and to abide by the commitments in the Helsinki Final Act and the Concluding Document of the Madrid Conference, particularly with regard to trade union freedom and civil rights. They are ready to respond to steps which create the opportunity for constructive political and economic relations with the West.

6. The Allies condemn the Soviet Union's continuing and intensified aggression against Afghanistan in violation of the United Nations Charter and in flagrant disregard of repeated calls by the United Nations General Assembly. They deplore the terrible suffering inflicted upon the Afghan people by Soviet forces. The withdrawal of these forces is essential for a political settlement to restore Afghanistan's independence, sovereignty and non-aligned status; to permit the voluntary return of refugees; and to provide the opportunity for the Afghan people to exercise freely its right to self-determination.

7. Trade conducted on the basis of commercially sound terms and mutual advantage, that avoids preferential treatment of the Soviet Union, contributes to constructive East-West relations. At the same time, bilateral economic relations with the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe must remain consistent with broad Allied security concerns. These include avoiding dependence on the Soviet Union, or contributing to Soviet military capabilities. Thus, development of Western energy resources should be encouraged. In order to avoid further use by the Soviet Union of some forms of trade to enhance its military strength, the Allies will remain vigilant in their continuing review of the security aspects of East-West economic relations. This work will assist Allied governments in the conduct of their policies in this field. [82]

8. The successful conclusion of the Madrid Meeting contributes to the strengthening of the CSCE process. Although the Concluding Document agreed in Madrid falls somewhat short of the Allies' proposals, it is nonetheless substantive and balanced. The Allies attach equal importance to the implementation by all the CSCE countries of all provisions of both the Helsinki Final Act and the Madrid document, including their humanitarian aspects. An important result of the Madrid meeting was the agreement on a precise negotiating mandate for the Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe (CDE) due to open in Stockholm in January 1984.

9. Since peace can and must be made more secure through equitable and verifiable agreements on disarmament and arms control, as well as through a balance of forces, the Allies have put forward a comprehensive series of proposals in this field. Their commitment to ensure security at the lowest possible level of forces was recently demonstrated by the member countries of the Nuclear Planning Group announcing at Montebello the withdrawal of 1,400 nuclear warheads from Europe, in addition to the reduction of 1,000 in 1980. [83] The resulting stockpile will be the lowest in Europe for some twenty years. The Allies urge the Soviet Union to contribute to disarmament efforts in a concrete way and not to substitute declaratory proposals for deeds.

10. Ministers underline that the two-track decision of December 1979 by Allies concerned demonstrates the commitment of the Alliance to preserve peace and stability at the lowest possible level of forces. The Allies concerned reaffirm their commitment to pursue a balance of intermediate-range forces through arms control negotiations with the USSR. The progress report of the Special Consultative Group provides a comprehensive account of United States efforts, on the basis of close consultations with other involved Allies, to achieve such an agreement.

Unfortunately, the negotiations in Geneva have not yet achieved concrete results, due to the Soviet effort to maintain their monopoly of long-range land-based INF missiles. Deployments of Pershing II and ground launched cruise missiles are thus proceeding in accordance with the December 1979 decision. Building on progress already achieved in Geneva, an agreement eliminating this entire category of United States and Soviet weapons, or at a minimum, limiting them to the lowest possible level, remains attainable. Allies concerned stress their willingness to continue negotiation and to halt, modify, or reverse the deployments now underway, on the basis of such an agreement. These Allies will continue to consult closely on steps directed toward achievement of this objective.

The Allies note with regret the unjustified Soviet decision to leave the negotiating table in Geneva. The United States has negotiated over the past two years while Soviet deployments of SS-20s have grown by over 300 warheads. The Allies believe that the Soviet Union shares an interest with the United States in reducing nuclear weapons through negotiated agreement. The Allies therefore call for bilateral negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear forces to resume as soon as possible. [84]

11. The Allies fully support the United States efforts in the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks (START), and they welcome the recent American initiatives which provide the basis for a significant build-down of US and Soviet strategic weapons. In particular, the United States has indicated its willingness to discuss trade-offs in areas of each side's particular interest and advantage in order to achieve an equitable agreement which promotes stability. The Allies call on the Soviet Union to respond to these initiatives in a positive spirit. In this connection they note with regret the recent Soviet failure to agree to a specific date for the opening of the next round of the talks.

12. The Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe (CDE) is an important part of the CSCE process and provides new possibilities for increasing security throughout Europe. Allied countries will table a comprehensive package of concrete measures, in conformity with the mandate agreed in Madrid, designed to promote military openness in order to increase confidence and security and reduce the risk of surprise attack. They are resolved to negotiate actively for an early agreement on politically binding, militarily significant and verifiable measures which will cover the whole of Europe. As a sign of their determination, Ministers will themselves attend this Conference.

13. The Allies participating in the Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (MBFR) talks reaffirm their determination to work for a mutually acceptable solution to the issues still barring progress. The Western draft Treaty presented last year provides a basis for a sound agreement. These Allies hope that the most recent Eastern statements indicate a new willingness to address the long standing basic issues of the Vienna negotiations and they are reviewing the state of these negotiations also in the light of these statements.

14. In the Committee on Disarmament, the Western participants continue to strive for concrete disarmament agreements. They consider as a priority task for this Committee the elaboration of a verifiable agreement banning the development, production and stock-piling of all chemical weapons.

The Allies remain gravely concerned about strong evidence of continued use of chemical weapons in South East Asia and Afghanistan, in violation of international law, and of Soviet involvement in the use of such weapons.[85] They welcome the fact that the United Nations is continuing to develop procedures to investigate allegations of the use of chemical weapons.

In the context of efforts aimed at the prevention of an arms race in outer space, the Allies have also proposed in the Committee on Disarmament that the existing international law concerning the peaceful use of outer space be reviewed.

15. The maintenance of a calm situation in and around Berlin remains of fundamental importance to East–West relations. This continues to depend in particular on the strict observance and full implementation of the Quadripartite Agreement of 3rd September 1971. The Allies hope that the further development of co-operation between the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic will benefit Berlin and the people in both states in Germany and will strengthen peace in Europe in the current state of international relations.

16. The Allies urge respect for the sovereignty of states everywhere and for genuine non-alignment. They recognize that events outside the Treaty area may affect their common interests as members of the Alliance. They will engage in timely consultations on such events, if it is established that their common interests are involved. Sufficient military capabilities must be assured in the Treaty area to maintain an adequate defence posture. Allies who are in a position to do so will endeavour to support those sovereign nations who request assistance in countering threats to their security and independence. Those Allies in a position to facilitate the deployment of forces outside the Treaty area may do so, on the basis of national decision.

17. The Allies condemn terrorist acts, which are a threat to democratic institutions and to the conduct of normal international relations. Recalling the relevant provision of the Bonn Declaration, they reiterate their determination to take effective measures for the prevention and suppression of such criminal acts.

18. The Allies recall their commitment under Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty and reaffirm the importance of programmes intended to benefit the economies of less favoured partners.

19. Ministers noted with regret the intention of Secretary General Dr. Joseph Luns to relinquish his post. They invited Lord Carrington to become Secretary General of the Organisation as from 25th June 1984 and expressed satisfaction at Lord Carrington's acceptance.

20. The Spring 1984 meeting of the Council in Ministerial Session will be held in Washington in May.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Spain informed the North Atlantic Council about the review undertaken regarding Spanish participation in the Alliance and in consequence reserved his Government's position on the present communiqué.

[85] Greece recalls its position as it has been expressed during the previous Ministerial sessions. [Footnote in the source text.]

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of State (Shultz), December 14, 1983 (Extracts) [86]

NATO Foreign Ministers' Meeting "Projected Both the Sense of Strength" and "Reasonableness" As Well As "Readiness To Negotiate"

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I thought I might just say a word about impressions from around a week in Europe and North Africa, and then we could have a discussion.

The principal reason for the trip, of course, was the NATO Foreign Ministers' meeting. Coming as it has after the deployments have started in the basing countries, it was an especially interesting meeting and I think notable meeting.

[86] Source: White House Press Release, December 14, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President. This briefing took place in the Old Executive Office Building at 12:31 p.m. Secretary Shultz had just returned from a trip to Europe and North Africa, December 6–13, 1983, where he visted Bonn, Brussels, Tunis, Rabat, and Lisbon.

Because the alliance in the face of very strong-armed and almost bullying tactics on the part of the Soviet Union has quietly kept its cool, gone ahead, shown its cohesion and determination and having done so, and being determined to keep doing so, nevertheless does it in I think a mature way rather than kind of exultant, saying, "Well, what else did you expect," kind of attitude. I thought it was wonderful.

And there was at the same time a total agreement that the right way for us to proceed as a group of free countries is to look to our strength and determination, but at the same time be sure that our positions are reasonable as they are, and to do everything we can to be sure the Soviet Union realizes that we are ready to have a constructive dialog with them, a dialog that can be to our mutual advantage, not a dialog that is simply to the Soviet advantage and not to ours. And therefore the alliance continued to reject the Soviet proposition that an equitable answer for instance on intermediate-range missiles would be for them to have some large number and for us to have none. That didn't strike anybody any better then than it has over the past months of negotiation.

But it was an excellent meeting, and it projected both the sense of strength and the sense of reasonableness and readiness to negotiate. We had a meeting with the members of the European Commission to talk about economic relations between the United States and Europe. And, of course, there are a number of prickly issues, the most difficult, undoubtedly, having to do with agriculture. Nevertheless, I think it was also apparent to everyone that here we have a $90 billion two-way flow of trade between the United States and Europe and that represents something that's of tremendous advantage to both. Otherwise, it wouldn't take place.

And so as we work on these issues, and fight about them, and argue about them, we have to do so in a manner that recognizes the importance of this great, big $90 billion bundle of things that are good. And so, we had, I think, by and large, a constructive meeting. I think the Europeans that I talked to, on the whole, were more downcast about their meeting in Athens where almost in an unprecedented way of meeting of heads of state wound up without an agenda, without a communiqué, or any agreement on anything.[87]

I said, I thought, to some extent, it was refreshing that they agreed to disagree. They aired their differences, and they hadn't been able to resolve them, so they didn't try to make the world think that they had. That's, perhaps, a mark of a certain maturity, as long as it doesn't continue on too long. And at the same time, having been in lots of international meetings where all you do is argue about a communiqué, the lack of one was a fresh breeze.

At any rate, I think that, as far as the United States is concerned, of course, their internal problems are their problems. And all we said was, you're going to have to solve them, but don't solve them at our expense. That's all we ask. But it was a constructive meeting.

[Q.] Do you have any plans, at this point, to make any affirmative moves to resume arms control talks with the Soviets, to start this constructive dialog? Are we still waiting for them to do something first now?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Our position is that we have proposals on the table in all of the arms control talks. We believe our positions are reasonable. Our negotiators are there and our posture is one of give and take, ready to negotiate. And so, that is a reasonable posture and we feel that that's where we should be. And the fact that they have left the INF talks shouldn't cause us to change that posture. We shouldn't become unreasonable, nor should we say, "Well, now that you've left the talks, we'll give in to what you want", because what they have wanted is not reasonable.

So we remain in this posture. As far as the START talks are concerned and the MBFR talks, the statements they have made are different from those in INF. In the START talks, for example, what they did—in MBFR, too—was decline to set a date when the talks would be resumed, [87] Leaders of the ten European Community Nations met in Athens, December 4–6, 1983, but failed to reach agreement on a plan for reforming the finances of the organization.

and it may be that they will say, there isn't any such date. But there's a very careful distinction between saying, "These talks are ended", and saying, "Well, we can't decide now whether a resumption date of whatever it might be is a good date for us."

Typically, in these talks, of course, when a round, so-called, ends, at the end of the round, the negotiators agree on when the next round will start and the date is set. So that's different. But in the START talks, for example, we have had a lot of very interesting proposals put on the table by the President's decisions a couple of months ago, and really, they haven't had any kind of a response to them.

I think it's fair to say that their attention has been concentrated on the intermediate range issues and the deployments in Europe. So we really haven't seen the kind of response you'd normally expect in a negotiation in START. Once again, I think our position is reasonable. We're ready to negotiate with them, and that is our position.

There is a meeting on January 17th in Stockholm, so-called CDE talks. And these are talks essentially on confidence-building measures and notifications of troop movements and things of that kind in Europe taking Europe in its whole. The agreement to hold this conference was joined in by the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact countries at the conclusion of the Madrid negotiations last September. In the case of our allies, we all decided that this was important enough so that we should in a sense send the political message to those negotiations of their importance and do so by agreeing as foreign ministers that we would all go to the opening session. So the opening session of these talks will be attended by all of the foreign ministers of the NATO Allies, including me. And of course we don't know whether the Soviet Union will be represented by Mr. Gromyko or not. But at any rate, I have said that if he is there, I am prepared to meet with him.

But what we can do is be reasonable, be there, be ready to talk, but talk sense. But what they do, of course, is for them to decide. We hope that they will be sensible in this time of tension and be ready to talk in reasonable terms now that they see that the tactic of trying to scare the daylights out of Europe just hasn't worked.

Statement by Vice President Bush, Ottawa, March 23, 1983 [1]

"Our Bilateral Relationship as a Whole Remains Sound"

The warmth of my welcome has been heartwarming, and the hospitality has been superb. My discussions with the Prime Minister, Minister MacEachen and other Cabinet members and senior officials on many issues have been fruitful.

The primary purpose of my visit has been to consult with the Government of Canada on nuclear arms and related security issues which confront both our countries as North American allies and as members of the NATO alliance. The United States values highly Canada's counsel as a neighbor, as an ally, and as a friend. The visit also gave me the opportunity to review the state of our bilateral relations in general.

I think it fair to say that both countries stand in fundamental agreement on the crucial aspects of the defense and arms control issues that face us; that is, we agree on the wisdom and necessity of continuing to pursue the dual policy of enhancing the alliance's deterrent capability on the one hand while negotiating to reduce the level of nuclear armaments on the other. We agree that this approach represents the only practical and prudent means of ensuring peace in the world.

Our bilateral relationship as a whole remains sound. Differences persist on some issues, but these are being addressed in the spirit not only of frankness but of friendliness that traditionally characterizes our dealings.

Let me close these remarks by reiterating my deep appreciation to my Canadian hosts for their kind hospitality. This visit has reaffirmed the importance and closeness of the enduring friendship between our two countries.

Statements by President Reagan and Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau, April 28, 1983 [2]

U.S.-Canadian Relations

THE PRESIDENT. I have just concluded a productive meeting and lunch with Prime Minister Trudeau and the other representatives of the Canadian Government. There's no country for whom the people of the United States feel a deeper affection than your own, Mr. Prime Minister, and I'm particularly pleased that you and your colleagues were able to come at this time.

Our talks touched on a number of issues of mutual concern to the people of our two countries. We discussed our search for solutions to economic problems facing Canada and the United States as well as the less fortunate countries and our efforts to achieve peace and security throughout the world. We also examined several pressing bilateral issues.

I'm pleased that we continue to approach these areas of common concern in a cooperative spirit based on our shared democratic values and traditions. The Prime Minister and I agree that challenges also present opportunities and can be used as stepping stones toward a secure and prosperous world that we both seek. Much of our discussion today focused on the upcoming Williamsburg summit and we agreed that this meeting comes at an opportune moment. The Western economies are pulling out of the serious recession and we're seeking ways to ensure continued progress. The Prime Minister and I are confident of an open and free exchange at Williamsburg, that it will contribute to a better understanding and encourage the creative approaches for economic cooperation.

We discussed the importance of resisting protectionist pressures and maintaining the open trade and investment policies that have served us so well. The issue of security was also a part of our discussions. I outlined the need to maintain an effective deterrent force and to achieve real movement toward the reduction of nuclear weapons. The Prime Minister was supportive and emphasized Canada's earnest hope that the talks in Geneva will lead to a safer world.

We also discussed the need for progress in strengthening measures to prevent nuclear proliferation including the importance of having other supplier states adopt the comprehensive safeguards for—export requirement. And this is the eighth time since taking office that I've had the pleasure of meeting with Prime Minister Trudeau, and as always I welcomed his counsel. And I look forward to our future meetings and delighted to have you here again, Mr. Prime Minister.

PRIME MINISTER TRUDEAU. Mr. President, you have set out the agenda of our talks very thoroughly. I don't think I can add or subtract from it. I would perhaps, following another track, suggest that on the arrangements for Williamsburg I was particularly happy that you confirmed to me that you would be determined, as you said you would be, to ensure that the talks at Williamsburg were unstructured and, hopefully, that we won't be meeting in order to justify an agenda and a communiqué that other people had written for us beforehand, but that we would be meeting there much in the spirit that you and I have been meeting these past hours to really exchange ideas, to get to the bottom of our feelings so that we can contribute—and it would be the first time, I think, in a spontaneous way at these summits—contribute to the building of a consensus, rather than, once again, trying to talk in a way that's said that our Sherpas had prepared a consensus before. And they wrote a communiqué, and we were trying to live up to it.

And that is what I find very exciting about this coming Williamsburg summit, that the material arrangements that you are taking and your intentions, as you expressed them to me, do lead me to hope that on economic matters, first, that we will really be asking each other questions and looking together for creative answers on the various problems you've mentioned, including the most serious overriding problem of the world trade and payment system, including the effect of the huge Third World debt now on our own coming prosperity.

We, too, believe that the economy has turned around, that this is our duty to make sure that at Williamsburg that that recovery is lasting and deep and not just another hope in people's minds.

You mentioned our discussions on security. I'm happy to repeat that the two-track policy, the NATO two-track policy, is being followed, I believe, by your government, sir, and, certainly, by the other NATO governments in that we are every bit as determined to make the effort to reduce the number and strength of the SS-20's, which are aimed at Western Europe—negotiations to get a reduction or, hopefully, even the disappearance of those as are our efforts to ensure that the other track, the one of the deployment of the Pershing-II's and of the land-based cruise missiles is followed. In other words, I've been encouraged by the steps that you've taken, Mr. President, in the past months when you proposed an interim solution different from the zero-option, when you proposed a series of confidence-building measures. [3]

I think these are all initiatives which we need in NATO so that our people will understand that we want peace and that we're not determined to escalate any arms race. We're more determined to seek ways of reaching lasting peace and that that is very much part of our politics and, as I say, I've felt encouraged by the steps that your administration, sir, has taken in the last few weeks.

I could go on, but I won't. (Laughter) I'll get a sunburn if I do.

U.S. Pleadings to International Court of Justice in Gulf of Maine Maritime Boundary Dispute

On June 28, 1983 the United States filed its second written pleading (Counter-Memorial) with the International Court of Justice in the The Hague in the "Case Concerning the Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area" between Canada and the United States. Canada also filed its second pleading on the same date. The first written pleading (Memorial) was filed with the Court by both the United States and Canada on September 27, 1982. [5]

The case is before the Court as the result of a boundary settlement treaty between the United States and Canada which entered into force on November 20, 1981. [6] A Chamber of five judges has been established by the Court to hear the case. The Members of the Chamber are Judge Roberto Ago of Italy, as President, Judge Andre Gros of France, Judge Hermann Mosler of the Federal Republic of Germany, Judge Stephen Schwebel of the United States, and Judge ad hoc Maxwell Cohen of Canada.

[4] Source: Department of State Press Release 236, June 28, 1983; also printed in Department of State Bulletin, August 1983, p. 58.

The Court will establish the single maritime boundary between the two countries that will divide their continental shelf jurisdictions and 200-nautical-mile fishery zones in the Gulf of Maine area. That boundary will also delimit the 200-nautical-mile exclusive economic zone of the United States in the Gulf of Maine area. At stake is approximately 15,000 square nautical miles of resource-rich ocean off the New England coast. This Atlantic area includes rich fisheries developed by the United States on Georges Bank, a site of significant cod, haddock, scallop and other catches. The Bank may also contain valuable oil and gas resources.

The boundary proposed by the United States claims United States jurisdiction over all of Georges Bank. New England fishermen developed the fisheries of Georges Bank during the 19th century and fished the area exclusively until the late 1950s when an influx of foreign fishermen began. Over the last 200 years, the United States has undertaken the primary responsibility for surveying and charting the area, the maintenance of other navigational aids, the provision of search and rescue services, the conduct of scientific research, and defense. The boundary proposed by the United States respects the natural divisions in the marine environment of the area by taking into account the Northeast Channel, which separates the Georges Bank ecological regime from the separate ecological regime of the Scotian-Shelf.

One further round of written pleadings may be submitted. Oral argument is currently contemplated to be scheduled in early 1984.

The Agent of the United States directing the case is Davis R. Robinson, the Legal Adviser of the Department of State. The Agent for Canada is L.H. Legault, Legal Adviser to the Department of External Affairs. A chart depicting the boundary claimed by the United States is attached. [7]

Statements by President Reagan and Canadian Prime Minister Trudeau, December 15, 1983 [9]

Concerns for World Peace and Amelioration of the East-West Dialog

THE PRESIDENT. The Prime Minister and I have just concluded a very useful and a wide-ranging discussion of some of the most crucial issues that are facing the people of Canada and the United States—indeed, facing people everywhere. Prime Minister Trudeau briefed me on his recent discussions with leaders in Europe and Asia, on his concerns for world peace and disarmament, and improving the East-West dialog.

We fully share the concerns for peace which the Prime Minister has expressed. We appreciate his strong statements supporting the joint efforts of the Western allies to negotiate meaningful arms reductions and to promote dialog with other nations.

And I thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, for coming here, sharing your ideas with us. And we wish you God's speed in your efforts to help build a durable peace.

PRIME MINISTER TRUDEAU. As you have just heard, the President supported what is being known as my peace initiative. But I think he did more than support it. I think he has been showing through his administration and the past months, at least, that, as far as we are concerned on the NATO side, we want to change the trend line. We want to make it clear that not only the Alliance is strong, that it will defend itself, that it will not be intimidated but that it is also pursuing peace.

And if I were to tell you, for instance, that the President agrees that there—we shouldn't seek military superiority in NATO, we should seek a balance, that we do not think that a nuclear war can be won, that we think that the ideal would be to see an end to all nuclear arms, it might come as news at least to some of the press in Canada because we haven't been hearing that. But this is what the President said at the Diet in Japan, [10] and this is what our foreign ministers have said just a few days ago in Brussels, [11] that we respect each other's legitimate security interests. Whether this is news or not, I don't know, but this, at least in perception, is a complete change of a trend line which I saw when I embarked in my initiative several months ago, as one which was going downward rather than upwards, which was—to use Carrington's phrase—which was characterized by megaphone diplomacy.

In Brussels last week, there was no megaphone diplomacy. There was a call for dialog repeated two or three times in the message and in the communiqué. So I'm grateful—not that I've said anything new this morning—but I'm grateful that I was able to hear from the President of the United States, the leader of the Alliance, that these are not just words. That these correspond to the intention of the Alliance and that the other side can know, the Warsaw Pact can know that we're not trying to be superior, we're not trying to not recognize their legitimate security interests. We just want them to realize we want to be at least equal in balance and that they should recognize ours. And I think this is a great step forward.

I'll say nothing of the—maybe I will say something about the decision made to send foreign ministers to Stockholm.[12] This is really stating that the politicians are taking hold of the peace issue. It is no longer for the nuclear accountants, it is for the political leaders, themselves.

Thank you.

Editorial Note

As required by Public Law 95-384, the International Security Assistance Act of 1978, approved September 22, 1978 (92 Stat. 729), President Reagan submitted bimonthly progress reports to Congress on efforts to reach a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus problem. During 1983 he sent the 12th through the 16th reports in letters to Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Charles H. Percy, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on January 27, April 6, June 16, August 18, and November 7; for texts, see Department of State Bulletin, April 1983, p. 67; June 1983, p. 38; August 1983, p. 49; October 1983, p. 69; and December 1983, p. 29. These reports reflected United States support for a negotiated settlement of the Cyprus dispute through intercommunal talks between Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot representatives, assisted by the good offices of United Nations Secretary-General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, and by diplomatic contacts with the parties concerned. While stating United States support of efforts for a just and lasting solution of the Cyprus dispute, the President's reports to Congress indicated little progress toward a settlement in 1983.

Statement by the Representative at the U.N. General Assembly (Sherman), May 12, 1983[1]

Support for the Good Offices Role of the U.N. Secretary-General

The United States remains deeply concerned with the Cyprus problem. The continued division between the two communities on the island and their inability to reach an agreed settlement is a great disappointment to my government. The United States deeply regrets the effects of this persistent tragedy on the lives of the Cypriot people. We also are disturbed by the fact that the unresolved differences in Cyprus strain relations between two valued friends and allies in the region, Greece and Turkey. We will continue to support the Secretary-General in his efforts to help the parties to this unfortunate conflict reach a fair and lasting settlement.

With the assistance of the Secretary-General and his Special Representative, Ambassador Hugo Gobbi, the two Cypriot communities have, in the latest round of intercommunal negotiations which began in November 1981, addressed the issues which divide them. Exercise of the Secretary-General's good offices, mandated by the Security Council, has helped the parties reach a stage in the discussions where points of agreement and those issues remaining to be resolved, have been clearly defined through the "evaluation process" introduced by the previous Secretary-General. [2]

Today we are fortunate to have a Secretary-General who is exceptionally well informed on the Question of Cyprus, having been directly involved during his previous assignment as Special Representative in that country. We welcome the intention announced in his report of May 6, [3] to strengthen his personal involvement within the framework of his good offices, in order to give fresh impetus to the negotiating process. The United States believes it is this process—the direct discussions between the communities complemented by the good offices role of the Secretary-General—which has the best chance of producing the lasting settlement to the Cyprus dispute which we all seek.

Acrimonious debate in this chamber and public posturing by the parties to the Cyprus problem will not, we believe, prove helpful to the process underway in Cyprus. Instead, we favor return by the leaders of both communities to the conference table. There, out of the glare of publicity, the parties can proceed with the vital work of addressing the issues which divide the communities and prevent the return to normal life in Cyprus.

A number of speakers in this debate have acknowledged the valuable contribution made by UNFICYP to keeping of the peace on the island. The United States recognizes the importance of UNFICYP's role in this regard, and has since March 1964, contributed 46% of the funds made available by all countries to the UNFICYP Special Account. We are disturbed by the latest report of the Secretary-General on this subject, [4] which documents the increasing debt into which the program is falling. We urge Members of the United Nations who do not contribute to maintenance of the Force to respond to the Secretary-General's appeal for additional funds.

There seems now to be an international climate conducive to progress in resolving the problem of Cyprus. It seems to us that the time is ripe for real advance toward a mutually acceptable settlement. The factors I have mentioned—an active and knowledgeable Secretary-General with a clear mandate, an ongoing process of direct discussion between the two communities, and international support for a settlement—all militate for an early return by the Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots to the negotiations and a renewed determination by both to see progress made. The moment is propitious for movement; we encourage the two communities and other concerned parties to demonstrate the political will requisite to making the hard, but necessary decisions needed to achieve a comprehensive, durable and equitable settlement. We urge all concerned not to forfeit the opportunity which presents itself now. Further delay can only intensify the differences and exacerbate tensions among the parties.

The Secretary-General has indicated a willingness to make himself available to assist in the achievement of a settlement. We urge the parties to accept his offer and work with him to bring about an end to the discord and divisiveness among the

Prepared Statement and Testimony by the Special Cyprus Coordinator and Deputy for Policy Planning, Bureau of European and Canadian Affairs, Department of State (Haass), Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, November 2, 1983 (Extracts) [15]

Explanation of U.S. Policy Toward Cyprus

. . . . . .

In August of this year, [16] UN Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar, acting within his good offices role mandated by the Security Council, took "soundings" to determine the possibility of once again resuming the talks which have been stalled since last spring. [17] The two parties were asked to look both at methodology (i.e., the Secretary-General taking on the task of outlining parameters of key issues within which the two sides could negotiate) and at the substance of three such "indicators" (form of the executive, the legislature, and territorial division). The United States urged the two parties to respond constructively to the Secretary-General's initiative but did not comment on the substance of the proposals themselves.

While the results of this sounding have not yet been announced, we understand the Greek Cypriots indicated their acceptance of and support for the Secretary-General's personal involvement in the attempt to find solutions. In the Turkish response, we understand, was included a call for a return to the intercommunal talks. The Secretary-General is carefully studying the two responses now, and we remain hopeful the two Cypriot communities can agree to return to negotiations with a renewed determination to find a fair and lasting settlement. Our role is and will remain one of supporting the efforts of the Cypriot people to find solutions and of the Secretary-General to facilitate that search. We have also made clear to the parties that we will continue material assistance to help all Cypriots improve their standard of living, and diplomatic assistance to facilitate communications and exchange between the communities as they pursue the intercommunal negotiating process.

U.S. policy has been, and remains, based upon the strong desire to see a stable and peaceful Cyprus in which all Cypriots, regardless of their ethnic identity, can live together in peace and prosperity. Further, we support a democratic, independent and nonaligned Cyprus exercising its rights and duties within the family of nations—a viable and responsible state in a strategically important area of the world.

On a more specific level, U.S. Cyprus policy is based upon active support for the United Nations Secretary-General in the good offices role entrusted to him by the Security Council. We maintain a close liaison with the Secretary-General and other UN officials concerned with the Cyprus problem, and, wherever possible, we use our diplomatic resources to reinforce their programs.

The Reagan administration intends to continue following the Secretary-General's —the Secretary-General's statement opening the talks on August 9, 1980; [18] and —the Secretary-General's Evaluation of 1981. [19]

Collectively these documents, along with the Secretary-General's recent soundings, represent evidence of considerable progress toward a settlement. They constitute a foundation upon which the parties could reconstruct their state.

Further progress will be determined, above all, by the degree of political will on the part of the two Cypriot parties themselves. Without the sincere desire for a settlement—and the incumbent willingness to compromise—nothing we do and nothing the Secretary-General does will matter. For that reason our resolve will not waver. We must continue to urge the parties to negotiate, support the Secretary-General in his efforts to provide the platform for progress, and convince all interested parties that there is no viable alternative to a fair and final negotiated settlement in Cyprus.

Department of State Counselor Edward Derwinski, Assistant Secretary Richard Burt, and I have visited Cyprus this year as part of the administration's effort to facilitate a settlement. Together with Secretary Shultz, [20] we met in New York during the General Assembly session with representatives of the two Cypriot parties, with Turkish and Greek officials, and with UN officials. We have also maintained close coordination with our European allies whose interests in Cyprus parallel our own and who have joined us in supporting the Secretary-General's role. In all these meetings we have forcefully made the points I have outlined for you today.

In addition, over the past year a number of congressional delegations have visited Cyprus. These visits, we trust, have helped to provide a depth of understanding of, and empathy with, the people of Cyprus who sincerely long for an end to the division of their island.

Our resolve in the search for solutions to the Cyprus problem must continue. Over the coming months we will work closely with the Secretary-General and with the representatives of the two Cypriot communities to find paths for progress. The long-term peace, prosperity and territorial integrity of Cyprus are too important to permit relaxing our efforts. I assure you we will continue and will keep the Congress apprised of our progress in this important mission.

Call For Reversal of the Turkish Cypriot Declaration of Independence

MR. ROMBERG. I have one statement to issue on the Turkish Cypriot situation. We have learned today of the declaration by the Turkish Cypriot community of its independence. [25] The announcement came following a resolution reportedly approved in that community's legislative assembly creating a polity called the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus." [26]

This move by the Turkish Cypriots comes as a complete surprise to us. We are dismayed by the move which we consider unhelpful to the process of finding a settlement to the Cyprus problem. We are actively meeting with all parties to the Cyprus problem both in Washington and other capitals to urge calm in the wake of today's developments.

The Turkish Cypriots should reverse their actions. We have urged the Government of Turkey to use its influence with the Turkish Cypriot community to bring about such a reversal. We will not recognize the new polity, and we urge all countries of the world not to recognize it.

We urge all parties to the Cyprus question to support the efforts of the Secretary-General to bring about a fair and final negotiated settlement of the problems of that country. In our opinion the secession of the Turkish community from the Republic of Cyprus represents potentially serious damage to that process.

Q. Alan, it is a surprise to me that you were surprised. They have been threatening for weeks to do this.

A. A threat, Dick, is different actually from moving ahead and taking action.

Q. Alan, you urged Turkey to withdraw its recognition? It's just recognized the republic. [27]

A. I understand that, and, as I indicated, we condemn the move by the Turkish Cypriots to declare their independence, and we regret that the Government of Turkey has recognized this new polity. We strongly urge that no further international contact with the Turkish Government or with Mr. Denktash to try to dissuade him from taking such action." Assistant Secretary of State Richard R. Burt replied: "We have discussed the question both with the Turkish Cypriot community and with the Turkish Government." (Status of Negotiations on the Cyprus Dispute and Recent Developments in Cyprus, p. 18) Yatron then asked whether the United States would accept such a declaration as legitimate. Burt replied: "I think that is really a speculative question. I would prefer not to answer it. We want to see a settlement and we want to see a settlement that creates one government for Cyprus." (Ibid.).

recognition be granted to this self-declared country. [28]

Q. Alan, for what reason would this move hurt the efforts to reunite the people of that island?

A. I think that's rather self-evident, Ralph, in terms of the way the dialogue has proceeded to this point. This is not a positive contribution to that dialogue.

Q. Do you expect the negotiations to resume in light of this or not until the reversal of decision?

A. At this point we are, as I said, in touch with the various parties who are concerned. We are carefully studying what further actions we should take, and I really don't have anything further to give you.

Resolution 541 (1983), Adopted by the U.N. Security Council, November 18, 1983 [29]

Call For Withdrawal of the Turkish Cypriot Declaration of Independence

The Security Council,

Having heard the statement of the Foreign Minister of the Government of the Republic of Cyprus, [30]

Concerned at the declaration by the Turkish Cypriot authorities issued on 15 November 1983 which purports to create an independent State in northern Cyprus,

Aware of the need for a solution of the Cyprus problem based on the mission of good offices undertaken by the Secretary-General,

Affirming its continuing support for the United Nations Peace-keeping Force in Cyprus,

Taking note of the Secretary-General's statement of 17 November 1983, [34]

Statement by the President's Principal Deputy Press Secretary (Speakes), November 21, 1983 [35]

President Reagan's Meeting With Cypriot President Kyprianou

In his meeting with the President, President Spyros Kyprianou of the Republic of Cyprus, deplored the unilateral declaration of a separate political entity in Northern Cyprus and urged U.S. support for a Cyprus settlement, which included a reversal of this unilateral act.

The President noted our deep distress at the unilateral action by the Turkish Cypriots and that we had supported a British resolution at the United Nations [36] deploring the Turkish Cypriot action and urging cooperation with U.N. efforts to promote a peaceful settlement. The President said that the United States stands four square behind the U.N. Secretary-General's good offices effort and emphasized the importance of reestablishing a dialog between the two communities on Cyprus.

The President also noted that he had personally spoken with the U.N. Secretary-General on Friday [37] about his difficult task and offered to help in any way possible. In recognizing that the situation is complex, the President asked that the Government of Cyprus not let this ill-advised unilateral act preclude consideration of any opportunities that may emerge for progress toward a settlement.

[MR. SPEAKES.]. . . In his meeting yesterday with President Kyprianou of Cyprus, the President urged as a matter of urgency that we intensify our efforts to reverse the Turkish Cypriot Declaration of Statehood. The President expressed our willingness to help and underline our support for the U.N. Secretary-General's good office's effort to find a just and lasting solution to the complex Cyprus question.

In a brief meeting this morning with Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Türkmen, the President urged the Government of Turkey to use its influence to reverse the Turkish Cypriot's proclamation. Unification, Strength, and Perseverance of the Western Alliance

First, I want to thank our Ambassador [2] and his charming wife for their hospitality. I want to thank our French hosts for their warmth and hospitality that they have already shown to me, and to all the rest of us. It's a great pleasure to be back here in Paris, to be with friends.

I came to France to consult with one of the oldest and greatest allies that the United States has regarding the major issues now facing the Western alliance. I was accorded a great deal of time and a personal meeting with President Mitterrand. We are very grateful for that. I had good meetings with Foreign Minister Cheysson, other high government officials, and these meetings, all of them, strongly reinforce what I found in the five previous nations that I have visited on this trip.

Vice President Bush visited seven nations between January 30 and February 10, 1983 in the following order: Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, France, and the United Kingdom. He left Paris for London on February 9, 1983.

The Western alliance is dedicated to and united in its efforts to preserve the peace in Europe by maintaining the balance of power between East and West. We are also unified in our efforts to revitalize our economies, reduce unemployment and inflation and improve the standard of living not only in our own countries, but throughout the world.

With me on this trip is Dr. Martin Feldstein (who must be out solving the economic problems, because I don't see him here right now), Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. Mr. Feldstein has been of enormous assistance in conveying to our allies that the United States expects [to] show real economic growth in 1983, which we hope will provide a backdrop for growth in the Western European countries, and indeed in the Third World.

The United States is determined to achieve an economic recovery with a low rate of inflation, so that recovery on both sides of the Atlantic can be sustained. In addition, we can't emphasize enough that the Reagan administration is committed to resist protectionist measures. I know there are exceptions. We have exceptions. Others have exceptions. But our basic policy is to resist protectionism. Indeed, we believe that free trade is necessary, not only for our own recovery, but recovery throughout the world. We share the deep concern of President Mitterrand and other leaders of his government who are deeply concerned by the Soviet threat—a threat which has resulted from a massive 15-year military buildup. France, the United States, and the other allies solidly support the NATO decision of December 1979 to protect the alliance's security.[3] While we would prefer to protect our security interests by eliminating the Soviet Union's land-based intermediate-range nuclear forces and cancelling the planned deployment of our own comparable systems, we will move forward with deployment at the end of 1983, in accordance with that decision, if necessary. The Soviets have offered us a plan which locks in the present imbalance, locks in, if you will, monopoly. They've offered to reduce their land-based intermediate-range nuclear forces, while allowing the United States and NATO to have none at all.

Now, our President has offered the safest possible plan.[4] It would banish this entire class of weapons from the face of the Earth. It's a good plan, a sensible plan, a moral plan, if you will. Sadly the Soviets have continued to stonewall on this peace proposal—a proposal designed not only to reduce the level of nuclear forces in Europe, but to reduce tensions between East and West as well.

During my six-nation visit, I have constantly said that if the Soviets don't like our plan, then they should come up with a serious proposal of their own—one which would bring about the same peaceful goal, elimination of an entire generation of intermediate range weapons.

Our challenge to the Soviet leadership to engage in a peace race has been answered by rejection and by, regrettably, some unprecedented, public offensive comments and an offensive itself.

I have said consistently that ours is not a take-it-or-leave-it proposal. But to date the Western democracies have yet to see or hear any indication that the Soviet Union is willing to budge an inch from its position of INF nuclear monopoly. It is time for the new Soviet leaders to act boldly, and enter a new age of nuclear arms reductions. And let's march together then for peace.

While we await a new signal from the Soviets, France, the United States, and other nations of the Western alliance are going to stand together and maintain our strength and maintain our deterrence. Together, we have kept the peace in Europe for nearly 40 years. We intend to maintain it for future generations of Europeans and Americans. I am convinced after these visits that our resolve will not be broken.

France and the North Atlantic Council's Final Communiqué

Q. Mr. Secretary, can you give us some further idea about what the back and forth about the East-West trade clause in the communiqué [6]—which we still have not read but have heard dictated?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I'm not sure—I dictated and interpolated a little bit as I went along. We'll try to get you the text. Although I guess the official text they will have to produce there.

One of the things that takes up a lot of time, and we should be tuned in to it, but its very difficult to do it, is the French sensitivity about what they are involved in and what they are not involved in. There is a big point, of course, that they are not involved in the Unified Command of NATO, and therefore, there are certain decisions that they don't take part in, while they are involved in the Alliance. So, you are constantly in this process of saying the Alliance thinks such and such, and then the French saying, "Well, we agree with that, no problem. But that is something that the Unified Command did, so we can't touch." And then you struggle around with language to not weaken the point, but at the same time to protect the precision of the French view. The same thing carries over in this East-West economic area. So, there are certain words that they are very sensitive to and ways of phrasing things.

Take the subject of energy. I suppose because of the background of the pipeline dispute and the orientation to alternative supplies of gas, there is a tendency to think in those terms. So, the word gas in some fashion or another will call into a draft. The French will immediately complain that they have a big nuclear program, and how can you say that gas is the only alternative. It is ridiculous. Nuclear power is a strong alternative, and so on. And they are right.

So it is always something that seems to take a lot of discussion, and I think to some extent it is aggravating, and to some extent we should learn and know about these points that they make. But I don't think that the economic part of the communiqué didn't in the end take a lot of time in the discussion itself. There were some bracketed items and some alternative approaches. As far as we were concerned either of the approaches would have been fine. And so in the end that didn't turn out to be a big problem.

The length of time that was taken was more related to the first problem that I mentioned, in getting phraseology that had to be very careful. The allies concerned agree that we had very good questions and that sort of thing. What has turned out on all of these issues is good—strong, straight forward—but it seems to take a while to get there.

ernment were directly responsible for protecting a person wanted by the Government of France on criminal charges and in arranging his escape from the law. [8] As a direct result of that action, Klaus Barbie did not stand trial in France in 1950; he spent 33 years as a free man and a fugitive from justice, and the fact that he is awaiting trial today in France is due entirely to the persistence of the Government of France and the cooperation of the present Government of Bolivia.

It is true that the obstruction of efforts to apprehend and extradite Barbie were not condoned in any official sense by the United States Government. But neither can this episode be considered as merely the unfortunate action of renegade officers. They were acting within the scope of their official duties. Their actions were taken not for personal gain, or to shield them personally from liability or discipline, but to protect what they believed to be the interests of the United States Army and the United States Government. Under these circumstances, whatever may be their personal culpability, the United States Government cannot disclaim responsibility for their actions.

Whether Barbie is guilty or innocent of the crimes with which he is charged will be decided by a French court. But whatever the verdict, his appointment with justice is long overdue. It is a principle of democracy and the rule of law that justice delayed is justice denied. If we are to be faithful to that principle—and we should be faithful to it—we cannot pretend that it applies only within our borders and nowhere else. We have delayed justice in Lyon.

I therefore believe it appropriate, and I so recommend, that the United States Government express to the Government of France its regret for its responsibility in delaying the due process of law in the case of Klaus Barbie. We should also pledge to cooperate in any appropriate manner in the further investigation of the crimes for which Barbie will be tried in France.

This is a matter of decency, and of honorable conduct. It should be, I believe, the final chapter by the United States in this case.

ALLAN A. RYAN, JR.

French Smith directed Allan A. Ryan, Jr., Director of the Office of Special Investigations, on March 14, 1983, to investigate the relationship between the U.S. Government and Klaus Barbie from the end of World War II to the present.

[8] Klaus Barbie, former head of the Gestapo in Lyon, was employed by the U.S. Army Command Intelligence Corps (CIC) from 1947 to 1951. CIC, a component of the European Command (EUCOM) was responsible for protecting the U.S. Zone against subversion, espionage, and sabotage. To do this effectively, it needed reliable people to gather and analyze intelligence, and employed Barbie in 1947 for this purpose. CIC was unaware of the dark side of Barbie's past until a Paris newspaper published an article on May 14, 1949, detailing Barbie's alleged acts of torture and brutality and raising the question of the possibility of war crimes and crimes against humanity. CIC, after initially equivocating on its position on Barbie, ultimately dealt with these allegations by concealing the truth and protecting him.

In 1950 the U.S. High Commission for Germany (HICOG), the U.S. civilian authority in Germany, contacted CIC and inquired of Barbie's whereabouts. Even though CIC knew the French Government was in the process of effecting the extradition of Barbie and that HICOG wanted to cooperate in all possible ways, CIC deliberately concealed the truth on June 16, 1950, by stating it had not been in contact with Barbie since April 1950. CIC falsified the information for two apparent reasons: 1) any revelation of using a former Gestapo officer and surrendering him to French authorities would embarrass CIC, and 2) CIC feared procedures and information would be compromised. Moreover, in September 1950, CIC went one step further by telling HICOG that Barbie was "no longer under [its] control."

In actuality, CIC continued to use Barbie until 1951, at which time it arranged for his escape to South America via the "rat line" (an underground network to assist defectors and informants to escape from Europe to Central and South America). CIC made all necessary arrangements, obtained all required papers (falsified), and even saw to it that Barbie be given an assumed name, Klaus Altmann. On March 23, 1951, Barbie/Altmann departed Europe and took up residence in Bolivia. He remained in Bolivia until 1983 when Bolivia expelled him to France to face trial for war crimes and criminal acts against humanity. The U.S. Government had no relationship with Barbie after his departure from Europe in 1951. (Klaus Barbie and the United States, passim)

Transcript of an Interview With the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), Paris, December 2, 1983 (Extract) [9]

"I Think the Relationships Between France and the U.S. Are Excellent"

. . . . . .

Q. Is the government of President Mitterrand a good ally of the United States?

A. I think so. I Think the relationships between France and the United States are excellent. I think it is critically important that they stay excellent because I do not believe that America can exist in a world in which Europe or France is overrun. So I think our alliance is very important.

Q. Is France the best ally in Europe?

A. It is a very fine ally in Europe. The relationship is a very old one; it is a very strong one and it is vital that it continue that way and we see nothing on the horizon that would interfere with the continuation of the very fine relationship between the United States and France. And that is a very fortunate thing for both of our countries and for the free world.

Letter From Greek Prime Minister Papandreou to President Reagan, February 4, 1983 [1]

Effects of U.S. Aid on the Balance of Power Between Greece and Turkey

Mr. President, the proposals of the U.S. Administration to the U.S. Congress in reference to the program for economic and military aid for the 1984 fiscal year have created, as expected, profound dissatisfaction among the Greek people.

I wish to stress that my government's concern has increased as a result of the fact that the U.S. Administration appears to be drawing away from the long practice established by the 1978 amendment to the 1961 law on foreign aid which provides for the preservation of the balance of power in the Aegean. [2] At the same time, it directly links the amount of aid to Greece with the results of the negotiations being conducted for the signing of a new agreement for defense and economic aid. [3]

One of the basic prerequisites which the Greek Government has set for the negotiations in order to make the signing of a jointly acceptable agreement possible is that the balance of power in the area will be preserved both quantitatively and qualitatively.

The direct result of the proposals of the U.S. Administration on economic and military aid to Turkey for the 1984 fiscal year is, in the opinion of the Greek Government, that it must also define the level of the defense aid program for Greece for the same period.

The Greek Government cannot ignore the fact that if the balance of power in the area is not preserved, then the already fragile stability in our area will be disrupted, with unforeseeable consequences.

As you are aware, this fact creates a climate which does not help the negotiations for the signing of a new defense agreement and which could have negative repercussions on the relations between our two countries.

I wish to express the hope that the U.S. Administration will appreciate the critical nature of the issue which the two countries are facing. [4]

[4] In a letter of February 18, 1983, to Prime Minister Andreas G. Papandreou of Greece, delivered the following day, President Reagan wrote: "I regard a new agreement to define our security relationship to be in the interests of both our countries, and this is the aim of the negotiations in which we are currently engaged. In this context, the Administration will seek increased levels of security assistance for Greece above the levels of the current program." (London Times, February 21, 1983, p. 6)

Greek Military Assistance Program

. . . . . .

Q. On the security assistance report, have you had a protest from the Greek Government about the projected increase in the Turkish military assistance program?

A. I don't have any information to give you about our discussions with the Greek Government. I would simply note that U.S. security assistance to Greece, as well as U.S. military facilities in Greece, are now under discussion in U.S.-Greek talks on a new Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement, so-called DECA, which began in late October 1982 and are expected to reach a conclusion this year.

The current proposed FY-84 security assistance program for Greece, therefore, carries over the FY-83 levels. The U.S. Government has informed the Greek Government that in the context of an acceptable DECA, the U.S. Government will seek increased levels of defense support for Greece above the level in the current program.

Q. And the next paragraph on your paper there, will that projected increase, assuming an acceptable agreement, keep the proportion which the Greeks insist is necessary to maintain a military balance in the Aegean and the Eastern Mediterranean—a 7 to 10 ratio?

A. U.S. defense support programs are guided by principles set forth in U.S. law, which include enabling Greece and other NATO allies to fulfill their responsibilities as members of NATO and preserving the balance of military strength in the region, not talking in terms of rigid formulas.

[5] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. The briefing was conducted by Department of State Acting Spokesman Alan Romberg beginning at 12:31 p.m.

Q. In other words, you have abandoned the ratio that the Greeks believe the United States has committed itself to?

A. Our programs have been, and continue to be, guided by the principles set forth in U.S. law, as I say, which includes enabling Greece and other NATO allies to fulfill their responsibilities as members of NATO, and preserving the balance of military strength in the region. But I'm not going to define it more precisely than that, nor have we done so.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, July 15, 1983 [6]

Initialing of Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement With Greece

The Governments of the United States and Greece announced today completion of successful negotiations on a new Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA). Negotiations, begun last October in Athens, were conducted by delegations headed by Ambassador Reginald Bartholomew and Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs Ioannis Kapsis. The text was initialed by the negotiators, and the agreement will be formally signed at a future date.

The United States sets great importance on its relationship with Greece, a relationship based on shared values and enriched by ties of kinship. Throughout our history as independent states, we have been close friends and allies. We believe this agreement will benefit both countries, their bilateral relationship, and the NATO alliance to which they both belong.

The agreement authorizes the United States to maintain military facilities in Greece under terms and conditions that have been agreed between the parties. As an element of United States-Greek defense cooperation, the administration has requested up to $500 million in foreign military sales credits for Greece for fiscal year 1984.

United States–Greece Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement

. . . . . .

The Governments of the United States and Greece announced today the initialing in Athens of a defense and economic cooperation agreement. [8] The agreement will be signed at a later date at the convenience of both governments.

The negotiations, begun in October in Athens, were conducted by Ambassador Reginald Bartholomew and Greek Deputy Foreign Minister Kapsis.

We believe they have negotiated an agreement which benefits both the United States and Greece as well as the NATO alliance in which we are partners and reaffirms the importance the United States attaches to its traditional relationship with Greece.

Questions?

Q. Papandreou has been saying that after 5 years, bye-bye to the bases, and the United States has only 17 months in which to dismantle them.

Are you saying that very specifically, that at the end of the 5-year period the bases disappear?

A. This agreement is no different in terms of its duration and termination than agreements we have signed with other countries. We have agreements with other countries, as we do now with Greece, that provide for a certain period, and at the end of the period if either party wants to take the initiative and terminate that agreement, they are free to do so. So there's nothing unusual in that. It's the same with other agreements we have with other countries.

Q. So you're suggesting that in terms of language, it's not a terminating agreement?

A. We have had a security relationship with Greece that goes back—an agreement that goes back to 1953, and we are going to continue it under this agreement.

Q. How do you explain the way Papandreou has been advertising this, and the emphasis on the termination after 5 years?

A. I won't explain it. I think he can explain it. But under the terms of this agreement it's quite clear that the United States will continue its security relationship with Greece under the duration of the agreement.

Q. Is there anything in this agreement that is different from the last one in connection with termination?

A. It is, because the last one was signed in a different era. . . . It was one that, as you know, was signed in the early fifties and was going to continue at the convenience of both parties. In recent years I think there has been a different pattern of agreements. They have had a definite duration—normally 5 years like this one—and at the end of the period both sides can decide whether they want to continue it.

Q. Could you give us one example of other countries with whom we have these sort of 5-year agreements?

A. Spain, Turkey, Philippines.

Q. Wasn't there a draft agreement in the late seventies that never got signed?

A. That's right. This is the third try really. We have made two other efforts.

Q. Were those earlier draft agreements 5-year agreements?

A. Yes.

Q. So this is not an innovation in this one?

A. No.

Q. Did the United States seek to resist this termination?

A. No.

Q. Are you saying that this agreement is in fact an agreement to continue the present arrangements? It's simply an extension of what we've got—

A. No. It's a new agreement. You can sit down with the old agreement and new agreement, and kind of compare and contrast. Obviously, as I said before, this is not the early 1950's, but what my point is, it is an agreement that is similar in form and I think in character to other agreements we have signed with other allied governments.

Q. Is there to be an exchange of letters committing this administration to a 10 to 7 ratio? Turkey, Greece—

A. We do not accept the 10 to 7 ratio.

Q. So there is no such commitment?

A. It's a mechanistic approach to security assistance, and that's been our position.

Q. While the agreement text, we know, is not yet released, there are reports from Athens, despite what you said about the 7-10 [ratio], where apparently reporters are being given to understand there that the agreement includes a generally worded American commitment to maintaining the balance of military power between Greece and Turkey in the Aegean region.

A. There is language in the agreement which makes reference to existing U.S. law. I think it's the Security Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, which includes, among others—this is the law, not the agreement; the law of the land—includes balance as one of the criteria, which the United States should follow in making security assistance decisions. And there is reference to that law, which is not unusual; but there is no reference to any 7-10 ratio.

Q. . . . Mr. Papandreou said in his statement quite plainly that at the end of the 5-year period of the agreement, when the agreement terminates and the bases will have to be removed, the United States then has 17 months in which to wind up the operation of the bases. That's rather different. I mean, the 17 months in Mr. Papandreou's terms is a period during which the United States winds up the operations. You're suggesting it is a period during [which] people make up their minds what they are going to do.

A. Both sides, both parties are going to have views on this matter at the end of the 5 years.

Q. Has Papandreou—

A. It's the Greek Government. I mean, this is a sovereign country. We have signed an agreement that is going to last for 5 years. If the Greek Government, at the end of that 5-year period, wants to take that decision, it is free to do so.

Italian Investigation of Assassination Attempt Against the Pope

Q. Mr. President, there have been many allegations that the Bulgarian intelligence service was behind the attempt to assassinate the Pope and that the Soviet intelligence service, the KGB, may have ordered the whole thing. What do you believe? Do you believe the Russians and the Bulgarians were behind it? [2]

THE PRESIDENT. I know that the Italians are investigating and in view of their procedures and their handling of the General Dozier [3] case, I have great confidence in their abilities. But as long as they are investigating, I don't think it would be proper for me to make a comment on this because I would have no information except the same things that all of us know about this.

Italy, a Vital Part of NATO

Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen.

I just want to thank our hosts for making our visit one of great warmth and genuine friendship. I have had the pleasure to meet and hold very productive talks with President Pertini, Prime Minister Fanfani, Foreign Minister Colombo, and other leaders.

Let me first say that we in the United States share Italy's commitment to combat terrorism. We applaud the great work Italy has had in confronting this evil. We remain deeply thankful for the memorable work of the Italian Government in the liberation of General Dozier who finally met, under more pleasant circumstances, with the 14 men who took part in the rescue operation that freed him.

Italy is the fifth nation that I have visited on this seven-country European trip. Tomorrow we leave for Paris and we leave on a note of optimism. The alliance is alive, well, strong, and united. While we are sovereign, independent nations, we hold vitally important common beliefs. We recognize that our strength lies in our unity and we know that our future is tied to the protection of our great freedoms and democratic institutions.

Today there is a new threat to the Western democracies—a threat based on an unprecedented 15-year Soviet military buildup. This one-sided Soviet buildup seriously threatens the balance between East and West.

Peace in Europe is anchored by military balance, not imbalance. The leaders of the Italian Government and of the other European governments I have met with in the last week, believe that we should hold fast to a policy that will ensure the peace for this and future generations.

President Reagan and the NATO leaders have asked the Soviet leadership to act boldly and responsibly by banishing once and forever from the face of the earth the land based intermediate-range nuclear missiles it has aimed at the heart of Europe in return for the cancellation of the missiles NATO will begin to deploy this year. Simply stated, we are asking Mr. Andropov to take a giant step for peace.

The NATO position is a moral position. If the Soviet Union doesn't like President Reagan's zero-zero proposal, then why can't they put forward their own proposal designed to achieve the same goal? Our people are waiting for deeds and actions, they are waiting for a Soviet proposal that will ban forever this new class of nuclear weapons.

So far, all we've heard is a barrage of threats and "Nyet"'s. We have seen a public offensive of words designed to weaken the alliance, to decouple Western nation from Western nation, to weaken us, and to diminish our democracies and our liberties.

No one nation can convince Mr. Andropov alone. If we succeed, we will succeed as we have in the past, together, as an alliance. Italy is a vital part of that alliance. It is a great friend and equal partner and a prime guarantor of peace, freedom and justice in Europe and the entire Mediterranean area. We are deeply thankful for the support of the people and of its leaders.

Italian Investigation of Papal Assassination Attempt

. . . . . .

Q. Alan, do you have anything on Senator D'Amato's allegations in Rome that U.S. intelligence officials at the Embassy in Rome are discouraging investigation into the papal case?

A. I wasn't aware that he had made that charge. I've heard that charge before.

Q. Yes. He did.

A. I thought he said that they weren't pursuing it. In any case, it is certainly not the position of this government to discourage the investigation of this case by the Italian authorities.

We, as we've indicated before, are not conducting an independent investigation.

Italian Elections

Q. Do you have any reaction to either the Italian or Japanese elections today? [7]

. . . . . .

[A.] As far as the Italian election is concerned, we anticipate continuity in Italian foreign and security policy. Again, with the Government of Italy, we look forward to working closely with the new Italian Government once it's formed, as we have with Italian Governments in the past.

Possible Socialist Government in Italy

. . . . . .

Q. Do you have a view toward efforts in Rome of Socialist leaders to form a government? [9]

A. That effort, of course, is going on. If Mr. Craxi is successful in forming a government, we would certainly look forward to a constructive working relationship with him. We have long respected Mr. Craxi and his Italian Socialist colleagues, many of whom we know well and have worked with during their participation in previous Italian Governments. We certainly expect that under Mr. Craxi our relations with Italy will continue to be—or would continue to be, assuming that he forms a government—excellent, as they are now.

Similarity of Views of the United States and Italy

[10] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing was conducted on background by an administration official in the Briefing Room of the White House beginning at 2:02 p.m.

I'd like to say that this meeting that we had today with Prime Minister Craxi was an excellent meeting. I was struck, myself, by the degree of warmth and personal rapport that was generated between the President and the Prime Minister, although they'd come from different backgrounds—he'd been a socialist premiere in a relatively short term of office, and a Republican—a conservative Republican President.

Upon examination of the issues that they discussed today, there was tremendous degree of similarity in their views on foreign policy and, also, in the way in which they're both attacking their domestic problems.

The issues that were discussed today I think are most familiar to you. Of most concern at the present time, of course, is the larger question of security in Europe. Both the Prime Minister and the President agreed that it was vitally necessary to pursue negotiations in Geneva, to somehow break through the Soviet intransigence that has characterized those negotiations and search for a solution. If no success is reached at Geneva, then both the Prime Minister and the President recommitted themselves to deployments this year. [11]

They both were especially concerned over recent Soviet statements regarding the future of the negotiations and threats that the Soviets might employ in Eastern and Western Europe. I must say that the Prime Minister was extremely impressive. And he has demonstrated to a great degree the emergence of Italy as a major player in the Western Alliance—not just in the missile issues in Western Europe but, also, with a special eye toward the Mediterranean and in the broader Mid-East questions.

The President and the Prime Minister went into some depth to the situation in the Middle East, particularly that in Lebanon. Again, they agreed to redouble their efforts to try to secure a peaceful solution there. And both agreed that there were military peacekeeping measures that were necessary at the present time. However, the Prime Minister emphasized—and the President agreed—that they must look beyond military training or military peacekeeping missions to try to issue initiatives that would aim at reconstruction of Lebanon. That is, by providing incentives for the various factions to come together to build a more prosperous and democratic Lebanon. [12]

In this regard, Foreign Minister Andreotti and Secretary of State Shultz will be meeting later to try to develop more specific and concrete proposals in order to carry this forward.

In addition to the security issues, the President and the Prime Minister reviewed other trouble spots in the world to include Central America. And they discussed their different approaches, and their similar approaches, to domestic problems—where both had agreed that combating inflation was a problem of the first magnitude. The President, again, brought to Prime Minister Craxi the good news on the economic recovery in this country and expressed the hope that the American economic recovery will assist Italy and other European nations in pulling out of their recessions.

The Prime Minister was quite frank in explaining the domestic economic problems now present in Italy, and explained some of the methods which he hoped to pursue in order to alleviate that situation.

I think of special significance growing out of this meeting today was an agreement to establish a joint commission to combat organized crime and narcotics trafficking. As you may be aware, about 80 percent of the heroin that enters the northeast part of the United States emanates from Italy. Now, the Prime Minister was especially forceful in devoting himself, personally, to the cause of eliminating this trafficking and over the overall problem with organized crime. The President was heartened by this. He has asked Attorney General Smith to proceed further in his negotiations with the Italians on these proposals. And I believe the Attorney General will have more information on this joint effort on combating narcotics trafficking and organized crime later today.

I think I would just conclude on that point. And, again, I think—just personally—I'd like to reiterate that the two individuals, the President and Prime Minister Craxi, seemed to have developed a strong, personal chemistry. And I would suspect that this would be the beginning of a long series of coordination between their efforts.

Q. The Prime Minister said the path of negotiations must remain open in any case. Do you see any shade of disagreement or even possible skepticism of the U.S. position that the deployment should continue because indeed the Soviets have threatened to end the negotiations? Do they disagree on what ought to take place if there's no agreement in December?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I found absolutely no disagreement. To reiterate again Prime Minister Craxi and the President said we will pursue the negotiations in good faith. The Prime Minister was especially adamant that—he brought to light again the Soviet intransigence and the unrealistic nature of the Soviet proposal in which they would hope to maintain a nuclear theatre monopoly in West Europe and refusing to negotiate seriously.

The Prime Minister stressed that the ultimate goal must be the elimination of missiles from Europe, or at the very least at the lowest possible level. Both he and the President feel strongly that we are going to pursue negotiations. There is I think a reasonable chance that we can succeed by the end of the year. But if the Soviets have not reached agreement with us, then both sides, the Italians and the Americans, have agreed that the deployments will proceed on schedule.

Q. —say they should remain open in any case. And they won't remain open if the American deployment goes through and the Soviets fulfill their threat to walk away.

Now, does he suggest—

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Prime Minister—

Q. —that that isn't the way to go?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, Prime Minister Craxi has made it quite clear. He is saying to the Soviets—He said, "You must remain at the negotiating table. We must proceed here. We must continue to seek out means to reduce the missile threat in Europe."

The Prime Minister was especially concerned, as you may recall, from the letter that he wrote to Andropov and his remarks there. And he, and I think quite clearly, told Mr. Andropov that we must—"You must drop these intransigent demands. We must continue to pursue the negotiations and we must move away from threats." And the various threats that the Soviets have issued through various spokesmen were reviewed also.

Q. How about the reports that the Italian construction of the missile sites is behind schedule and that they might not be able to physically meet the December—

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, the construction in Comiso is proceeding on schedule.

Q. Was there discussion in this meeting on control of the missiles? In other words, who would have operational control of the missiles?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I can't discuss that.

Q. Did it come up in the discussions?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. Was there any hint by the Prime Minister playing some sort of mediating role between East and West?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Absolutely not. No, no. No, absolutely not. No, the—I think the Prime Minister made it quite clear that he is a stalwart member of the Western alliance and that no time has he considered that he would have some special role in mediation.

Q. Did demonstrations, did political unrest come up as the result of the deployment? Did the Prime Minister bring up the point that it could be a tough time in Southern Italy? In Sicily?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. That didn't come up. And I'm not sure that the demonstrations have reached a level where that it is such. But it didn't come up in this meeting.

Q. Was there discussion of the political implications for the Prime Minister, the deployment's political implications for the government, for the Prime Minister?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Domestically in Italy?

Q. Yes.

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, that didn't come up.

Q. The missiles that are going in in Italy, are they all going into Sicily?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes.

Q. Does that begin with the first deployment in December or is it scheduled for later?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. December.

Q. You said the threats that the various Soviet spokesmen have been making were discussed. What was the—what did the President say about those threats?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Well, the President just once again reiterated that the Soviets ought to do their negotiating at the table, that he felt that the Soviets hope to employ a combination of intimidation through their nuclear missile monopoly and threats that were designed to foster the peace movements.

I will say that—and he repudiated this ploy, as did the Prime Minister—and I think, if—I wouldn't be talking out of school that the Prime Minister pointed out that the Soviet Union had tried on many occasions to weaken Reagan's position at home through these methods. It was the Prime Minister's observation that in fact they had not succeeded and in fact it probably strengthened his position.

Q. Was there any discussion of contingencies that the United States might take in response to Soviet threats?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, there was no discussion of any contingencies should the Soviets follow through on one of their threats.

Q. What are these incentives you're talking about in Lebanon?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. This involves—this, as I've told you, would be flushed out with further discussions between Prime Minister—or Foreign Minister Andreotti and with the Secretary of State.

In concept, this would involve some sort of incentives toward reconstruction, perhaps financial, that the various communities would come together in a commercial sense to reinstigate the Lebanese bond of nationalism to try to downplay the differences between the various factions.

Q. You said they agreed on the threat of inflation. Do you see any significance in the Italian leader mentioning the need for international prosperity first? Is this an echo of the disagreement between the United States—or really between Mr. Reagan and the European leaders as to our policies in economics?

ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I was going to agree with you at first that it does have a lot to do with international prosperity on the whole and that the U.S. role, as it could pull the other countries out of their recession. But, no, there was absolutely no disagreement on that.

THE PRESS. Thank you.

Statements by President Reagan and Italian Prime Minister Craxi, October 20, 1983[13]

Italy, One of America's Closest and Most Stalwart Allies

THE PRESIDENT. Prime Minister Craxi visits us as the leader of one of America's closest and most stalwart allies. Italy in recent years has emerged as one of the principal nations of the Western Alliance. Prime Minister Craxi by assuming leadership of the Italian people has quickly established himself as a major figure in global politics. We're impressed by the dynamic and statesmanlike leadership provided by the new Italian Government and we're particularly pleased by this opportunity today to deepen our consultations and broaden our cooperation with our trusted Italian friends.

[13] Source: White House Press Release, October 20, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, October 24, 1983, pp. 1472–1474. Prime Minister Craxi visited the United States from October 19 to 21, 1983. The statements were made beginning at 1:28 p.m. in the East Room of the White House following Prime Minister Craxi's meeting with President Reagan. Prime Minister Craxi spoke in Italian, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter.

Italy is playing a crucial role in the NATO effort to correct the imbalance in nuclear forces in Europe. In our discussion today, Prime Minister Craxi and I reviewed the INF negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union and reaffirmed our goal—an equitable and verifiable agreement. If Soviet intransigence continues, we're committed to NATO deployment of U.S. missiles. We remain hopeful that an understanding will be reached and we'll continue negotiations even after initial deployments. Indeed for 2 years, the United States has negotiated in good faith while the Soviets have continued to deploy theatre nuclear weapons. The Prime Minister and I also reviewed developments in other arms control fields.

The United States and Italy share a common approach to the forthcoming Conference on Disarmament in Europe where we will be attempting to reduce the risk of surprise attack in Europe by improving observation capabilities and by providing a better understanding of military forces and activities. We're striving for reductions of conventional forces and to establish parity in ground forces in Central Europe. I expressed to the Prime Minister our deep appreciation for the positive contributions Italy is making to Mediterranean security and to the search for peace in the Middle East.

Italy was among the first nations to offer its forces for service in the Sinai to help implement the historic Camp David accords. Italian and American soldiers now are bearing the difficult burdens of peacekeeping in Lebanon. We are cooperating there not only in keeping the peace, but in making peace as well. The Prime Minister and I reviewed our common efforts to promote genuine political reconciliation within Lebanon and to work toward the restoration of Lebanese sovereignty throughout that troubled nation. I cannot overemphasize the importance of the Italian diligence in this crucial effort. We examined the world economy, discussed our respective efforts to deal with the economic challenges we face. I expressed our understanding of the difficult economic problems Italy presently confronts and our support for the tough but essential measures the Italian Government is taking to restore balanced and noninflationary growth. I expressed the hope that our own strong recovery would help Italy lift itself out of its present recession. I've been especially impressed by Prime Minister Craxi's commitment to attack organized crime and narcotics trafficking. We share a crucial interest in efforts to suppress the international traffic in narcotics. Accordingly, the Prime Minister and I have agreed to establish a joint Italian-American working group on organized crime and narcotics trafficking.

Prime Minister Craxi comes to our shores as an especially welcome guest. In international affairs where the element of personal trust is so essential, such meetings as this are invaluable. I'm delighted to say that the Prime Minister and I have laid the basis today for continuing the open, cooperative, and mutually helpful relationship which has been traditional between our two governments and their leaders.

PRIME MINISTER CRAXI. I am particularly grateful to President Reagan for the warm welcome accorded me during my visit to the United States. I consider this welcome, primarily, as a homage to the Italian nation. I, also, thank President Reagan for the special attention that—together with members of his government—he has dedicated to the problems and to the views which I've had the opportunity to expose to him this morning on behalf of the Italian Government.

I, myself, have conveyed to President Reagan the message of friendship from the Government of Italy and from the Italian people to the government and to the American people, also—a friendship that belongs to the history of our democratic tradition as well as to the future of our two countries. During our talks, which have been friendly and open—and I believe reciprocally very useful—we have carefully examined—with mutual constructive hopes—several matters. These matters are essential to attain peace both in Europe and in the world: problems and prospects of international economy; the development of Italian-American relations; issues of common interest for industrial cooperation; and for an in-depth struggle against crime and the international drug traffic connected to it.

Both the United States and Italy are firmly seeking peace, which they consider—with absolute conviction—the most precious gift to mankind, and are both committed to solve international problems and disputes through peaceful means. Within the framework of the Atlantic Alliance, our two governments will work toward strengthening peace, aiming to maintain open prospects for negotiations in the field of disarmament and arms control so as to guarantee peace through security.

On the question of nuclear balance in Europe, which presently is the most important in East–West relations, we intend to maintain the present system of close consultation and of constructive solidarity, and to develop a line of combat coherent with the decisions already adopted by our countries. We have followed the path of negotiations which must remain open in any case. Should a launching of the program for the modernization of NATO missile systems occur, due to the negative negotiation policy followed by the USSR and by the Warsaw Pact, our intention is to continue to urge Soviet willingness toward serious negotiations without preconditions aimed at achieving a reasonable agreement, providing for some means of control and some guarantees toward an equilibrium of the agreed forces at the lowest possible level, a policy of peace, which must operate in every region of the world so as to terminate conflicts and to reduce the most dangerous frictions, in full respect of the sovereignty of nations and of the rights of peoples.

In this spirit, Italy intends to assure its constructive contribution by taking upon itself direct responsibilities in humanitarian and peace missions, such as it's the case for the Sinai and Lebanon, aimed at achieving unity, independence, and the reconstruction of Lebanon.

However, a policy of peace must necessarily be linked to a wider international economic cooperation. This is why we have compared our points of views on the difficult period of the world—that the world economy is experiencing. In view of fostering a stable and lasting recovery, Italy and the United States must promote a further increase in the volume of their trade and cooperation which will further strengthen the excellent political relations already existing between our two countries.

Also, in view of an ever-effective fight against organized crime which is involved in international drug traffic and which is challenging and threatening our societies, a special joint commission will be set up and the necessary steps will be taken so that it may operate in the most effective way.

In our meeting today, both President Reagan and myself have reaffirmed the feeling of friendship which binds our two countries, reaffirming the commitment of our governments for the safeguard of peace.

Thank you.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, December 15, 1983 [14]

Denial of Visa for Retired Italian General Pasti

Q. Did the Department deny the visa of an Italian general, a NATO general, Nino Pasti?

A. Mr. Pasti, a retired general and a former senator, was denied a visa on October 18, 1983, at the American Embassy in Rome under Section 212(a)(27) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. This section excludes from the United States aliens whose admission would be contrary to the public interest.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Burt) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, March 9, 1983 (Extract) [1]

Request for Security Assistance for Portugal

. . . . . .

Portugal is a close, reliable, and strategically important ally. It has consistently stood by us, taking a forthright stand on such international issues as Poland and Afghanistan, an interested and helpful stance on problems in the Middle East, and it is a valued interlocutor regarding developments in southern Africa. Furthermore, the facilities it makes available for our use as part of our security cooperation relationship are critical to NATO resupply and reinforcement, and to possible contingencies in other parts of the world.

We are currently engaged in negotiations regarding that relationship. While the negotiations are in abeyance at the moment pending the elections of a new government in Portugal, we are confident that it will be possible to arrive at a new and mutually satisfactory agreement in the course of the year.

It is clearly in our own interests to do so. Not only are the facilities to which we have access vital, but our security cooperation relationship is closely tied to the process through which Portugal seeks to expand its own direct and active contribution to Western defense efforts.

Portugal is a charter member of NATO, and takes seriously its alliance responsibilities. It wants to play a more active role in NATO, and we welcome this desire. At the same time, the Portuguese economy has been very hard hit by the international recession, and Portugal needs help from its friends if it is to be able to carry out the military modernization required for it to meet NATO force goals and expand its own participation and contribution to the common defense.

It is clearly in our own interests to encourage this effort, and we and other NATO partners are engaged in a concerted effort to do so.

The multilateral program, to which our own security assistance is partially directed, focuses on the construction of three new ASW frigates, which would enable Portugal to assume an important role in ASW protection of the central Atlantic. Other anticipated purposes of our assistance include a second squadron of A–7 aircraft, a few more C–130's for support of a NATO-dedicated airlift brigade, and P–3 aircraft to contribute to ASW effort. Military training is a further and integral part of the effort to enable Portugal to contribute more actively and effectively to the defense of the West.

Economic support funds are also important. Portugal is the poorest country in Western Europe, and the Azores Islands, where most of these funds would go, have a per capita income one-third that of the country as a whole. These funds are an important expression of our support for Portuguese democracy and of our friendship for the Portuguese people. The remaining portion of these funds would be aimed at creating a Luso-American Foundation to coordinate private efforts at economic and technical cooperation following the elimination of AID in Portugal.

Mutual Praise for U.S.-Portuguese Warm, Valuable Friendship

THE PRESIDENT. Mr. President, Nancy and I are honored and delighted to welcome you and Mrs. Eanes to the United States. Ever since President George Washington opened formal diplomatic relations between Portugal and the new American Republic, our history has been one of warm friendship. And, Mr. President, I know I speak for our people when I say a friendship as warm and true as ours is more valuable than the richest treasure. I've looked forward to this opportunity to get to know you personally and to discuss relations between our two countries, as well as international matters of mutual interest.

In the 9 years since the revolution of April 25th, 1974, Portugal has made great strides in building a vigorous democracy. Today, the fundamental institutions of a democratic country, an open press, a free economy and broadly-based political parties, are in place and flourishing. We in the United States recognize, Mr. President, that the establishment of democracy in your country met sharp challenges. Portugal's success in surmounting those challenges demonstrates the courage of your leaders and the love of your people for freedom.

And you, yourself, Mr. President, have played a large and crucial role during these past 9 years. You have stated that Portugal must have an open, clear democracy, and as President, you've labored tirelessly to give Portugal just that. Your efforts have earned you not only a place in your nation's history, but a chapter in the noble story of freedom throughout the world.

In foreign relations, our two countries share a number of vital interests, and these will receive due attention during our discussions today. I might note in particular, Mr. President, that your nation's experience in Africa gives Portugal a unique and invaluable perspective on current events on that continent, especially in Angola and Mozambique. Both our nations are actively interested in southern Africa, and your country has always been generous in sharing with us insights drawn from your own wide experience. During your stay here, I would like to discuss southern Africa, and I want you to note that the United States not only values the counsel you've given to us on this matter in the past, but intends to remain in close consultation with Portugal about it in the future.

Along with our allies, Portugal and the United States share the responsibility of defending the Western World. Our security relationship is critical to the NATO Alliance and to both our nations. We in the United States take pride in our military cooperation with your country. Currently, our two governments are negotiating a new Security Cooperation Agreement that will broaden and strengthen our collaboration on common defense objectives. [3] The United States fully supports Portugal's efforts to enlarge its role in Western defense. We recognize that as those efforts proceed, Portugal will need to modernize its armed forces, and we're committed to helping you do so.

We take further pride, Mr. President, in the economic cooperation that we have established with Portugal, particularly in recent years. That cooperation expresses the concern of the American people for the well-being of the Portuguese people and this country's unshakeable support for your country's economy and democracy.

The statements were made at 10:09 a.m. during an arrival ceremony for the President of Portugal, Antonio Dos Santos Ramalho Eanes, on the South Grounds of the White House. President Eanes made a State visit to the United States from September 14 to 20, 1983.

This agreement was subsequently extended and amended, November 15, 1957 (8 UST 2353), December 9, 1971 (22 UST 2106), June 18, 1979 (TIAS 10050), and December 13, 1983 (no TIAS number yet assigned).

Mr. President, 15 days ago an event took place that sickened people throughout the world. The Korean Air Lines massacre reminds us that although we in the West belong to a community of nations that strives to do good, others in the world do not shrink from doing evil. Let us in the Western Alliance join together to retrieve meaning from those stories of innocent deaths, and let us rededicate ourselves to the defense of human freedom.

I am confident, Mr. President, that your visit to the United States will strengthen relations between our two countries and reaffirm our commitments to shared goals. I know that my countrymen are eager to give you a warm reception. Nearly half a million Portuguese have come to America as immigrants and both they and their descendants have earned the gratitude of all Americans by contributing honorably and diligently to the building of our own country.

So once again, Mr. President, Mrs. Eanes, on behalf of the American people, welcome to the United States. (Applause)

PRESIDENT EANES. Mr. President, I wish to thank you for the most generous welcome you have extended to us and for the words addressed to me as the representative of the Portuguese people who, as you know, is a loyal and firm ally of the United States of America. The ties uniting Portugal and the United States are indeed strong. The Portuguese maritime adventure, the Atlantic organization and the geopolitical concepts that it imposes, the sharing of the same democratic ideals, and the presence in the United States of a large and significant Portuguese community create real affinities and require from our countries a mutually advantageous approach. It is with great pleasure that I pay this official visit to your country, Mr. President, certain as I am that it affords an opportunity for an open and frank exchange of views on political and international developments, and, in a very special way, on the most positive means of strengthening the relations between our two countries.

It will thus be possible to reaffirm our loyalty to mutual commitments and to reinforce our longstanding cohesion in the defense of our common interests. This is an objective that is imposed on us by the present and by the future, and it is an aim that it is all the more important to attain inasmuch as your actions, Mr. President, have proved, through your courage and your consistency in the defense of democratic principles, that the values of freedom have in you a committed defender.

Portugal is a small country with a long history and vast political experience. With its eight centuries of independence, Portugal has participated in the long and complex course leading to the Europe we know today. But with its act of [active?] presence in various regions of the world that it discovered and helped to know and to develop, Portugal has gained practical political knowledge that contributes to our unique way of relating to and understanding other peoples. From our history, we draw the conviction that the assertion of freedom of expression and of pluralist democracy, as well as the permanent guarantee of human rights and firmness in the defense of the essential values of society, cannot be called into question. For us, the search for negotiated solutions to all conflicts, respecting other positions and different cultural patterns is also natural provided that those solutions do not run counter to the autonomy and sovereignty of each people and are expressed in terms of a common concern for safeguarding the peace.

In these last few years, the Portuguese overthrew a dictatorship half a century old and managed to overcome new totalitarian attempts through the rigorous fulfillment of the rules of a pluralist democracy at a time when some believed that such an objective was already impossible to achieve. The Portuguese showed that when democracy is given an opportunity, a serious, committed opportunity, the totalitarianisms that deny freedom are defeated by the only real and consistent way of ensuring victory: the citizens' free choice.

But the superiority of democracy must equally be evidenced in its capacity to guide society, adjusting social expectations to what it is really possible to organize. Societies or some social groups, when faced with the impossibility of attaining material expectations that they consider legitimate or that have been promised to them, may question the validity of global models of political organization and then nourish radical tendencies.

Only a political power that is democratically legitimate, competent and efficient and able to ensure the balance of interests, a negotiated consensus and conscious participation will be able successfully to carry out the tasks of economic reorganization.

In this regard, the greatest concern for the present and the immediate future lies in the economic area, both in respect of Portugal and within the framework of the Atlantic Alliance and of international relations in general. And further, it is in that context of global democratic concern that it is justified to expect the demonstration of the solidarity of the democratic countries and, first of all, of the United States. In this way, our security will be reinforced, guaranteeing the present and future substance of the Atlantic Alliance and illustrating, in many other areas and in practical realities, that all truly democratic forces and programs may count on effective support.

I am certain, Mr. President, that our exchange of views on these and other subjects, while confirming our alliance, will justify a future of active and committed cooperation. I look forward to meeting with you, Mr. President, and discussing with you means for us to carry out this fruitful cooperation in the future between the United States and Portugal.

Thank you very much. (Applause)

U.S.-Portuguese Issues Aired

. . . . . .

SENIOR DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. I missed dessert for this briefing. I will just try to briefly run down the issues that were discussed by the two Presidents today.

First of all, the atmosphere was very warm by virtue of the fact that year in and year out, the United States-Portuguese relationship is a very cooperative one. The Portuguese, as they have demonstrated most recently, I think, with the suspension of Aeroflot flights for 30 days, have been for 40 years probably one of the most loyal allies that the United States has had. Some of you know the background of this including the 1973 Middle East war, and the crucial role that their bases in the Azores played in that effort. The base issue—the question of Portuguese bases—was discussed, and both sides stressed the importance of moving ahead with the negotiations which have begun, and both sides desire to wrap up an agreement as quickly as possible.

Our negotiator for those talks is our Ambassador in Lisbon, Allan Holmes, and he, of course, is back with the Portuguese President. Some of the details and some of the questions in those negotiations have been discussed by the Secretary of State and the Foreign Minister [5] as well as Mr. Holmes.

Looking at broader forms of political cooperation, there was some discussion of NATO issues, INF and Geneva talks. The Portuguese President praised the decision by President Reagan to continue the Geneva negotiations, and strongly supported the December 1979 decision. [6]

I mentioned the other forms of political cooperation, the question of the Korean airliner, probably the most important. There was some discussion on the impact on European public opinion of the episode, with both Presidents agreeing that it would likely reduce the appeal of the neutralist or the pacificist sentiment in Europe. The Portuguese, as I said, have taken a stronger position on the airliner than many of our other allies, suspending flights by Aeroflot to Lisbon for thirty days. That is a fairly important route for the Soviets because they fly into Lisbon and then fly on to Havana.

[6] Regarding the 1979 decision, see the communiqué issued at a Special Meeting of NATO Foreign and Defense Ministers in Brussels, December 12, 1979, printed in American Foreign Policy: Basic Documents, 1977–1980, pp. 494–496.

There was a lot of discussion on economic problems. As you may know, Portugal has been negotiating with the IMF,[7] and as part of that negotiation has announced some sweeping austerity measures. The Portuguese decision to adopt those measures was praised by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury in the meetings this morning. President Reagan was able to brief President Eanes on the implications for the world economy of the United States recovery.

There was some discussion of the domestic political scene in Portugal. The Portuguese, as you know, have made major progress in building a stable democracy. . . .

Then, finally—and I don't mean to say finally because it is the least important, because it's very important—there has been a good deal of discussion on southern Africa. Assistant Secretary Chester Crocker recently visited Portugal where he met with President Eanes and others, and discussions this morning were a good followup to those. The Portuguese, needless to say, have a great deal of experience in Angola, Mozambique and other parts of southern Africa, and desire to play a larger role in that region, and the United States strongly supports that.

In his discussions [he focused?] on how the United States and Portugal could cooperate in working on southern African problems. . . .

My final point concerns the fact that traveling with the Portuguese President and the Foreign Minister was the Regional President of the Azores.[8] Most Portuguese-Americans—and I think there are, roughly, 1,000,000 in the United States—come from the Azores. The United States has a special relationship with the Azores which was pointed out in very strong terms by the Regional Azorean President, and he had the opportunity to talk about the special problems of the Azores with the President.

I'll be happy to answer any of your questions.

Q. Did the President ask for any more U.S. aid? He seemed to make a mention of that during his remarks.[9]

A. They are, obviously, interested in U.S. security assistance. They have important military modernization needs. Our security assistance funding for Portugal has increased in recent years, and we intend to increase that amount in the years ahead. The President was able to tell the Portuguese President that that is our intention.

This is, obviously, a question that will be related, not formally but indirectly related, to the the base negotiations.

Q. Are there any hangups on that base negotiation? How soon do you expect that to be—

A. I wouldn't want to speculate, but we are interested in achieving an agreement, as are the Portuguese, as quickly as possible.

Q. When does the current agreement expire?

A. It expired earlier this year, but as with other agreements, there is a grace period, which I think lasts for one year for the two sides.

Q. But there are no special issues in this?

A. I don't think there are any particularly special issues. As you know, we have been negotiating with other countries—recently Spain—and we've completed an agreement there;[10] with the Greeks; and outside of Europe, the Philippines. I would say that, roughly, the issues are the same.

Q. It's tied to more, to a substantial increase in aid?

A. I wouldn't say that. I wouldn't necessarily say that.

Q. How is it tied to any increase in economic assistance?

A. Well, we do not tie any of our base agreements formally to increases in aid, but obviously, the Portuguese do have economic problems, and they have military modernization needs; and we want to be as helpful as we can.

U.S.-Portugal Defense Agreement Extended

It is a pleasure for me to sign on behalf of the United States this new defense agreement further extending the long period of cooperation between our two nations. [12]

The conclusion of this agreement is a tribute to both our countries, as a reaffirmation and a major example of the shared values and strong ties of cooperation which have existed for many years between Portugal and the United States. From those values we draw strength in our joint determination to defend the freedom of our peoples, the independence of our nations, and the maintenance of the peace in a troubled world. The accord we sign today makes a major contribution towards those goals and in so doing not only enhances our bilateral relationship but also the vitality of NATO.

That sense of joint purpose has been reflected in the discussions it has been my privilege to hold these past two days with Portugal's leaders. We touched on many subjects, regarding both our bilateral relationship and major issues on the international scene. I drew useful insights from our talks and I believe we found ourselves in agreement on many specific points. What struck me most, however, was the clarity and strength of our common desire to promote individual dignity and the defense of freedom within our own societies and the world at large, and our willingness to work together to achieve those ends. This signing ceremony is thus a fitting culmination to a most successful visit [13] and I will depart Portugal grateful for the hospitality shown me and pleased in the knowledge that the bonds of friendship and cooperation between our two countries are strong and enduring.

Reaction to the Warsaw Pact's Proposal for a Nonaggression Treaty With NATO

matter last night. [2] Maybe he wasn't prepared. Are you prepared to amplify the response?

A. As the President said last night, we will consider this proposal in consultation with our allies. Peace with justice must always be this nation's highest priority. We are, and will continue to be, receptive to ideas which would genuinely promote peace and peaceful settlements of disputes. In our discussions with our allies, we will consider whether this is such a proposal.

At their summit in Bonn last year, the leaders of the NATO countries pledged that none of NATO's weapons would ever be used except in response to aggression. [3] The President has underscored this on a number of occasions. Indeed, the principle of nonaggression is a key provision of the UN Charter to which we and our NATO Allies have long subscribed. At first glance, this proposal does not seem to represent anything new. But as the President said, we will look at it.

We learned from bitter experience between the two World Wars that simple declarations of peaceful intent are not enough. What we need are concrete results, which not only reduce the danger of war, but which contribute to an atmosphere of increased trust. To this end, the proposals that we have made in the Geneva and the Vienna negotiations on both nuclear and conventional forces are designed to achieve genuine, substantial cuts in the arsenals of both sides, as well as measures to enhance mutual confidence. [4]

Q. What concrete examples or steps would you like to see the East bloc take, so it would be more than a declaration?

A. I don't want to go beyond what President Reagan said, but in addition to the arms proposals the President has on the table, the President has proposed a number of confidence-building measures, and it seems to me there are various areas in which they could react swiftly to the President's various initiatives.

"If There Are To Be Better Mutual Relations, They Must Result From Moderation in Soviet Conduct, Not Just Our Own Good Intentions"

My fellow Americans, today I'd like to share with you some thoughts on one of the most important aspects of America's role in the world—our relations with the Soviet Union. Keeping the peace for both countries, for that matter, for all mankind depends on our wise and steady management of this relationship.

As you know, a new leader has come to power in Moscow. [6] There has been much speculation about whether this change could mean a chance to reduce tensions and solve some of the problems between us. No one hopes more than I do that the future will bring improvement in our relations with the Soviets and an era of genuine stability.

What could be more important than reducing the danger of confrontation, increasing the prospects for enduring peace, lowering nuclear arsenals, relieving human suffering in Afghanistan and Kampuchea and elsewhere? With your support, this administration has embarked on an effort to restore our nation's strength, credibility and clarity of purpose in the world.

Our aim has been to insure that America has the will and the means to deter conflict and to defend the interest of freedom. We've done this for one reason and one reason only—because a strong, respected America is the surest way to preserve the peace and prevent conflict.

In this effort, we must learn from history. We all experienced the soaring hopes and then plunging disappointment of the 1970's, when the Soviet response to our unilateral restraint was to accelerate their military buildup, to foment violence in the developing world, to invade neighboring Afghanistan and to support the repression of Poland.

The lesson is inescapable. If there are to be better mutual relations, they must result from moderation in Soviet conduct, not just our own good intentions.

In recent days, some encouraging words have come out of Moscow. Clearly the Soviets want to appear more responsive and reasonable. But moderate words are convincing only when they're matched by moderate behavior.

Now, we must see whether they're genuinely interested in reducing existing tensions. We and our democratic partners eagerly await any serious actions and proposals the Soviets may offer and stand ready to discuss with them serious proposals which can genuinely advance the cause of peace. We do not insist that the Soviet Union abandon its standing as a super power or its legitimate national interests.

In fact, we hope that the new leadership in Moscow will come to realize that Soviet interests would be improved by ending the bloodshed in Afghanistan, by showing restraint in the Middle East, by permitting reform and thus promoting stability in Poland, by ending their unequaled military buildup as we have proposed, by reducing the most dangerous nuclear arms to much lower and equal levels.

We stand ready to work toward solutions to all outstanding problems. Now, this doesn't mean that we should neglect our own defenses. That would undercut our ability to maintain peace and jeopardize whatever chance we may have for changing Soviet conduct. But it does mean that we're always ready to sit down with the Soviets to discuss practical steps that could resolve problems and lead to a more durable and genuine improvement in East–West relations.

Next month, Soviet and American negotiators will resume talks in Geneva on strategic and intermediate-range nuclear forces. We've proposed drastic cuts in those threatening intermediate-range forces. The Soviets have responded in both negotiations with proposals of their own. So, a serious foundation for progress has been laid. America will negotiate energetically and in good faith to achieve early agreements providing for reduced and equal levels of forces. The Soviet leadership must understand that the way to reduce the nuclear threat is by negotiating in the same sincere spirit and not by trying to sow division between the American people and our NATO partners. That kind of negative tactic is certain to fail and can only delay real progress.

A cornerstone of our approach to relations with the Soviet Union is close consultation with our allies on common political and security issues. In this spirit, I've asked Vice President Bush to travel to Europe. Beginning at the end of this month, he will visit the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, France, and Great Britain and at the Vatican he will meet with Pope John Paul II. In Switzerland the Vice President will meet with the negotiating teams for the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks, which we call START, and the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Arms Control Talks we call INF and will attend a meeting of the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva.

The Vice President's visit to these close friends and allies and his discussions at the Vatican and in Geneva underscore our fundamental commitment to peace and security in Europe and to genuine arms reductions.

So, the new year begins with reason for all of us to hope that if we continue to act firmly and wisely, 1983 can be a time of peaceful progress for America, for our allies, for the people of the U.S.S.R. and for the entire world.

Until next week, thanks for listening and God bless you.

Review of U.S. Relations With the Soviet Union

Leonid Brezhnev is dead, and Yuri Andropov governs in his place. And for many Western pundits the way is now open—if we Americans, they say, but have the wit and will—to bring about a fundamental change in the relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union. I am here tonight, ladies and gentlemen, to tell you that—although I might wish it were so—I do not believe it to be so.

The reality is that while, of course, personalities are influential in setting the course the two super powers will follow, the divergence of views, history, and interests is so basic that no one man—indeed no group of men—can affect, except at the margins, the fundamentally competitive nature of our relationship.

It is, indeed, nice to know that Mr. Andropov may like to listen to the music of Tommy Dorsey, browse through the novels of Jacqueline Susann, and wear cuffs on his pants, but he also rose to the heights through the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, was Soviet Ambassador in Hungary in 1956—a vintage year in the history of Soviet oppression—and spent more than 15 years as head of the KGB, which is not widely known for its liberal predilections.

Even were he to wish it were otherwise, Mr. Andropov's room for maneuver is limited. He must govern by a form of limited consensus, since he is beholden to the men who chose him for his post. And, even if he had more scope to act alone, there is no reason to believe he would be inclined to make sweeping changes. He is a product of the Soviet system. It is a system that has sheltered his life's work, promoted and rewarded him, and now given him supreme power. If he believes in nothing else, he certainly believes in keeping it going. In short, the new General Secretary is no doubt a good Communist, but he is certainly not a revolutionary.

But if the next Russian revolution is not just around the corner, neither should we expect that everything in the Soviet Union will, in the future, be exactly as it has been in the past. The country, under the General Secretary's rule, will not be a carefully preserved museum of the Brezhnev years. Historically a change of leadership in the Soviet Union has set in motion social and political changes that affect more than just the composition of the Politburo. Long-delayed decisions can at last be made. New courses, if not radically new ones, can be charted.

The prospect of some change in Soviet conduct—indeed, our desire for change—is one reason why the first few months of the Andropov regime are an appropriate time to take stock of where we stand with the Soviet Union. Certainly the Soviets are reviewing where they stand with us. It is appropriate, as well, because this administration has now had responsibility for conducting American relations with the Soviet Union for 2 years.

Our policy toward the U.S.S.R. starts from the fact that both of us have weapons of almost unimaginable destructive force. Each of us can do mortal damage to the other in an afternoon. Our weapons are not the result of failed judgment, or of a military-industrial complex spinning out of control. We arm because the Soviet Union is armed and aggressive.

The differences between the Soviet Union and the Western World are deeply rooted. We have radically different political values, visions of the proper social order, and aspirations for the future of the international system. While we in the West are fundamentally committed to individual liberty, to free elections, the accountability of those who govern to the governed, to economic freedom, and to a world order that fosters those values, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union is just as fundamentally opposed to all of those principles.

But even more ominous than these differences is the Soviet decision to translate our philosophical rift into a global, military competion. They have made us rivals.

We are rivals not because the Soviets do not respect our interests, but because they respect only their own. Our moral commitment to the rule of law, to peaceful change, and to the safety of the weak from domination by the strong compel us to view the Soviets not only as our rival, but as the rival of a humane world order.

We cannot wish these differences away. And we will not abandon our values. In fact, we are determined to advance them. This administration welcomes an open and peaceful competition between our visions of man's future. President Reagan has recently launched a program to promote democratic values and institutions abroad; [8] it is a program that has already drawn substantial Soviet fire, so its potential effectiveness must worry them.

Our rivalry, then, must continue so long as our two nations remain true to the principles upon which they were founded. But because our arms make the rivalry so dangerous, we must keep it within bounds. We and the Soviets have few common interests. But, so long as the West remains strong, we do share one fundamental interest—that of avoiding war. American policy toward the Soviet Union must fall between the impossible and the unacceptable; we must steer a middle course between the friendship we cannot have and the war we must not have.

The aim of this administration is plain. We want relations with the Soviets that are as cordial and cooperative as our deep differences permit. But such a relationship has two fundamental requirements.

First, there must be a military balance. History offers few clear lessons for those who manage our nation's affairs, but one of them surely is that an imbalance of military power between two rivals leads to trouble. Where such an imbalance exists for long the stronger party talks, while the weaker listens. Soon the stronger makes demands, and the weaker submits.

Over the past decade America's investment in defense lagged behind that of the Soviet Union. During the 1970's we spent between 4 and 5 percent of our gross national product on defense; the Soviets spent 12 to 14 percent of theirs. In that decade, our defense spending declined in real terms. Theirs increased by 4 to 5 percent per year. These facts have clearly affected the course of Soviet conduct for much of the past 10 years. We have, then, little choice but to increase our defense effort to make up for the ground we have lost.

Our efforts are designed to assure equality in the military relationship. We do not seek an arms race, but we will not—we cannot—accept second best. We are not trying to spend the Soviet economy into the ground. Indeed, we would not mind at all if the Soviets improved their economic condition by spending less on their military. We arm for a single purpose: to deter the use of Soviet arms against us or our allies.

Our effort to maintain a stable military balance is entirely consistent with our goal of improved relations with the Soviet Union. In fact, the one is clearly necessary for the other—a reality that some, of late, seem to have forgotten. There is great wisdom in the story of the first-time visitor to Jerusalem who tells an Israeli he meets that he is surprised to see so many weapons in the land of the Bible. "It is true," the Israeli tells him, "that the Bible says that on the day of days the lion shall lie down with the lamb. But," he continues, "the day of days hasn't come yet. And even then," he adds, "I'd rather be the lion than the lamb."

The second fundamental requirement for an improved relationship with the Soviet Union is simply stated: The Soviet Union must observe certain basic standards of national conduct. We do not insist that the Soviet Union abandon legitimate national interests or its standing as a superpower. But what possible legitimate Soviet interest would be threatened were they to live up to standards that are plainly written into documents they themselves have signed—the Helsinki Accords,[9] the United Nations Charter, even their own Constitution? Yet these standards have been violated time and time again. The Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, the suppression of the popular desire for reform in Poland, the Vietnamese imperial control of Kampuchea at the behest of the Soviet Union, their Cuban proxy's promotion of instability in southern Africa and Central America, the denial of basic human rights to their own citizens—all these acts demonstrate that the Soviets have not only failed to abide by the rules of civilized societies, they have failed to keep their word.

When the Soviet buildup far exceeds any legitimate defense requirement, when they deploy forces in Eastern Europe, the Far East and the Indian Ocean that have no conceivable defensive mission, when they intimidate our European and Asian allies to try to prevent them from taking measures that their own unwarranted military initiatives have made necessary, it is difficult to credit the Soviet Government with peaceful intentions. When the Soviets threaten Japan with nuclear devastation on the heels of Prime Minister Nakasone's visit here,[10] are they not to be taken seriously? When elementary human rights are denied where Communist governments hold power, when Anatoliy Shcharanskiy is cruelly imprisoned instead of being allowed to emigrate, and Andrei Sakharov is held under house arrest far from his home under no formal charge, and when one of the first acts of the new Soviet leadership is to threaten the distinguished historian Roy Medvedev, we in the West, for whom human rights are of paramount importance, must not pretend that more cordial East-West relations will be easy to achieve.

It is these policies, undertaken by the Soviet Union and its allies, that have poisoned East-West relations. This is the crucial point that some in the West are too ready to forget. Our relations have been bad because Soviet aggression and provocation have made them bad. When aggression and provocation cease, relations will improve.

This has been the message of the Reagan administration for the past 2 years. I believe it is getting through. The Soviets know where we stand. They understand the principles that underlie our positions. They understand that we are committed to our principles, and that we have strength of purpose and have not lost our will.

I cannot tell you this evening that we have achieved our goals. As we meet, surface to air missiles are being deployed to Syria, and Soviet soldiers are killing Afghan freedom fighters. Vietnamese forces occupy Kampuchea. Cubans by the thousands are garrisoned in Africa, while other Cubans, also in the thousands, sow subversion in Central America. Throughout Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union the furtherance of human rights is a popular aspiration, but not government policy. In sum, a basis does not yet exist for the long term relationship with the Soviet Union that we want, a relationship marked by restraint and a modicum of cooperation.

The prospects for such a relationship depend on the course that Soviet foreign policy takes in the coming months. All the good will and hope in the world on our side will not remove the obstacles the Soviets have created. What really matters is how the Soviet leaders see their own prospects, at home and abroad. Here some informed speculation is possible.

The leadership confronts a formidable problem: the state of the Soviet economy. Mr. Andropov has said so, with a candor that some may have found refreshing and that was certainly unusual. The familiar diseases of Communist economies—shortages of goods, poor quality in those goods that are available, corruption, a thriving black market—have worsened. In short, the iron hand of the central planners stifles initiative, innovation, and imagination. The Soviets are suffering, as well, from the burden of empire: restless nationalities, Eastern European satellites held in check by force and force alone, and overextension in the Third World.

Let me not overstate the difficulties that the Soviets face. The economy is not about to collapse. The Soviet Government has a well-developed capacity for forcing the people it rules to bear hardships. The Russian people—and the other peoples of the Soviet empire—have long experience in adjusting to deprivation. The regime and the people have faced far worse times than these and survived.

There is no sign that their economic difficulties will force the Soviet leaders to reduce their military spending. Nor are their troubles compelling them to pull back from the military adventures they have undertaken or sponsored beyond their borders.

But they have gone no further. If they have not withdrawn from Afghanistan, they have perpetrated no new Afghanistans. For this the economic squeeze the Soviet leaders must be feeling undoubtedly deserves some credit. The cost of further adventures is likely to look forbidding to them. But even more important, they know they must reckon with America's clear and steady determination to defend Western interests. To the degree the Soviets have become more hesitant about causing new problems over the last 2 years, our firmness and steadiness deserve some of the credit.

This lesson—that only Western resolve brings Eastern reasonableness—is nowhere more valid than in arms control negotiations. Before NATO decided in 1979 to respond to the alarming growth in the Soviet nuclear threat to our European allies,[11] the Soviets swore that such a decision would end all hope for a negotiated solution. Their purpose was to derail the decision so that they would have no need to negotiate. Within months of NATO's decision to deploy, the Soviets were at the negotiating table. Now Moscow insists that if NATO goes through with its decision to modernize its intermediate-range nuclear forces, the negotiations will end and the Soviet nuclear threat will be increased.

Even if this were true, the alliance cannot but carry out its plans. What is at stake here goes far beyond the details of the INF imbalance. If NATO, as a result of Soviet political pressure, were to abandon a program that is essential to assure the security of Europe it would be the beginning of the end of an effective Western alliance. If the Soviets learn that we and our allies lack the will, in the face of missile-rattling, to carry out difficult decisions commonly arrived at, then we can look forward to ever more aggressive behavior each time we seek to respond to Soviet provocations.

I am convinced that negotiations will not end when our deployments begin. Indeed, while we will spare no effort to get an equitable agreement before we deploy, it may be that the Soviets will not negotiate in good faith until we prove that we will carry out our decision.

We have made a negotiating proposal that offers the Soviets what they want: the elimination of our Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles. We and our partners have made clear what we must have in return: The elimination of the Soviet missile threat to which our deployments are a response. It is a matter of principle to us—indeed, a matter of survival—that if there is a threat it must not go undeterred.

The only adequate deterrent to the Soviet threat to our European allies is an American deterrent present in Europe. Some in Western Europe profess to see some logic in the Soviet demand that European security be left to the Europeans, including themselves but excluding America. If there is one fundamental truth of the postwar era, it is that peace and freedom in Europe is possible only if American power is committed to offset Soviet power. British and French power alone cannot meet this requirement; our allies and the Soviets alike know this.

The Soviet objective—which is as evident in their negotiating proposals as it is in their missile buildup—is to place the democracies of Western Europe under a nuclear shadow, to push America back across the Atlantic, and to make the Soviet homeland a sanctuary.

The Soviets seek to appear reasonable and to make us appear unreasonable, in the hope of cracking alliance unity and destroying European resolve. If they stick to this aim they will be utterly disappointed. Far better that Yuri Andropov and his colleagues quickly come to understand what Leonid Brezhnev did not: that debate in the West is a reflection of our unique strength, not our weakness—and that when we say we will accept an equal agreement and nothing less, we mean it.

In the long run it does not serve Soviet interests to depend on disorder, subversion, and tyranny. It is said that the Soviets take the so-called "long view" of politics. The facts suggest that they do not. Their invasion of Afghanistan was short-sighted; they did not understand that the world would neither forget nor accept this crime. Their support for the war against freedom in Poland is short-sighted; they do not understand that the Polish people will never accept enslavement. Their repression of the Soviet Jewish community is short-sighted; they do not understand 2000 years of Jewish history and the will to survive. If Yuri Andropov and his colleagues would only come to accept the "long view" they would understand that no country can prosper if it depends only on military power; they would understand that no nation can be truly great that denies to its citizens the free practice of their religious and cultural heritage.

We stand ready to cooperate in arrangements that would reduce the differences between us, and bring the Soviets into the family of responsible nations. Ours is not an agenda for humiliating the Soviet Union. It is a formula for more cordial, constructive Soviet-American relations. Soviet leaders constantly complain that we do not give them the respect they deserve as a superpower, but the possession of great power carries with it special responsibilities, including the obligation to respect the rights of others, to show restraint, and to live up to universally-recognized standards of conduct. The Soviets cannot earn our respect by amassing and misusing power; they can earn it by responsible behavior.

What conclusions can be drawn from this analysis? You may well find reason for pessimism in my remarks. After all, my main themes would have been pertinent at almost any moment during the past 35 years.

We find ourselves in the position of the man in the small Jewish community in Eastern Europe in the last century whose job it was to sit at the village gate all day waiting for the approach of the Messiah. "Isn't your job boring?" someone asked. "Sure it's boring," he replied, "but at least the work is steady."

The work of trying to moderate Soviet conduct over the last three decades has been anything but boring. I wish that it might have been otherwise; international affairs could use a little more tedium.

But boring or exciting, we are determined to take the steps necessary to protect our friends and ourselves from aggressive Soviet conduct. We will maintain our alliances, despite the difficulties that such international partnerships always involve. We will sustain the balance of military power, despite the sacrifices that this imposes on our citizens and despite Soviet attempts to undermine popular support for this policy. And we will stand firm on our principles and steady in our position in disputes with the Soviets, although this taxes our patience and our national impulse for problem solving.

We are prepared to work with the Soviets in search of solutions to the problems between us, though we cannot ignore the fact that in most cases these problems are the result of Soviet misconduct. If the Soviets try in earnest to remove the obstacles to a better relationship, they will find us ready for relations of mutual respect, for cooperation in areas of mutual interest, and for ensuring that competition remains peaceful where our interests conflict.

To the extent that the Soviets continue to act as international outlaws, we will meet the challenges they present. The American people are committed to this course over the long term; not just for the life of this administration, but for as long as necessary. Like the job of standing at the village gate, we will bring steadiness and perseverance to the task of leading the West.

Whatever course the Soviet Union chooses to follow, we will work on our own and with our friends to build a world order compatible with our values and our interests. The U.S.S.R. is, admittedly, a major player on the world scene. But we must not be mesmerized by that fact. There are other issues—other weighty problems that we can and will deal with no matter what the Soviets do.

We will continue our efforts to revitalize the institutions of international economic cooperation, to spur recovery and promote domestic and international economic growth. We will continue our efforts to resolve dangerous conflicts. I need not remind this audience of our deep concern for peace in the Middle East. That concern is the basis for the President's September initiative. We are committed to the security of Israel within defensible borders; we will work for a peaceful, united Lebanon and a just resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. We will continue our global efforts to make the peaceful settlement of disputes the normal international practice. We will, as well, remain dedicated to the protection of human rights throughout the international community, a goal which is threaded throughout our entire foreign policy.

These endeavors will proceed with or without Soviet cooperation. These efforts must be made whatever the state of U.S.-Soviet relations. And the more peaceful, prosperous, and humane the international community becomes, the fewer opportunities there will be for Soviet mischief and the stronger the pressure on Soviet leaders to moderate their conduct and eventually accept a role as a great and responsible nation.

My message tonight is not a dramatic one. I cannot promise sweeping changes in U.S.-Soviet relations. There is no basis for such a promise. I cannot tell you when modest improvements will take place. That is up to the Soviets. And I must caution you that improvements, if they do come, are bound to be modest. We will not see the day of days with the Soviet Union. Our rivalry will, I fear, outlive all of us in this room. But we can hope, and work, to see days more tranquil, less heavy with menace, than those of the recent past.

Intention To Terminate Romania's Most-Favored-Nation Status

. . . . . .

MR. SPEAKES. . . . The President today is announcing the termination of the most-favored-nation status for Romania. [13] It's effective June 30th, 1983. If the education repayment decree of the Romanian—

Q. Go a little slower, please.

MR. SPEAKES. If the education repayment decree remains in effect for that date, the situation is this: That the government of Romania on October 22nd, 1982, announced a decree that would require immigrants to repay cost of their education before they can leave the country. This is contrary, in our opinion, to the letter and spirit of Section 402 of the 1974 Trade Act, the so-called Jackson-Vanik amendment. [14] We have informed the Romanian Government of our decision to do so. Basically, their decree calls for immigrants to repay to the state the cost of all education and training beyond the tenth grade level before they are allowed to leave the country.

The decree was announced November 1st, 1982, and the effective date—the wide-scale implementation began in February of this year. We regard this as a serious new barrier to immigration and we have raised this matter with the Romanians both before and after the decree was announced.

We believe that this cannot help but have a negative impact on our bilateral relations, but there are certain areas where mutual cooperation remains desirable and feasible, and it is in the interest of both countries to maintain as constructive a relationship as possible.

Q. Can you go back to "desirable," Larry?

MR. SPEAKES.—remains desirable and feasible, and it is in the interest of both countries to maintain as constructive a relationship as possible.

The Romanian exports to the United States in 1982 were valued at $400 million; in 1981, at $560 million. U.S. exports to Romania for those 2 years were about $225 million for '82 and $504 million for '81. The Commerce Department estimates that Romanian exports to the United States will fall by at least 50 percent in the first year after our MFN is terminated and that U.S. exports to Romania can expect similar declines.

We are prepared to recommend that we restore the MFN status to Romania if the Romanian Government stops implementing its decree and improves its immigration procedures. The number of emigrants, according to Romanian figures, in 1982 about 20,000 people received permission to emigrate. We believe that this decree will be, as I said, a serious impediment to immigration and is very likely to prevent many people from leaving who would have been able to do so before the decree was implemented.

Statement by President Reagan, May 1, 1983 [15]

"The Current Struggle and Travails of the People of Poland Are of Truly Historic Import to the Entire World"

More than 16 months ago the Polish Government began its campaign to stamp out the unprecedented achievements of Solidarnosc, the Solidarity Movement. In creating a genuinely free and independent trade union, Solidarity and Lech Walesa sparked renewed hope in the hearts of the Polish people for attaining the basic human values that movement seeks to uphold. Despite martial law, the legal abolition of Solidarity, and a continuing wave of suppression—carried out under intense Soviet pressure—the spirit of Solidarity still shines as a beacon of freedom to people around the globe. The plight of Solidarity's leaders and its ideals remains vividly real not only for its nearly ten million members, but among all those concerned with the dignity and liberty of a great people.

Today Poland stands at a crossroads. The Polish Government faces an alienated populace and an economy in ruins. But a policy of reconciliation, of permitting the Polish people a genuine voice in their own future could galvanize the energy and vision of this long-suffering nation to solve its economic problems and vigorously pursue a new and better life for all. As I said on December 10th of last year, [16] this administration will respond if the Polish Government introduces meaningful liberalization measures. But such steps cannot be merely cosmetic. They must represent real progress toward a restoration of the fundamental rights of the Polish people.

The current struggle and travails of the people of Poland are of truly historic import to the entire world. We will never be distracted from the significance of developments in that nation. What we have witnessed is a genuine struggle of workers in a so-called workers' state for basic human and economic rights. The Polish people have exposed the fundamental inequalities inherent in a Communist system and the falsehood of Communist claims that the workers are the true beneficiaries of a party-run state. Indeed, we salute the courage of the Poles who daily face intimidation and harassment. Their heroic resistance to their Government's attempts to suppress Solidarity serves as an inspiring display of the indomitable desire for freedom in the hearts of men and women everywhere.

We want the Polish people to know that the future of Poland and free trade unions is a matter of deep concern not only to the administration but to the American people, as your presence here today testifies. We pledge our solidarity with them and our vigilance for the restoration of human rights in that country.

Message From President Reagan to the Congress, June 3, 1983 (Extracts) [17]

Recommendation For Extension of Waiver Authority Under the Trade Act of 1974 for Hungary and Romania

I recommend to the Congress that the waiver authority granted by subsection 402(c) of the Trade Act of 1974 (hereinafter "the Act") be further extended for twelve months. Pursuant to subsection 402(d) (5) of the Act, I have today determined that further extension of such authority will substantially promote the objectives of section 402, and that continuation of the waivers currently applicable to the Hungarian People's Republic and the People's Republic of China will also substantially promote the objectives of section 402 of the Act. With respect to the Socialist Republic of Romania, I have today also determined that continuation of the waiver currently applicable to that country will substantially promote the objectives of section 402 of the Act. This determination is based on assurances provided by the Socialist Republic of Romania that it will no longer require reimbursement to the State of education costs as a precondition to emigration, and that it will not create economic or procedural barriers to emigration. My determination is attached to this Recommendation and is incorporated herein. [18]

The general waiver authority conferred by section 402(c) of the Act is an important means for the strengthening of mutually beneficial relations between the United States and certain countries of Eastern Europe and the People's Republic of China. The waiver authority has permitted us to conclude and maintain in force bilateral trade agreements with Romania, Hungary, and the People's Republic of China. These agreements continue to be fundamental elements in our political and economic relations with those countries, including our important productive exchanges on human rights and emigration matters. Moreover, continuation of the waiver authority might permit future expansion of our bilateral relations with other countries now subject to subsections 402(a) and (b) of the Act, should circumstances permit. I believe that these considerations clearly warrant this recommendation for renewal of the general waiver authority.

The source text is an attachment to President Reagan's letter of transmittal to the Congress. Omitted here is this cover letter, the section of his recommendation for extension of waiver authority for the People's Republic of China, and the Presidential determination contained in the President's memorandum to the Secretary of State, June 3, 1983.

I also believe that continuing the current waivers applicable to Hungary, the People's Republic of China and Romania will substantially promote the objectives of section 402 of the Act.

Hungary —Hungary continues to take a positive and constructive approach to emigration matters. The Hungarian record of the past year, during which all outstanding problem cases were resolved, was excellent. The number of Hungarian citizens who apply to leave Hungary remains small and emigration permission is granted apparently without undue difficulty. There are no sanctions imposed on those who seek to emigrate, nor do emigration procedures appear excessive.

Romania—Emigration from Romania to all countries has approximately doubled and emigration to the United States has increased sixfold since the granting of MFN to Romania in 1975.[19] In 1982, about 2,500 persons emigrated from Romania to the United States, while about 20,000 emigrated worldwide. This administration initiated discussions with the Government of Romania on the improvement of emigration procedures. The rate of Jewish emigration to Israel in the period September 1982 to March 1983 was nearly double that of the same period in 1981–82. I will continue to monitor closely Romania's performance in improving its emigration procedures and in the area of Jewish emigration to Israel.

Implementation in February, 1983, of the education repayment decree of November 1, 1982, imposed a requirement that any Romanian citizen wishing to emigrate must repay in convertible currency the costs of education received beyond the compulsory level (10 years of schooling). This requirement conflicts with the letter and spirit of section 402. For that reason, on March 4, 1983, I announced my intention to terminate MFN status for Romania on June 30, 1983, if the tax was still in force by that date.[20] Since that time, I have received assurances from the President of Romania that Romania will not require reimbursement to the State of education costs as a precondition to emigration, and that Romania will not create economic or procedural barriers to emigration. Based on these assurances and on the above-described emigration performance, I believe that continuation of the waiver applicable to Romania will substantially promote the objectives of the Act.

For the above reasons, I have determined that continuation of the waivers for Hungary, the People's Republic of China and the Socialist Republic of Romania will substantially promote the objectives of the Act.

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, June 15, 1983 (Extracts)[21]

U.S.-Soviet Relations in the Context of U.S. Foreign Policy

Thank you, Mr. Chairman,[22] distinguished members of this committee.

I appreciate the opportunity to meet with you and discuss our approach to United States-Soviet relations in the context of our broader foreign policy. As you have suggested, this has all sorts of dimensions to it that weigh on peoples' minds. And it is, of course, a subject that I have thought about a great deal.

[21] Source: United States-Soviet Relations: Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), Part I, pp. 3–11, 16–17. Omitted from Secretary Shultz's statement here is his assessment of the state of the U.S. dialog with the Soviet Union in the areas of human rights, arms control, regional issues, including Afghanistan and Southern Africa, and economic and other bilateral relations.

The President has not only taken the time to talk with me about this, but has read through this testimony and made a few suggestions, which I found it possible to accept, and has signed off on the testimony. I feel very confident in saying that I am speaking not only for myself, but for the President in this statement.

The management of our relations with the Soviet Union is of utmost importance. That relationship touches virtually every aspect of our international concerns and objectives, political, economic, and military, and every part of the world.

We must defend our interests and values against a powerful Soviet adversary that threatens both. And we must do so in a nuclear age, in which a global war would even more thoroughly threaten those interests and values. As President Reagan pointed out on March 31: "We must both defend freedom and preserve the peace. We must stand true to our principles and our friends while preventing a holocaust." It is, as he said, "one of the most complex moral challenges ever faced by any generation." [23]

We and the Soviets have sharply divergent goals and philosophies of political and moral order; these differences will not soon go away. Any other assumption is unrealistic. At the same time, we have a fundamental common interest in the avoidance of war. This common interest impels us to work toward a relationship between our nations that can lead to a safer world for all mankind.

But a safer world will not be realized through good will. Our hopes for the future must be grounded in a realistic assessment of the challenge we face and in a determined effort to create the conditions that will make their achievement possible. We have made a start. Every postwar American President has come sooner or later to recognize that peace must be built on strength. President Reagan has long recognized this reality.

In the past 2 years this Nation—the President in partnership with the Congress—has made a fundamental commitment to restoring its military and economic power and moral and spiritual strength. And having begun to rebuild our strength, we now seek to engage the Soviet leaders in a constructive dialog—a dialog through which we hope to find political solutions to outstanding issues.

This is the central goal we have pursued since the outset of this administration. We do not want to—and need not—accept as inevitable the prospect of endless, dangerous confrontation with the Soviet Union. For if we do, then many of the great goals that the United States pursues in world affairs—peace, human rights, economic progress, national independence—will also be out of reach. We can—and must—do better.

With that introduction, let me briefly lay out for this committee what I see as the challenge posed by the Soviet Union's international behavior in recent years and the strategy which that challenge requires of us. Then I would like to discuss steps this administration has taken to implement that strategy. Finally, I will focus on the specific issues that make up the agenda for United States-Soviet dialog and negotiation.

Together, these elements constitute a policy that takes account of the facts of Soviet power and of Soviet conduct, mobilizes the resources needed to defend our interests, and offers an agenda for constructive dialog to resolve concrete international problems. We believe that, if sustained, this policy will make international restraint Moscow's most realistic course, and can lay the foundation for a more constructive relationship between our peoples.

It is sometimes said that Americans have too simple a view of world affairs, that we start with the assumption that all problems can be solved. Certainly we have a simple view of how the world should be—free peoples choosing their own destinies, nurturing their prosperity, peaceably resolving conflicts. This is the vision that inspires America's role in the world. It does not, however, lead us to regard mutual hostility with the U.S.S.R. as an immutable fact of international life.

Certainly there are many factors contributing to East–West tension. The Soviet Union's strategic Eurasian location places it in close proximity to important Western interests on two continents. Its aspirations for greater international influence lead it to challenge these interests. Its Marxist-Leninist ideology gives its leaders a perspective on history and a vision of the future fundamentally different from our own. But we are not so deterministic as to believe that geopolitics and ideological competition must ineluctably lead to permanent and dangerous confrontation. Nor is it permanently inevitable that contention between the United States and the Soviet Union must dominate and distort international politics.

A peaceful world order does not require that we and the Soviet Union agree on all the fundamentals of morals or politics. It does require, however, that Moscow's behavior be subject to the restraint appropriate to living together on this planet in a nuclear age. Not all the many external and internal factors affecting Soviet behavior can be influenced by us. But we take it as part of our obligation to peace to encourage the gradual evolution of the Soviet system toward political and economic pluralism and above all to counter Soviet expansionism through sustained and effective political, economic, and military competition.

In the past decade, regrettably, the changes in Soviet behavior have been for the worse. Soviet actions have come into conflict with many of our objectives. They have made the task of managing the Soviet-American relationship considerably harder, and have needlessly drawn more and more international problems into the East-West rivalry.

To be specific, it is the following developments that have caused us the most concern.

First is the continuing Soviet quest for military superiority even in the face of mounting domestic economic difficulties. In the late 1970's the allocation of resources for the Soviet military was not only at the expense of the Soviet consumer. It came even at the expense of industrial investment on which the long-term development of the economy depends. This decision to mortgage the industrial future of the country is a striking demonstration of the inordinate value the Soviets assign to maintaining the momentum of the relentless military buildup under way since the mid-1960's. This buildup consumed an estimated annual average of at least 12 percent of Soviet GNP throughout this entire period, and has recently consumed even more as a result of the sharp decline in Soviet economic growth. During much of this same period, as you know, the share of our own GNP devoted to defense spending actually declined.

The second disturbing development is the unconstructive Soviet involvement, direct and indirect, in unstable areas of the Third World. Arms have become a larger percentage of Soviet exports than of the export trade of any other country. The Soviets have too often attempted to play a spoiling or scavenging role in areas of concern to us, most recently in the Middle East. Beyond this, the Soviets in the seventies broke major new ground in the kinds of foreign military intervention they were willing to risk for themselves or their surrogates. This has escalated from the provision of large numbers of military advisers, to the more extensive and aggressive use of the proxy forces as in Angola, Ethiopia, and Indochina, and finally to the massive employment of the Soviet Union's own ground troops in the invasion of Afghanistan. In this way, the Soviet Union has tried to block peaceful solutions and has brought East-West tensions into areas of the world that were once free of them.

Third is the unrelenting efforts to impose an alien Soviet "model" on nominally independent Soviet clients and allies. One of the most important recent achievements in East-West relations was the negotiation of the Helsinki Final Act, with its pledges concerning human rights and national independence in Europe. Poland's experience in the past 2 years can be considered a major test of the Soviet Union's respect—or lack of it—for these commitments. Moscow clearly remains unwilling to countenance meaningful national autonomy for its satellites, let alone real independence. Elsewhere in the world, the coming to power of Soviet-supported regimes has usually meant, as in Afghanistan, the forcible creation of Soviet-style institutions and the harsh regimentation and repression of free expression and free initiative—all at enormous human, cultural, and economic cost.

Fourth is Moscow's continuing practice of stretching a series of treaties and agreements to the brink of violation and beyond. The Soviet Union's infringement of its promises and legal obligations is not confined to isolated incidents. We have had to express our concerns about Soviet infractions on one issue after another—human rights and the Helsinki Final Act, yellow rain and biological warfare. We are becoming increasingly concerned about Soviet practices—including the recent testing of ICBM's—that raise questions about the validity of their claim of compliance with existing SALT agreements. Little else is so corrosive of international trust as this persistent pattern of Soviet behavior.

This assessment of Soviet international behavior both dictates the approach we must take to East–West relations, and indicates the magnitude of the task.

If we are concerned about the Soviet commitment to military power, we have to take steps to restore the military balance, preferably on the basis of verifiable agreements that reduce arms on both sides, but if necessary through our own and allied defense programs.

If we are concerned about the Soviet propensity to use force and promote instability, we have to make clear that we will resist encroachments on our vital interests and those of our allies and friends.

If we are concerned about the loss of liberty that results when Soviet clients come to power, then we have to insure that those who have a positive alternative to the Soviet model receive our support.

Finally, if we are concerned about Moscow's observance of its international obligations, we must leave Moscow no opportunity to distort or misconstrue our own intentions. We will defend our interests if Soviet conduct leaves us no alternative; at the same time we will respect legitimate Soviet security interests, and are ready to negotiate equitable solutions to outstanding political problems.

In designing a strategy to meet these goals, we have, of course, drawn in part on past strategies, from containment to détente. There is, after all, substantial continuity in U.S. policy, a continuity that reflects the consistency of American values and American interests. However, we have not hesitated to jettison assumptions about United States-Soviet relations that have been refuted by experience or overtaken by events.

Consider how the world has changed since the Truman administration developed the doctrine of containment. Soviet ambitions and capabilities have long since reached beyond the geographical bounds that this doctrine took for granted. Today Moscow conducts a fully global foreign and military policy that places global demands on any strategy that aims to counter it. Where it was once our goal to contain the Soviet presence within the limits of its immediate postwar reach, now our goal must be to advance our own objectives, where possible foreclosing and when necessary actively countering Soviet challenges wherever they threaten our interests.

The policy of détente, of course, represents an effort to induce Soviet restraint. While in some versions it recognized the need to resist Soviet geopolitical encroachments, it also hoped that the anticipated benefits of expanding economic relations and arms control agreements would restrain Soviet behavior.

Unfortunately, experience has proved otherwise. The economic relationship may have eased some of the domestic Soviet economic constraints that might have at least marginally inhibited Moscow's behavior. It also raised the specter of a future Western dependence on Soviet-bloc trade that would inhibit Western freedom of action toward the East more than it would dictate prudence to the U.S.S.R. Similarly, the SALT I and SALT II processes did not curb the Soviet strategic arms buildup, while encouraging many in the West to imagine that security concerns could now be placed lower on the agenda.

Given these differences from the past, we have not been able merely to tinker with earlier approaches. Unlike containment, our policy begins with the clear recognition that the Soviet Union is and will remain a global superpower. In response to the lessons of this global superpower's conduct in recent years, our policy, unlike some versions of détente, assumes that the Soviet Union is more likely to be deterred by actions that make clear the risks their aggression entails than by a delicate web of interdependence.

Our policy is not based on trust, or on a Soviet change of heart. It is based on the expectation that, faced with demonstration of the West's renewed determination to strengthen its defenses, enhance its political and economic cohesion, and oppose adventurism, the Soviet Union will see restraint as its most attractive, or only, option.

Perhaps, over time, this restraint will become an ingrained habit; perhaps not. Either way, our responsibility to be vigilant is the same.

In a rapidly evolving international environment, there are many fundamental ways the democratic nations can, and must, advance their own goals in the face of the problem posed by the Soviet Union. We must build a durable political consensus at home and within the Atlantic Alliance on the nature of the Soviet challenge. We must strengthen our defenses and those of our allies. We must build a common approach within the Alliance on the strategic implications of East-West economic relations. And we must compete peacefully and even more effectively with the U.S.S.R. for the political sympathies of the global electorate, especially through the promotion of economic dynamism and democracy throughout the world. Finally, we must continue rebuilding America's moral-spiritual strength. If sustained over time, these policies can foster a progressively more productive dialog with the Soviet Union itself.

From the beginning of this administration, the President recognized how essential it was to consolidate a new consensus, here at home and among our traditional allies and friends. After 15 years in which foreign policy had been increasingly a divisive issue, he believed we had an opportunity to shape a new unity in America, expressing the American people's recovery of self-confidence. After the trauma of Vietnam, he sought to bolster a realistic pride in our country and to reenforce the civil courage and commitment on which the credibility of our military deterrent ultimately rests.

The President also felt that the possibility of greater cooperation with our allies depended importantly on a reaffirmation of our common moral values and interests. There were, as well, opportunities for cooperation with friendly governments of the developing world and new efforts to seek and achieve common objectives.

President Reagan also began a major effort to modernize our military forces. The central goal of our national security policy is deterrence of war; restoring and maintaining the strategic balance is a necessary condition for that deterrence. But the strategic balance also shapes, to an important degree, the global environment in which the United States pursues its foreign policy objectives. Therefore, decisions on major strategic weapons systems can have profound political as well as military consequences.

As Secretary of State, I am acutely conscious of the strength or weakness of American power and its effect on our influence over events. Perceptions of the strategic balance are bound to affect the judgments not only of our adversaries but also of allies and friends around the world who rely on us. As leader of the democratic nations, we have an inescapable responsibility to maintain this pillar of the military balance which only we can maintain.

Our determination to do so is an important signal of our resolve, and is essential to sustaining the confidence of allies and friends and the cohesion of the alliances. This is why the Congress' support of the Peacekeeper ICBM program has been such a valuable contribution to our foreign policy, as well as to our defense.

At the same time, we have begun an accelerated program to strengthen our conventional capabilities. We are pursuing major improvements of our ground, naval, and tactical air forces; we have also added a new central command in the Middle East that will enhance our ability to deploy forces rapidly if threats to our vital interests make this necessary. To deter or deal with any future crisis, we need to maintain both our conventional capabilities and our strategic deterrent.

We are also working closely with our allies to improve our collective defense. As shown in the security declaration of the Williamsburg summit and in the North Atlantic Council communique of just the other day, [24] we and our allies are united in our approach in the INF negotiations in Geneva and remain on schedule for the deployment of Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles. That deployment will take place as planned unless we are able to reach a balanced and verifiable agreement at Geneva which makes deployment unnecessary.

Upgrading NATO's conventional forces is, of course, a collective alliance responsibility. At the NATO summit in Bonn a year ago, the President and the leaders of the Atlantic alliance reaffirmed that a credible conventional defense is essential to ensuring European security. We and our allies will continue our efforts toward this goal. At the same time, we have taken steps to ensure a more equitable sharing of the burden of that defense. As a measure of the value of such steps, we estimate that last year's agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany on host-nation support will cost about 10 percent of what it would cost to provide the same capability with U.S. reserves or 3 percent of what it would cost to provide that capability with active forces. [25]

The Soviets apparently believe they can weaken or divide the Western alliance if they can dominate outlying strategic areas and resources. To deter threats to our vital interests outside of Europe, we are developing our ability to move forces, supported by our allies, to key areas of the world such as southwest Asia. The allies are also working with us to contribute to stability and security in certain volatile areas, including Lebanon and the Sinai.

In Asia we are modernizing our forces and are working with our allies, especially Japan and Korea, to improve their ability to fulfill agreed roles and missions.

The balance of power cannot be measured simply in terms of military forces or hardware; military power rests on a foundation of economic strength. Thus, we and our allies must not only strengthen our own economies but we must also develop a common approach to our economic relations with the Soviet Union that takes into account our broad strategic and security interests.

In the past, the nations of the West have sometimes helped the Soviets to avoid difficult economic choices by allowing them to acquire a militarily relevant technology and subsidized credits. Possible dependence on energy imports from the Soviet Union is another cause for concern.

In the past year, we have made substantial progress toward an allied consensus on East-West trade. The Williamsburg summit declaration stated clearly: "East-West economic relations should be compatible with our security interests." [26] The NATO communiqué 2 days ago made a similar statement. Our allies agree with us that trade which makes a clear and direct contribution to the military strength of the Soviet Union should be prohibited. There is also general agreement that economic relations with the U.S.S.R. should be conducted on the basis of a strict balance of mutual advantages.

Studies undertaken under NATO and OECD auspices have for the first time laid the groundwork for common analyses. We expect in time to draw common policy conclusions from these studies. The communiqué of the OECD ministerial meeting on May 9 and 10 declared that "East-West trade and credit flows should be guided by the indications of the market. In the light of these indications, governments should exercise financial prudence without granting preferential treatment." [27]

The United States seeks agreement that we not subsidize Soviet imports through the terms of government credits. Beyond this, we urge other Western governments to exercise restraint in providing or guaranteeing credit to the Soviet Union, allowing the commercial considerations of the market to govern credit.

Similarly, at the IAE [IEA] ministerial meeting in Paris on May 8, it was agreed that security concerns should be considered among the full costs of imported energy, such as gas; it was agreed that countries "would seek to avoid undue dependence on any one source of gas imports and to obtain future gas supplies from secure sources, with emphasis on indigenous OECD sources."

The fruitful cooperative discussions of these issues at the OECD, IEA, Williamsburg, and NATO are only a beginning. Economic relationships are a permanent element of the strategic equation. How the West should respond economically to the Soviet challenge will and should be a subject of continuing discussion in Western forums for years to come.

Since the 1950's, the Soviet Union has found in the developing regions of the Third World its greatest opportunities for extending its influence through subversion and exploitation of local conflicts. A satisfactory East-West military balance will not by itself close off such opportunities. We must also respond to the economic, political, and security problems that contribute to these opportunities. Our approach has four key elements.

First, in the many areas where Soviet activities have added to instability, we are pursuing peaceful diplomatic solutions to regional problems, to raise the political cost of Soviet-backed military presence, and to encourage the departure of Soviet-backed forces. Our achievements in the Middle East, while far from complete, are addressed to this goal; we are actively encouraging ASEAN efforts to bring about Vietnamese withdrawal from Kampuchea; we strongly support the worldwide campaign for Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan; and we have made considerable progress toward an internationally acceptable agreement on Namibia. In our own hemisphere, we are working with other regional states in support of a peaceful solution to the conflict and instability in Central America.

Second, we are building up the security capabilities of vulnerable governments in strategically important areas. We are helping our friends to help themselves and to help each other. For this purpose, we are asking the Congress for a larger, more flexible security assistance program for fiscal year 1984. That has a budgetary implication.

Third, our program recognizes that economic crisis and political instability create fertile ground for Soviet-sponsored adventurism. We are seeking almost $4 billion in economic assistance to help developing countries lay the basis for economic and social progress. We are seeking congressional approval to raise IMF quotas and broaden IMF borrowing arrangements to address critical financial needs of some of the largest Third World nations. We urge the Congress to approve the full amount requested by the administration toward meeting the U.S. commitment to the IDA.

Finally, there is the Democracy Initiative, an effort to assist our friends in the Third World to build a foundation for democracy. It is patronizing to assume that the peoples of the developing world do not have the same aspirations for liberty and democracy that peoples in the industrialized West are fortunate enough to enjoy. Therefore we are seeking ways to assist unions, political parties, journalists, and other groups that are striving to build pluralistic societies and democratic institutions. As we pursue critical security goals in areas as close to home as Central America, we continue to encourage, indeed to insist, that democratization and respect for human rights be part of the process. To the extent that our involvement there is constrained by congressional action, I must say, these very objectives are harmed the most.

Let me note here that the Soviet reaction to this project, which is very small, has been fascinating. When we held a meeting in the State Department of people from various parts of the world on the subject of free elections, it was denounced by the Soviet Union.[28] The interesting thing was, they noticed it. I was also struck by the fact that in Mr. Chernenko's speech yesterday, he attached such importance to destroying President Reagan's Democracy Initiative.[29] It seems we have their attention. If we can put the East–West competition on an ideological basis or on the basis of alternative economic systems, we will walk away with it.

Together, these programs increase our political, military, and economic strength and help create an international climate in which opportunities for Soviet adventurism are reduced. They are essential for the success of the final element of our strategy—engaging the Soviets in an active and productive dialog on the concrete issues that concern the two sides. Strength and realism can deter war, but only direct dialog and negotiation can open the path toward lasting peace.

In this dialog, our agenda is as follows: To seek improvement in Soviet performance on human rights, which you emphasized, Mr. Chairman, in your opening statement; to reduce the risk of war, reduce armaments through sound agreements, and ultimately ease the burdens of military spending; to manage and resolve regional conflicts; and to improve bilateral relations on the basis of reciprocity and mutual interest.

This is a rigorous and comprehensive agenda, and our approach to it is principled, practical, and patient. We have pressed each issue in a variety of forums, bilateral and multilateral. We have made clear that the concerns we raise are not ours alone, but are shared by our allies and friends in every region of the globe. We have made clear that each of our concerns is serious. The Soviets know that we do not intend to abandon any of them merely because agreement cannot be reached quickly, or because agreement has been reached on others.

It is sometimes said that Soviet-American relations are worse than ever. Certainly the issues dividing our two countries are serious. But let us not be misled by atmospherics, whether sunny or, as they now seem to be, stormy.

In the mid-1950's, for example, despite the rhetoric and tension of the cold war, and in the midst of a leadership transition, the Soviet Union chose to conclude the Austrian State Treaty. It was an important agreement which contributed to the security of Central Europe, and it carries an important lesson for us today. The Soviet leadership did not negotiate seriously merely because Western rhetoric was firm and principled, nor should we expect rhetoric to suffice now or in the future. But adverse atmospherics did not prevent agreement; Soviet policy was instead affected by the pattern of Western actions, by our resolve and clarity of purpose. And the result was progress.

There is no certainty that our current negotiations with the Soviets will lead to acceptable agreements. What is certain is that we will not find ourselves in the position in which we found ourselves in the aftermath of détente. We have not staked so much on the prospect of a successful negotiating outcome that we have neglected to secure ourselves against the possibility of failure. Unlike the immediate postwar period, when negotiating progress was a remote prospect, we attach the highest importance to articulating the requirements for an improved relationship and to exploring every serious avenue for progress. Our parallel pursuit of strength and negotiation prepares us both to resist continued Soviet aggrandizement and to recognize and respond to positive Soviet moves.

We have spelled out our requirements, and our hopes, for a more constructive relationship with the Soviet Union. The direction in which that relationship evolves will ultimately be determined by the decisions of the Soviet leadership. President Brezhnev's successors will have to weigh the increased costs and risks of relentless competition against the benefits of a less tense international environment in which they could more adequately address the rising expectations of their own citizens. While we can define their alternatives, we cannot decipher their intentions. To a degree unequaled anywhere else, Russia in this respect remains a secret.

Her history, of which this secrecy is such an integral part, provides no basis for expecting a dramatic change. And yet it also teaches that gradual change is possible. For our part, we seek to encourage change by a firm but flexible U.S. strategy, resting on a broad consensus that we can sustain over the long term whether the Soviet Union changes or not. If the democracies can meet this challenge, they can achieve the goals of which President Reagan spoke at Los Angeles: both defend freedom and preserve the peace.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Address by President Reagan Before Representatives of the Polish-American Community, Chicago, June 23, 1983 [30]

"I Urge the Polish Authorities To Translate the Restraint They Showed During the Papal Visit Into Willingness To Move Toward Reconciliation Rather Than Confrontation With the Polish People"

Thank you. Thank you. And thank you, Al Mazewski. [31] As a matter of fact, I would have rather just stood there and listened to you some more—(laughter)—come up here and talk. Father Pajak, Senator Percy and I know your Secretary of State is here, Jim Edgar, you, ladies and gentlemen, the distinguished guests who are here, our country is composed of many cultures, races and ethnic groups. But there's one thing we all have in common, something that ties us together as one people and is at the very heart of our national character and that is a fervent love of liberty.

And I've found that I can't lean on this on account of if I do it sinks. (Laughter) So I'll stop leaning.

It's this heartfelt conviction that today finds us, not just Polish Americans, but all Americans—(applause). And it binds us with those who struggle for freedom and independence in Poland.

Let no one mistake our fortitude. Time may pass, but the American people will never, never forget the brave people of Poland and their courageous struggle. (Applause) It seems like only yesterday when all of us were so filled with hope. Solidarity, a truly independent labor union, had emerged. And with it came new recognition of freedoms of speech, press and the right to free association to strike and to reap the fruit of one's labor.

Perhaps nothing more clearly demonstrates the repressive and insecure nature of communism than the tremor felt throughout the Communist world as a result of Polish workers and citizens exercising inalienable human rights, the rights that are so fundamental to free Western societies and that we too often take for granted.

Solidarity was born not only of the failure of the Polish Government to meet the needs of its people, but also from a noble tradition of freedom preserved and nourished by the proud Polish people through two centuries of foreign and domestic tyranny.

Symbolizing the battle of real workers to sustain fundamental human and economic rights in a so-called worker's state, Solidarity sought to address and to resolve Poland's deep-rooted economic ills. It acted in good faith and it pursued a path of constructive dialogue with the Polish Government. Despite these peaceful efforts on the part of Solidarity, a brutal wave of repression descended on Poland on December 13th, 1981.

The imposition of martial law stripped away all vestiges of the newborn freedom. Polish authorities resorted to arbitrary arrests, imprisonment, and the use of force. The free flow of people, ideas, and information was suppressed. A darkened cloud descended on Poland. But not all has been darkness.

Despite the unyielding repression for the last 18 months, the will of the Polish people has not yet been broken and we've seen that on television over these last several days. And the Papal visit to Poland which ends today is truly a ray of hope for the Polish people and an event of historic importance. [32] (Applause)

The President spoke at 10:20 a.m. outside the Polish National Alliance Hall. The source text is the text as delivered.

[32] Reference is to the visit of Pope John Paul II to Poland from June 16 to 23, 1983, where he visited, among other places, Warsaw, Poznan, Katowice, Wroclaw, Cracow, and Zakopane. During his visit the Pope had meetings with General Wojciech Jaruzelski, Polish Prime Minister and Defense Minister, and met briefly with Solidarity leader Lech Walesa.

During these 8 short days, the Pope's message of hope and faith has helped to inspire millions of Poles to continue their struggle to regain the human rights taken from them by the Polish authorities on December 13th.[33] (Applause)

I was deeply moved, as I know you were, by the Pope's outspoken defense of the Polish people's human rights. His frequent statements of support for the interned, the imprisoned, and those dismissed from work for their political activities were poignant reminders to the Jaruzelski regime and the Soviets that they cannot hope to permanently erase the historic August accords.[34]

Freedom loving people everywhere support His Holiness' call for social renewal, social justice, and reaffirmation of national sovereignty. I've long felt that many, if not all, of the problems faced by the Polish people could be resolved if Warsaw's neighbors would permit that beleaguered nation to work them out undisturbed. (Applause) And you're aware of the neighbor particularly that we're talking about. (Applause)

I've developed a new hobby. It is one of finding and then verifying from some of the dissidents who are here in our country, who have escaped, the jokes that the Russian people are telling among themselves which shows their cynicism about their own government. And one of the recent ones is that they were saying that if the Soviet Union let another political party come into existence, they would still be a one-party state because everybody would join the other party. (Laughter) (Applause)

I have to tell you the latest one that I have found is so typical. And this, too, is of the Soviet Union and its failures. The story is that a commissar visited a collective farm, and grabbed one of the workers to talk to him and said, "How are things here?" "Oh," he said, "everything is just wonderful." He said, "There are no complaints, haven't heard a single complaint." "Well," he said, "how are the crops?" "Oh," he said, "the crops—never better, everything just fine." "What about potatoes?" he said. "Potatoes," he said, "if we piled them up in one pile, they'd reach the foot of God." (Laughter) And the commissar said, "This is the Soviet Union. There is no God." (Laughter) He said, "That's all right; there are no potatoes." (Laughter) (Applause)

But seriously, the need for dialogue and reconciliation in Poland has never been more evident than it was during the Pope's visit. The gulf separating the Polish people from their government remains vast. And nothing showed this more clearly than the faces, the words, and the signs carried by the millions of Poles who traveled great distances to see and hear the Pope. His call on the need to find a humane way for a peaceful and rational solution to the conflict offers the only prospect of bridging this gap between the people and their government.

I suspect that the Polish people are even more ready in the aftermath of his visit to begin a dialogue. But the real question is not the willingness of the Polish people, but that of the Warsaw government. I urge the Polish authorities to translate the restraint they showed during the Papal visit into willingness to move toward reconciliation rather than confrontation with the Polish people. (Applause)

I was, also, impressed by the Pope's words on the importance of free trade unions, and his quote of Cardinal Wyszynski—the comment that there is an innate right to form free associations and that the State's only role is to protect it, to protect that right. (Applause)

The actions of the millions of Poles who attended the masses around the country, inspiring the spirit which gave rise to Solidarity still flourishes in Polish hearts. There is only one way for the Polish Government to gain the confidence and trust of its own people. And that is to end martial law, to release political prisoners—(applause)—to restore freely formed trade unions, and to embark on a path of genuine, national reconciliation. (Applause)

We are currently consulting with our allies on the Polish question. Once these consultations are complete, we'll decide on how to proceed in our relations with Warsaw. In the meantime, I would only repeat what I said in my December 10th speech. "If the Polish Government takes meaningful, liberalizing measures, we are prepared to take equally significant and concrete steps of our own." [28] (Applause) Moreover, the United States will continue to provide humanitarian assistance to the Polish people. I know the great sacrifices which so many of you and the Polish-American community have been making to send assistance in the form of food and medical supplies.

We, too, have participated in this humanitarian effort with more than $40 million worth of aid distributed through CRS and CARE. As I've said before, if the Polish Government will honor the commitments it has made to basic human rights, we in America will gladly do our share to help the shattered Polish economy just as we helped the countries of Europe after both World Wars. (Applause)

I've talked of freedom. We've talked of freedom many times. Many of you have seen first-hand there, in visits to relatives, or in being there before you came here, what is going on. But to many of us, freedom becomes a word, and particularly to our young people. They hear it so often. And they don't have an opportunity to know what is so important about that word.

And just a few days ago I received a letter from a woman who has just returned from a visit to relatives in Poland. And yet it was her first visit there. And she said, "I felt that I owed you this letter. Until 3 weeks ago I supported a nuclear freeze and arms reduction," and she went on with some of the other things. But, she says, "not any more. Not after what I've seen."

I'll only read a few paragraphs. She said: "Poland is a concentration camp encircled by the same double strands of barbed wire that is displayed at Auschwitz and Buchenwald—camps so atrocious they have been preserved so that we shall never forget and never permit this sort of thing to happen again. But it is happening today in the great nationstate of Poland. The fear in the faces of men, women and children is also a reminder of things past. People speak in whispers, look over their shoulders constantly. And a few brave young people will tell you that people still disappear daily from their jobs and their homes. As an American observer, I see little difference between the gestapo and the KGB." (Applause)

She goes on eloquently about other things there that she's seen—the differences. She says, "I, too, support human rights. I was in Warsaw and Krakow. And I was asked by the people there if people in America understood what was happening in Poland under Russian domination. I said, no. No, because we don't know fear, oppression, religious censorship. We have never known the hopelessness that comes from living under a dictatorship. If there could only be one protest march in Poland today, Mr. President, it would not be for arms reduction or jobs or food or even clothing. But rather for the most prized and valued fundamental right of all—of every living soul in this universe: freedom." (Applause)

And then she asked that we keep that light of freedom burning here, because the whole world is watching and living by its glow. The visit by John Paul II to his homeland was an inspiration to all who cherish freedom. It vividly showed that no one can crush the spirit of the Polish people. (Applause) In the moving words of the Polish National Anthem: "Poland has not died while we yet live," are more true today than ever. The spirit of solidarity that unites the Polish people with free people everywhere has never been stronger.

I thank you for letting me be with you this brief time here today. God bless you all. And we shall stay together and we'll let Poland be Poland. (Applause) Thank you.

Statement by President Reagan, July 19, 1983 [36]

Twenty-fifth Annual Observance Ceremony of Captive Nations Week

Thank you very much. Thank you. You know, I have to apologize here for keeping you waiting. And I always wonder if there isn't some way, without making it sound that way, if in that announcement they couldn't say "the late President"—(laughter)—of the United States.

But thank you all very much and members of the Congress and Excellencies here and fellow Americans, and may I add, fellow citizens of the world who yearn to breathe free, we're honored to welcome all of you. I'd like to thank Congressman Jerry Solomon for his strong support of this event.

And today we come to show solidarity with our brothers and sisters who are captives, not because of crimes that they have committed but because of crimes committed against them by dictators and tyrants.

We met here last month with a group of Baltic Americans honoring Baltic Freedom Day.[37] And I said that we gathered to draw attention to the plight of the Baltic people and to affirm to the world that we do not recognize their subjugation as a permanent condition. (Applause)

Today, we speak to all in Eastern Europe who are separated from neighbors and loved ones by an ugly iron curtain. And to every person trapped in tyranny, whether in the Ukraine, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Cuba or Vietnam, we send our love and support and tell them they are not alone. (Applause) Our message must be: Your struggle is our struggle. Your dream is our dream. And someday, you, too, will be free. (Applause)

As Pope John Paul told his beloved Poles, we are blessed by divine heritage. We are children of God and we cannot be slaves. (Applause)

The Prophet Isaiah admonished the world, " . . . bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives." Some 25 centuries later, philosophers would declare that "the cause of freedom is the cause of God." We Americans understand the truth of these words. We were born a nation under God, sought out by people who trusted in Him to work His will in their daily lives, so America would be a land of fairness, morality, justice and compassion.

Many governments oppress their people and abuse human rights. We must oppose this injustice. But only one so-called revolution puts itself above God, insists on total control over the people's lives, and is driven by the desire to seize more and more lands. As we mark this 25th observance of Captive Nations Week, I have one question for those rulers: If communism is the wave of the future, why do you still need walls to keep people in, and armies of secret police to keep them quiet? (Applause)

Democracy may not be perfect, but the brave people who risk death for freedom are not fleeing from democracy. They're fleeing to democracy from communism.

Two visions of the world remain locked in dispute. The first believes all men are created equal by a loving God who has blessed us with freedom. Abraham Lincoln spoke for us: "No man," he said, "is good enough to govern another, without the other's consent."

The second vision believes that religion is opium for the masses. It believes that eternal principles like truth, liberty, and democracy have no meaning beyond the whim of the state. And Lenin spoke for them: "It is true, that liberty is precious," he said, "so precious that it must be rationed." (Laughter)

Well, I'll take Lincoln's version over Lenin's. (Laughter) (Applause) And so will citizens of the world, if they're given free choice. Now some believe we must muffle our voices for the cause of peace. I disagree. Peace is made, or broken, with deeds, not words.

No country has done more, or will strive harder for peace, than the United States. And I will personally embrace any meaningful action by the Soviet Union to help us create a more peaceful, safe and secure world. I welcome the Soviet pledge of cooperation at the Madrid Review Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.[38] With every ounce of my being I pray the day will come when nuclear weapons no longer exist anywhere on earth. And as long as I'm President, we'll work day-in-and-day-out to achieve mutual and verifiable reductions in strategic weapons.

When Congress approved the MX Peacekeeper program last May, America demonstrated its bipartisan consensus to implement the recommendations of the Scowcroft Commission.[39] This bipartisan step marked progress toward genuine arms reductions.

In the next few days, the Congress will vote on the question of supreme importance: Do we continue forward, or do we turn back from the Scowcroft Commission's recommendations? In terms of speaking to the world with one, bipartisan voice, of standing up for U.S. vital interests, and of strengthening America's agenda for peace, no question matters more for this country in 1983.

Rather than seek temporary, partisan advantage, let us work together for the future of mankind. We must not waver in our request for genuine peace and cooperation. We must keep our military strong to deter aggression. And we will never shrink from speaking the truth.

Ask yourselves: Was it our words that destroyed peace in Afghanistan, or was it Soviet aggression? Is peace served by sealing our lips while millions are tortured or killed in Vietnam and Cambodia? Or should we not speak out to demand those crimes be stopped? It's not provocative to warn that, once a Communist revolution occurs, citizens are not permitted free elections, a free press, free trade, free unions, free speech, freedom to worship, or property, or freedom to travel as we please.

Many military regimes have evolved into democracies. But no Communist regime has ever become a democracy, provided freedom or given its people economic prosperity.

We will speak the truth. Alexander Herzen, the Russian writer, warned: "To shrink from saying a word in defense of the oppressed is as bad as any crime." That's why we want improved and expanded broadcasts over the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe—(applause)—Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. And that's why we want, and the Cuban people need, Radio Marti. (Applause) Now, many of you here have known the suffering that I've described. You are the conscience of the free world. And I appeal to you to make your voices heard. Tell them: "You may jail your people, you may seize their goods. You may ban their unions, you may bully their rabbis and dissidents. You may forbid the name Jesus to pass their lips, but you will never destroy the love of God and freedom that burns in their hearts. They will triumph over you." (Applause)

Help us warn the American people that, for the first time in memory, we face real dangers on our own borders, that we must protect the safety and security of our people. We must not permit outsiders to threaten the United States. We must not permit dictators to ram communism down the throats of one Central American country after another. (Applause)

We've seen construction in Cuba of a naval base from which Soviet nuclear submarines can operate. We see Soviet capacity for air reconnaissance over our Eastern coast from Cuban bases.

And we see the Soviets and Cuba building a war machine in Nicaragua that dwarfs the forces of all their neighbors combined. Let's not fool ourselves: this war machine isn't being built to make Central America safe for democracy. It isn't being built to pursue peace, economic or social reform.

It's being built, by their own boasts, to impose a revolution without frontiers.

Now, this is not my problem. It's our problem. But if we pull together, we can solve it. As I announced yesterday, I'm appointing a bipartisan commission on Central America.[40] And let us resolve today: there must be no more captive nations in this hemisphere. (Applause)

With faith as our guide, we can muster the wisdom and will to protect the deepest treasures of the human spirit—the freedom to build a better life in our time and the promise of life everlasting in His kingdom.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn told us, "Our entire earthly existence is but a transitional stage in the movement toward something higher, and we must not stumble and fall, nor must we linger . . . on one rung of the ladder."

With your help, we will stand shoulder to shoulder, and we'll keep our sights on the farthest stars.

Thank you very much and God bless you. (Applause)

Statement by the President's Principal Deputy Press Secretary (Speakes), July 28, 1983[41]

United States–Soviet Union Grain Agreement

Ambassador William E. Brock, U.S. Trade Representative, and Secretary of Agriculture, John R. Block, announced today that the United States and the USSR have reached agreement in principle on a new Long-Term Grain Agreement (LTA).[42] The Agreement will commence October 1, 1983, and will cover 5 years.

Under its terms, the USSR will purchase from the United States 9 million metric tons of grain annually in approximately equal quantities of wheat and corn. Up to 1 million metric tons of the minimum could be satisfied by Soviet purchases of 500,000 metric tons of soybean and/or soybean meal. If this soybean/soybean meal option is exercised in any year, the minimum of wheat and corn for that year will be 8 million metric tons. During any year of the Agreement, the Soviet Union may purchase 3 million metric tons of wheat and corn in addition to the minimum of 9 million metric tons without prior consultation.

The general framework of the new Agreement follows that of the original LTA that was signed in 1975.[43]

The Agreement was reached on July 28 in Vienna during the third round of negotiations regarding a new LTA.[44] The U.S. negotiating team was lead by Ambassador Robert E. Lighthizer, Deputy U.S. Trade Representative. Daniel G. Amstutz, Undersecretary of the Department of Agriculture, was the senior official for the USDA on the team. Formal signing of the Agreement will take place in late August.

The current Agreement that expires on September 30, 1983, called for a minimum annual purchase of 6 million metric tons of wheat and corn by the USSR, and provided an option for the Soviet Union to purchase an additional 2 million metric tons per year. The original Agreement

To this end, during the period that this agreement is in force, except as otherwise agreed by the Parties, the Soviet foreign trade organizations shall purchase from private commercial sources, for shipment in each twelve-month period beginning October 1, 1983, nine million metric tons of wheat and corn grown in the USA; in doing so, the Soviet foreign trade organizations, if interested, may purchase, on account of the said quantity, soybeans and/or soybean meal produced in the USA, in the proportion of one ton of soybeans and/or soybean meal for two tons of grain. In any case, the minimum annual quantities of wheat and corn shall be no less than four million metric tons each.

The Soviet foreign trade organizations may increase the nine million metric tons quantity mentioned above without consultations by as much as three million metric tons of wheat and/or corn for shipment in each twelve-month period beginning October 1, 1983.

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of State (Shultz), September 1, 1983 [48]

Destruction of Korean Airlines Plane by Soviet Fighter Plane

MR. JOHN HUGHES. Good morning. The Secretary of State will have a statement on the shooting down of a Korean airliner and will take one or two questions before he has to leave. Assistant Secretary Burt and I will be back here at the midday briefing and will offer you any further information we have. [49]

The Secretary of State.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. At 1400 hours Greenwich mean time yesterday, a Korean Airlines Boeing 747 enroute from New York to Seoul, Korea, departed Anchorage, Alaska. 269 passengers and crew were on board, including Congressman Lawrence P. MacDonald.

At approximately 1600 hours Greenwich mean time, the aircraft came to the attention of Soviet radar. It was tracked constantly by the Soviets from that time.

The aircraft strayed into Soviet airspace over the Kamchatka Peninsula and over the Sea of Okhotsk, and over the Sakhalin Island. The Soviets tracked the commercial airliner for some 2 1/2 hours.

A Soviet pilot reported visual contact with the aircraft at 1812 hours. The Soviet plane was, we know, in constant contact with its ground control.

At 1821 hours the Korean aircraft was reported by the Soviet pilot at 10,000 meters. At 1826 hours the Soviet pilot reported that he fired a missile and the target was destroyed.

At 1830 hours the Korean aircraft was reported by radar at 5,000 meters. At 1838 hours the Korean plane disappeared from the radar screen.

We know that at least eight Soviet fighters reacted at one time or another to the airliner. The pilot who shot the aircraft down reported after the attack that he had in fact fired a missile, that he had destroyed the target, and that he was breaking away.

About an hour later Soviet controllers ordered a number of their search aircraft to conduct search and rescue activity in the vicinity of the last position of the Korean airliner reflected by Soviet tracking. One of these aircraft reported finding kerosene on the surface of the seas in that area.

During Wednesday [50] night, United States State Department officials, particularly Assistant Secretary Burt, were in contact with Soviet officials, seeking information concerning the airliner's fate. The Soviets offered no information.

As soon as U.S. sources had confirmed the shooting down of the aircraft, the United States on its own behalf and on behalf of the Republic of Korea, called in the Soviet Chargé d'Affaires in Washington this morning to express our grave concern over the shooting down of an unarmed civilian plane carrying passengers of a number of nationalities. We also urgently demanded an explanation from the Soviet Union.

The United States reacts with revulsion to this attack. Loss of life appears to be heavy. We can see no excuse whatsoever for this appalling act.

Q. Mr. Secretary, will this make any difference in the way the United States deals with the Soviet Union? For example, your meeting with Foreign Minister Gromyko? [51]

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I certainly will want to meet with Foreign Minister Gromyko and hear what he has to say about this. Of course, we expect to hear from the Soviet Union long before that.

Q. Mr. Secretary, was the United States in touch with Moscow at all on the hot line or any Presidential contact in this case?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No. This information that we have has come into our hands after the shooting down of this plane.

Q. Have you spoken to the President about this matter, and what does he say?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I haven't spoken to the President as yet—

Q. Mr. Secretary, could you tell us, was there any warning given by the Soviets?

SECRETARY SHULTZ.—but I should say the President is fully informed, and I've talked with the West Coast, [52] and the President knows all about this and has been kept fully informed. I haven't personally spoken to him.

Q. Mr. Secretary, can you tell us, did the Soviet Union give any warning to this aircraft and request it to land or try to force it down before it shot it down?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We have no evidence of that. There was apparently no ability to communicate between the two aircraft; but as the statement says, the Soviet plane that shot the commercial airliner down moved itself into position where it had visual contact with the aircraft, so that with the eye you could inspect the aircraft and see what it was you were looking at.

Q. Do we know whether the Soviet sought to force the KAL plane down without using missiles?

[51] Reference is to Secretary Shultz's scheduled meeting with Gromyko at the meeting of the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe at Madrid on September 7 and 8, 1983.

[52] President Reagan was vacationing at the time at Rancho del Cielo, his ranch near Santa Barbara, California.

READEX FICHE

SECRETARY SCHULTZ. We have no information about that. And as I said, as far as we can see there was no communication between the two aircraft except that they did track this aircraft for 2 1/2 hours; at least eight fighters at one time or another were around in the vicinity, and the aircraft that shot the plane down was close enough for visual inspection of the aircraft.

Q. Were they aware, sir, of any particular kind of Soviet military exercises or maneuvers or super-sophisticated radar that might have been in the area and that they had warned everybody to stay away from it?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No.

Q. Is there any explanation that you could offer for this?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We have no explanation to offer. We can see no explanation whatever for shooting down an unarmed commercial airliner, no matter whether it's in your airspace or not.

Q. Are you suggesting that the decision to shoot this plane down was made at a fairly high level since they were tracking it a long time?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I'm relating the facts as we have them at this point, and I can't go beyond the facts that I have here. I'm not going to speculate about it. I'm trying to put forward the facts as we know them and to tell you the United States Government's attitude and my own attitude toward the shooting down of an unarmed commercial airliner.

Q. My question was going to be, sir, if you had any sense as to whether there could be any political motivation for this beyond what you know already?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I can't imagine any political motivation for shooting down an unarmed airliner.

Transcript of the Department of State Daily Press Briefing, September 1, 1983 (Extract) [53]

. . . . . .

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BURT. Thanks, John. I do not have anything new to add to what the Secretary of State said earlier this morning [54] other than the fact that the President has been in touch with the Secretary of State—he called the Secretary of State a few minutes ago, and they discussed the situation. So I will take your questions.

Q. Rick, do you know how many Americans were aboard?

A. We do not have, at this stage, a precise number of Americans. We are, of course, looking into that right now—the State Department Operations Center, together with other U.S. officials.

Q. Rick, can you take us through the blow-by-blow starting with last night, your contacts with the Soviets?

A. We were alerted, I think, approximately between 10 or 10:30, that the aircraft in question was off course and was no longer in radar or radio communications. At that time, as you probably know, there were conflicting reports about its status. There was a suggestion that the aircraft had been forced down, and that it had landed on Sakhalin Island. In fact, some Korean airline authorities actually made public statements to that effect. There were other indications that much more tragic circumstances had taken place.

[53] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. The briefing, which began at 12:15 p.m., was conducted by John Hughes, Department of State Spokesman. Hughes introduced Richard R. Burt, who conducted the portion printed here on the KAL incident.

At approximately 11 or 11:30 at the State Department Operations Center a working group was quickly formed of U.S. officials, State Department officials and the Department of Defense official who normally serves in the Operations Center. As it became increasingly apparent that the report that the plane had been forced down was not accurate, or that we could not confirm that report, we got into direct contact with the Soviet Chargé, Oleg Sokolov, here in Washington—I got on the phone and woke him up, explained the situation, and told him that we insisted on an explanation or any information they could give us about this incident. He had no information to offer us. We double-tracked that communication with the Soviets with a conversation with our Embassy in Moscow, where our Chargé in Moscow, Warren Zimmerman, got in touch with a senior official in the Soviet Foreign Ministry and asked for information.

In the meantime, we picked up, through various sources, increasing signs that the aircraft had gone down. There were indications that a Soviet air-sea rescue operation was underway in Soviet territorial waters. And as further information came in, it became increasingly apparent, I would say very, in the wee hours of today, this morning, that the aircraft had in fact been shot down.

The intelligence community was generally able to confirm the fact that it had been shot down early this morning, so that at the opening of business today senior officials were informed of that fact.

At that stage, the decision was taken to ask the Soviet Chargé, Mr. Sokolov, to come immediately to the State Department, where he saw Lawrence Eagleburger, the Under Secretary of State, and where we reiterated our demand for information. As you know, the Secretary of State then made a public statement.

I might say we have continued to be in very close touch with the authorities in Seoul, and we are working closely with them.

Q. Have you gotten any clue from the Soviets at all why they have done this?

A. No.

Q. As you mentioned rescue operations, Rick, does that mean that you are of the impression that they were rather embarrassed by the incidents, and if so, were trying to (inaudible)?

A. Well, whether one calls it a rescue operation—I said air-sea rescue—it can be best called an air-sea reconnaissance operation. They were obviously trying to find the remains, if any, of this aircraft.

Q. In what area, specifically, are they trying to find the remains?

A. I can't give you any specific coordinates. We can probably be more helpful later in the day.

Q. Rick, can you say why there was such a time gap between the time the plane was shot down and before anyone was really able to confirm that that had happened?

A. I can't, Bernie, other than to say that we do not, the United States Government does not continuously monitor the movements of every aircraft around the world. This aircraft was over Soviet air space for a significant period of time—between 2 and 2½ hours—and while it is over Soviet air space, it is even more difficult, obviously, for the United States Government and others to know precisely what is happening.

Q. Secretary Shultz gave a rather precise account of what was said, who said it, and what the sort of communications were. What can you tell us about the monitoring effort, about the sources of the monitoring, about when those statements became available in this country?

A. I'm certainly not going to go into detail on the sources, and you'll understand that; but I can tell you that we did not have real time information. As I relayed to you, that information was picked up through various sources. It had to be filtered; it had to be translated; and we were not able to form a firm judgment on the fate of the aircraft, as I said, until early this morning.

Q. Was this U.S. technical means, exclusively or—?

A. No, I wouldn't say it was exclusively U.S. technical means.

Q. Rick, after the Japanese defense agency monitored that the aircraft was off course, was there an attempt by the Japanese authorities or any other authority with which we are allied, to contact that aircraft and say, "Hey, you're off course?"

A. We aren't aware of any such attempt, but I wouldn't want to leave you with the impression that no such attempt was made. Let me make a general statement: We are in the process now of collecting as much information as we possibly can about this episode. You received a good deal of hard information this morning in the Secretary's statement, and as more information becomes available, we will make it public.

Q. Did the aircraft ever report that he had been intercepted or say anything about the presence of the fighters around him?

A. Again, not that we are aware.

Q. Are you aware of an order that went out to the Soviet pilot, who according to what the Secretary said, at 1826 shot the plane down, to shoot the plane down? Did he have an order to do that?

A. We know that, first of all, the plane was shot down, and that the pilot reported that the plane was shot down, and that the pilot was in continuous contact with ground control.

Q. In the course of that continuous contact, do you know that he was ordered to shoot the plane down?

A. I just simply stand on what I said, Marvin.

Q. Can you rule out that there might have been some miscommunication?

A. No.

Q. Is it possible that the pilot misunderstood?

A. I wouldn't rule out any possibility at this standpoint, but it is very clear to us that the aircraft was shot down.

I would make a general comment which is that the Soviet Union exercises a very tight and very disciplined and centralized command and control capability for its military forces including fighter aircraft.

Q. Why was the hot line not used, and do you anticipate its use soon?

A. The hot line was not used because, very simply, we did not have the information. As I said before, we did not have real time information. We only learned that the aircraft had been shot down hours after the fact, and as soon as we learned, though, that the aircraft might be in trouble, we did get in touch immediately with the Soviets.

Q. You're suggesting in your statement here that the Soviets have very tight and disciplined control; that there is almost no possibility that this Soviet flyer was disobeying orders?

A. I just want to stand on the fact of very tight discipline and centralized—

Q. We just don't want to misinterpret, you see, and if they have very tight and disciplined control, as you say, and he was in constant contact, you're not suggesting—you are not even hinting that there was any disobedience of orders by this pilot, are you?

A. I am not trying to hint that. No.

Q. Did the length of time between when the Soviets intercepted the plane and when it was shot down indicate to our intelligence people that this went very high in the Soviet military command before a decision was made to fire on that airplane?

A. We simply don't have any information to tell us where—

Q. What is the history of the Soviet position on violation of their airspace in that part of the world? For example, have they ever said that they would shoot planes down, civilian planes, if they ventured in that area?

A. I am not aware of any kind of public declarations along those lines, but they obviously do take violations of their airspace seriously. You'll recall the episode with another Korean airliner where that airliner was forced down and was fired upon and people, passengers, were injured. [55]

Q. Rick, what does Sokolov say? When you're talking to the Soviets—when you spoke to him on the phone and then when he was summoned today, met Eagleburger—what do they say when you have this incontrovertible evidence?

[55] Reference presumably is to the KAL airliner on a flight from Paris to Seoul, with a scheduled stop in Anchorage, on April 20, 1978, which strayed far off course, entered Soviet airspace, was fired upon by Soviet aircraft, and forced to land on a frozen lake. Two passengers were killed and eleven injured.

A. They have said nothing to us so far. They have not provided us an explanation or any information to clarify the situation.

Q. Was the airliner approaching the Kamchatka test site, or was it approaching anything else that would indicate why the pilot chose to shoot it down right there?

A. I don't have any information on that.

Q. When you say that you don't know of any attempts by the Japanese or the South Koreans to get in touch with that airplane to say, "You are off course," and the Secretary said that you weren't aware of any communication between the Russian MiGs and the aircraft, and that they might have been incapable of communication, how can that be that they would be incapable? What kind of incapacity?

A. I don't know. You're asking me to speculate, and I can't do that.

Q. Was there any evidence of wreckage found? Any sign of anything? What has been found?

A. There has been some evidence of wreckage, some kerosene on the surface of the water has been found, and apparently some other debris.

Q. Any indication of any survivors at all?

A. No.

Q. When you say that they say—that this Soviet Chargé says nothing, do you mean this literally? He sits there in silence? Do you mean he says, "Nyet"? Does he say "No comment," or does he say, "We don't understand," or "We don't have any message"? What do you mean by not—

A. I'm not going to go beyond that.

Q. Nothing?

A. I've described in a general way what they have told us so far. I'm not going to get into details of what they said.

Q. I wonder what you mean by "nothing." You're not being literal?

A. They have not given us any information.

Q. You indicated that the Secretary has talked to the President since he had his news conference with us.

A. That's right.

Q. At the news conference he said he was going on to Madrid. Is that still the case?

A. He said he was going to Madrid because he wants to raise this issue, among other issues, with the Soviet Foreign Minister.

Q. I meant after speaking with the President that is still the case?

A. That's my understanding.

Q. Rick, what did the President tell the Secretary in essence? Is he backing him in this statement?

A. Yes, he did. Very strongly backed him up.

Q. What did he say? He approved of it or—

A. My understanding is that he approved very forcefully of the Secretary's statement.

MR. HUGHES. He watched the Secretary.

MR. BURT: He had watched the Secretary on TV.

Q. Can the United States do anything about this aside from complain orally?

A. We are examining options now. We need to, as I pointed out, learn as much as we possibly can about this situation. I would make the point that this is not a U.S.-Soviet bilateral issue. It is partially a bilateral issue because a U.S. Congressman and other American citizens were on board this aircraft.

But this is an issue that clearly involves the South Koreans, and it's an issue that involves the international community. There are aviation procedures and rules for both civilian and military aircraft, and we're looking into those rules.

So I wouldn't want to say exactly what we will or won't do at this stage.

Q. Rick, what was the visibility like, according to your best sources, at the time of the shooting of the missile?

A. I would just simply say that the aircraft, the Soviet fighter aircraft, had visual contact.

Q. It was night, wasn't it? Is that right?

A. I'm not sure.

Q. Wait a minute. You said GMT was about 1800. That would be, we figured, about 2 in the morning out there.

Q. Night time.

Q. It happened in the afternoon.

A. I would just simply say—

MR. HUGHES. Two in the afternoon. You're right. [56]

Q. This aircraft was trying to leave Soviet airspace, was trying to return to his correct route, when the missile was fired?

A. This aircraft was in Soviet airspace for, as I said before, some 2, 2½ hours. My understanding is that it was shot down as it was leaving Soviet airspace. But it was shot down in Soviet airspace.

Q. What's the situation with regard to any further contact with the Soviets on this subject?

A. We expect the Soviet Union to be back to us with information.

Q. Rick, any indications that the Soviets tried to signal the plane to land or force it down or anything at all before it was shot down?

A. We have no indications of that.

Q. Rick, what do you mean when you say, "We are examining options now," by way of the U.S. response? Can you give us some idea of what you mean by that?

A. No, I can't. It's much too early to do so.

Q. Rick, is there any indication that that plane's communications system failed, or that its radar or anything failed? Any indication like that?

A. We're not aware of that.

Q. Rick, what's missing from the detail that the Secretary gave us, is it clear to you that there was an order to this pilot to shoot, as opposed to—the question was asked whether he disobeyed an order, but was there—you're saying there was an order for him from the ground to fire on the airplane.

A. Mike, I would just repeat what I said. There was continuous contact between the aircraft and ground control, that the pilot was in touch with ground control in explaining each of his steps, as he prepared to engage the aircraft, and shot down the aircraft, and described that event to ground control.

Q. I would think it has relevance because we're trying to find out whether the plane was induced to fly into Soviet airspace or whether it was a technical error that it was there.

A. Marvin, I do not have information on that at this time. I just can't help you.

Q. Rick, how much deviation was there from normal flight patterns?

A. Substantial.

Q. And did it occur during the entire 2½ hours or only in the last 10 minutes or—

A. South Korea does not recognize the Soviet Union and vice versa, and South Korean airliners do not normally fly over Soviet airspace.

Q. So it was 2½ hours in an illegal area? [57]

A. That's right.

Q. You said you'd provide us later with as much detail as you can about this incident. Will you provide us with transcripts of translations of the communications that you have available to you?

A. I doubt that very much.

Q. Rick, when you said before the plane was shot down as it was leaving Soviet airspace, had it tried to escape from airspace before? Had it been boxed in by the eight planes?

A. Bernie, we just don't have any information on that.

[57] Correction: The plane was tracked by Soviet aircraft for some two and one half hours, during which it was over Soviet airspace on at least two occasions. We are unable to say how long it was in Soviet airspace on each occasion. [Footnote in the source text.]

Q. When you say you were examining options, who do you mean by "we"? Is that State, is that other agencies, is that U.S. intelligence?

A. We have an interagency group which is examining the situation, and we are in touch with our allies on this subject. As I pointed out, we are in touch very closely with the South Korean Government, and we will be in touch with other interested governments.

Q. Can you just tell us which agencies are on the interagency group?

A. The National Security Council, the Department of Defense, the intelligence community, the State Department. I presume other agencies, other interested agencies.

Q. Rick, there's a late radio report that aides in Representative McDonald's office are contending that the Soviets knew that the Congressman was aboard before they shot it down, and that although this ought to bring an end to U.S.-Soviet diplomatic relations, they predict, "business as usual."

Do you have any reaction on that?

A. My reaction is to quote the Secretary of State. The United States reacts with revulsion to this attack. Loss of life appears to be heavy. We can see no excuse whatsoever for this appalling act.

Q. Did they know? Do you have any evidence that they knew he was on board, as they are suggesting in his office?

A. Not at this time.

Q. Rick, every time a major power or even a minor power commits to a military action, there's usually a policy reason behind it.

Can you perceive any kind of policy motive for this kind of attack?

A. I think it's really too early for me to try to answer that question.

Q. Rick, would you predict—although I know it's hard to predict in your business—but will you predict that the impact of this on U.S.-Soviet relations is not going to be good, at least in the short term? (Laughter)

A. I think after a senior U.S. official like the Secretary of State makes a statement like that, that question answers itself.

Q. Rick, you said the Soviets would be getting back to you with information.

A. We expect the Soviet Union to get back to us. I don't want to—

Q. Is Sokolov going to be coming back to the State Department with that information?

A. We certainly hope and expect that both here and in Moscow that the Soviets are forthcoming in answering our questions about this affair.

Q. Can I draw you out on relations a little more? Can you at all speculate on how this might affect U.S.-Soviet relations?

A. No. I don't want to speculate.

Q. Rick, if the plane was for 2½ hours flying in illegal territory, did the United States or the Japanese or any other friendly power try to warn the pilot that he was—

A. That question has been asked. Not to our knowledge.

Q. Rick, what is the U.S. policy? If a similar thing happened in our airspace, what is our policy?

A. I find it totally inconceivable that the United States Air Force would shoot down an unarmed, commercial aircraft.

Q. Do we know how strategically important or sensitive is the area to the Soviets?

A. I think that is a question you should ask the Soviet Union, and certainly it provides no excuse whatsoever for shooting down an unarmed civilian aircraft.

Q. Rick, during the 2½ hours that it was in illegal airspace, if you want to use that word, how much of that time was it being shadowed by Soviet fighters?

A. Our understanding is continuously.

Q. Rick, this seems like an obvious question in light of everything you've said, but I just want to make sure that the answer is clear on the record. Was there any Soviet contact with the United States or with the Republic of Korea indirectly or through Japan or whatever prior to the shooting down of the plane, or even at the time the plane came into their airspace?

A. There was no Soviet contact with the United States, and we are not aware of any Soviet contact with South Korea.

Q. Can you be at all any more specific on the location? You say substantial deviation. Is that hundreds of miles inside the Soviet territory airspace or thousands of miles? Any specific location you can say where it was shot down?

A. The aircraft was flying for more than 2 hours in Soviet airspace, so you're talking about hundreds of miles.

Q. Was there a serious atmospheric disturbance that would have gotten in the way with normal sideband communications between that sophisticated aircraft and its own base?

A. I'm not aware of any atmospheric problem.

Q. Do we know—maybe it came up before. Was the pilot at any time, seeing these planes—one or two or the eight, or whatever—ever sought to leave the Soviet airspace?

A. I just can't answer that question.

Q. About Madrid, to what extent are you letting this incident revise the agenda for the talks, the upcoming talks between the Secretary and Mr. Gromyko?

A. It's revised the agenda for Madrid in one important way. As the Secretary of State has pointed out, he will hope to receive an explanation and to discuss this issue with the Soviet Foreign Minister. He also pointed out we expect to get information from the Soviet Union prior to any meeting with the Soviet Foreign Minister.

Q. A follow-up to that. Do you expect this topic to so dominate now the meeting that—

A. Again, you're asking me to speculate. I wouldn't want to.

Q. Was the airliner at all aware that they were in Soviet airspace, and, if so, why didn't they move out of it during the 2½ hours of the flight?

A. We just don't have an answer to that question.

Q. Do you have any better coordinants as to where it was shot down?

A. Again, I hope that we can give you more information on that later on.

Q. When you said it was leaving Soviet airspace, was it on its way into Japanese airspace?

A. We'll try to get you more information on that.

Q. Had it been your perception that U.S.-Soviet relations had been improving in recent months?

A. That's kind of off the topic, really, of this question. Our position on U.S.-Soviet relations has been, for sometime, that we are deeply disturbed about several aspects of Soviet behavior but at the same time we're willing to work for improvement. But beyond that, I don't think it's helpful for me to get into U.S.-Soviet policy at this briefing.

Q. In your conversations with the Chargé and in Moscow, have they as much as said we admit or we acknowledge that this has happened; we're looking into it?

A. No.

Q. Were U.S. forces ever put on any sort of alert after we learned that this might have been shot down, the aircraft?

A. U.S. Air-Sea Rescue Forces, following confirmation that the aircraft had been downed, have been participating in their own search and potentially rescue missions. But during the episode itself, during that period time that the aircraft was being followed by Soviet fighters, there was no movement of U.S. forces.

Q. How close do our planes have to get into Soviet airspace before—

A. Sorry?

Q. How close to Soviet airspace do U.S. air-sea rescue operations have to get if they're looking for evidence, for wreckage?

A. I'm sorry, I can't answer that question.

Q. Is there any indication (inaudible) other than what would be normal for a commerical airliner?

A. No.

Q. No electronic or surveillance gear?

A. No.

Q. It is at least implied, in response to questions, that the pilot who shot the plane had orders to shoot down the plane, because you said they were in constant communication. Could you be a little more explicit about that since you obviously have a lot of the details from intercepts?

A. I will only say that the pilot, in communicating with his ground control, described and discussed the sequence of movements and actions he was taking to engage this aircraft, including the arming and firing of a missile.

Q. How did you learn that, Rick? Did you monitor that?

A. Just through various sources.

Q. And those sources are even hinting that he was not given orders by the Soviet Government?

A. I said that I'm not trying to hint anything.

Q. Did your monitoring suggest that the pilot described this plane as a commercial airliner? Did he say that to ground control?

A. What he had was visual identification of the aircraft.

Q. But you heard him say he fired. Did he say this is a commercial airliner flying this way?

A. I think that it was understood that it was a commercial aircraft. But, again, we are looking into this whole episode, and hope to acquire greater detail.

Q. Was there any indication that he exchanged with the pilot of the plane, of the Korean plane, any information to ask for his identity from 1812 to 1826, which is according to the statement?

A. We have no indication to that.

Q. Have you seen the transcript of the following two lines, "I am going to fire a missile; the target is the KAL plane?" Have you seen that?

A. Off the top of my head, no.

Q. You have not? Were there pauses in the transmission from the pilot to his base that indicated he was receiving response? You said that there was a sequence of messages.

A. There was a sequence of messages where the pilot was in touch with ground control. I don't want to go beyond that.

Q. The last time there was an incident of this nature, the people in the intelligence community who were considerably upset that revelations of how we had picked up the information compromised American intelligence abilities. Are you concerned that this is happening again?

A. I'm not aware of any statements by any U.S. officials that have compromised intelligence. We haven't discussed our sources or methods.

Q. Thank you, Rick.

The Soviet statements to this moment have totally failed to explain how or why this tragedy has occurred. Indeed, the whole incident appears to be inexplicable to civilized people everywhere.

Mrs. Reagan and I want to express our deepest sympathy to the families of the victims. Our prayers are with them in this time of bereavement, and they have my personal assurance that I will make every effort to get to the bottom of this tragedy. I have ordered the flags of the United States flown at half staff at all Federal installations and U.S. military bases around the world.

Soviet Response to U.S. Demand For an Explanation of the Shooting Down of the Korean Airliner

MR. HUGHES. Sorry about being late. I have a statement on the Soviet response to our demand earlier today for an explanation of the shooting down of the Korean aircraft.

The soviet Foreign Minister has sent a message to Secretary Shultz in reply to our demand of earlier today for an explanation of the shooting down of a Korean Airlines 747 by Soviet aircraft. The message, which was delivered by the Soviet Embassy here to the Department of State, is an almost verbatim repetition of the TASS item issued from Moscow today.

That TASS message reads as follows: "An unidentified plane entered the airspace of the Soviet Union over the Kamchatka Peninsula from the direction of the Pacific Ocean, and then for the second time violated the airspace of the U.S.S.R. over Sakhalin Island on the night from August 31 to September 1. The plane did not have navigation lights, did not respond to queries, and did not enter into contact with the dispatcher service."

I continue quoting from the TASS item from Moscow this morning. "Fighters of the Soviet Antiaircraft Defense, which were sent aloft toward the intruder plane, tried to give it assistance in directing it to the nearest airfield, but the intruder plane did not react to the signals and warnings from the Soviet fighters and continued its flight in the direction of the Sea of Japan." [60]

That's the end of the quote of the TASS story from Moscow this morning which was included almost verbatim in the Soviet response to our demand.

In addition, Mr. Gromyko's message includes a statement that in connection with the U.S. request, the Soviets have taken measures to search for the aircraft and indicates that as a result of the search signs of a possible crash have been found in the area of Morenon Island. This is not in the note, but the fact of the matter is that Morenon Island is in the Sea of Japan inside of Soviet territorial waters.

The search, according to the Soviet message, continues in the area.

The Soviet Chargé has been informed that the United States Government finds this reply totally inadequate, and the United States reiterates its demand for a satisfactory explanation.

That's all I have for you.

Q. Does the Gromyko message or did the Chargé somehow intimate that the Soviets had in fact shot the plane down? The TASS story makes no mention of that.

A. That's correct.

Q. So they simply do not explain how it is that the plane went down?

---

[59] Source: Department of State files. The briefing was conducted by Department of State Spokesman John Hughes, beginning at 5:10 p.m.

[60] The text of this TASS report was printed in Pravda on September 2, 1983, and in Izvestia on September 3, 1983. (Current Digest of the Soviet Press, September 28, 1983, p. 1)

A. That is correct. And that is why we consider this "explanation" totally unsatisfactory.

Q. Anything, John, in connection with the search, about survivors?

A. No. We have no knowledge of any survivors, and they make no mention of survivors.

Q. Apparently Larry Speakes said that the Korean pilot radioed his position after he was hit.[61] Do you have any indication of that, and does that indicate that in fact he was near this island in the Sea of Japan?

A. No. I don't. I'm not contradicting Larry Speakes, but I don't have anything on that.

Q. There were indications earlier that the plane may have had radio trouble shortly after it left Alaska. There are some garbled communications with another Korean plane. Do you know anything about that?

A. No. Don't have anything beyond what—

Q. What's next here? We've got an inadequate reply. We say we want more. Do we expect the Soviets to tell us some more, and what happens if they don't?

A. I think these words speak for themselves. We're demanding a satisfactory explanation, we are considering our options, and I think you should keep in touch with the White House.

Q. John, any reconsideration of Madrid?

A. No.

Q. Do you know whether any of the options that have been recommended by—

A. No. Don't think I'll get into the options. As I say, I think you should remain in touch with the Western White House.

Q.—some of the options recommended by members of Congress, such as stopping Soviet planes flying in here, stop the grain deal, etc., etc. Has the administration given any consideration to those possibilities?

A. I think a variety of options—I'm not getting into them or confirming what they're discussing—have been under consideration today and undoubtedly the President would make his decision on any options that he wishes to adopt.

Q. Do you think it's a matter for the United Nations?

A. Why don't we wait and see, Jim. There certainly are international implications to this.

Q. What would you be waiting to see before you consider United Nations—

A. Why don't you keep in touch with the Western White House. I think that any announcements might come out of there.

Q. The Japanese have revealed that there was in fact an order in their chronology of events, that the Soviets did order from the ground, Soviet Command, that the pilot fire.

Can you confirm this here?

A. I think I would reiterate what Assistant Secretary Burt said earlier,[62] and I think he has not personally seen a line which says, "Fire your missile." But I think it is quite clear from the transcript that the attack was being coordinated over a period of time, and while there may not be a line in there which says, "Proceed with the attack," the pilot was making clear what actions he was taking, and at no time was there a command not to attack. So I think one has to assume—

[61] At a press briefing by Speakes in Santa Barbara, California, beginning at 10:20 a.m. on September 1, 1983, a reporter asked: ". . . do we have any intelligence information on the conversations, or SOS messages relayed by the Korean pilot in that two-hour period when they were being followed?" Speakes replied in part: "None that I'm aware of. I think the only conversation that I'm aware of is after the Korean pilot—Korean aircraft was stuck [struck], he did radio position of his aircraft as he was losing altitude, but I'm not certain that that—this is all part of the analysis—whether that position that he radioed was accurate; was, indeed, where he was." (Office of the Press Secretary to the President)

Later, at a press briefing beginning at 2:33 p.m. that same day, Speakes said: "I made a statement this morning that the Korean plane, after being hit, radioed its position. There seemed to be some questions raised by our intelligence people as to we weren't sure exactly who that came from." (Office of the Press Secretary to the President)

Q. The Japanese have that line, I believe.

A. They may have. I'm being as helpful as I can in telling you what we have.

Q. In one version put out by the Japanese of the transcript they talk about three missiles. As far as you are—

A. Not aware of that.

Q. Only one.

A. As far as we're aware.

Q. Does the United States dispute the Soviet comment in its response that the plane had no lights and made no radio contact—no navigation lights? Does the U.S. dispute that at all? And what implications, if any, do those observations have vis-à-vis the plane's going off course in the first place, its remaining off course for 2½ hours, and its failure to respond to efforts to warn it?

A. We weren't there, so it's hard to give you a view of whether those navigation lights were working or not, but we have no indication they were not.

Q. You have no indication that—

A. And indeed the transcript does talk of the aircraft—talks of a Soviet pilot making mention of the navigation lights of the plane.

Q. When we talked about options, I want to be clear that your answer to my question was not a generalized answer, that, yes, we consider options, thank you very much. I was asking specifically about the grain deal, [63] I was asking specifically about Kennedy's recommendation that flights be cut off. [64]

A. There are a lot of people out there today, Marvin, offering various ideas and various options. They're coming from airline pilots and Congressmen and so forth and so on, and obviously all options, I think, that are suggested would be given attention.

That doesn't mean to say that those options are necessarily under consideration having been initiated in the State Department.

Q. Are U.S. allies involved in this discussion of options? Are we—

A. I think I'm going to stand where I am and not go any further on that.

Q. Are you expecting any response from—I don't mean response—are you expecting any action from the United States within the next 24 hours related to the shooting down of this plane?

A. I think that you will see further activity on this front. Yes.

Q. Do you have a number of American casualties yet?

A. No. I do not. I'm afraid that's all I've got for you. Thank you.

Q. Is that it for today, John?

A. That's it.

Letter From the Acting Representative at the United Nations (Lichenstein) to the President of the U.N. Security Council (Sinclair), September 1, 1983 [65]

U.S. Request For Urgent Security Council Meeting

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On urgent instructions from my government and in view of the gravity of the situation arising from the destruction by fighters of the Soviet airforce of a Republic of Korea Boeing 747 aircraft carrying civilian passengers of different nationalities over waters of the Japanese island of Hokkaido, I wish to bring the following facts to your attention and to that of all members of the Security Council.

[64] Reference presumably is to Senator Edward Kennedy, who joined other U.S. lawmakers in calling for a suspension of all commercial flights to and from the Soviet Union. (New York Times, September 2, 1983, p. 16)

At 1400 hours, Greenwich mean time, August 31, 1983, a Korean Airline Boeing 747 en route from New York to Seoul, Korea, departed Anchorage, Alaska, carrying 269 passengers and crew.

At approximately 1600 hours (GMT), the aircraft came to the attention of Soviet radar personnel. It was tracked constantly by Soviet military authorities from that time. According to information available to my government, the aircraft strayed into Soviet airspace over the Kamchatka Peninsula, over the Sea of Okhotsk and over Sakhalin Island.

The Soviets tracked the commercial airliner for some two-and-one-half hours. A Soviet pilot reported visual contact with the aircraft at 18:12 hours. The Soviet plane was in constant contact with its ground control.

At 18:12 hours the Korean aircraft was reported by the Soviet pilot at 10,000 meters. At 18:26 hours the Soviet pilot reported that he fired a missile and the target was destroyed. At 18:30 hours the Korean aircraft was reported by radar at an altitude of 5,000 meters. At 18:38 hours the Korean plane disappeared from the radar screens.

The United States Government knows that at least eight Soviet fighters reacted at one time or another to the airliner. The pilot who shot the airline down reported after the attack that he had, in fact, fired a missile, that he had destroyed the target, and that he was breaking away.

About an hour later, Soviet controllers ordered a number of their search aircraft to conduct search and rescue activity in the vicinity of the last position of the Korean airliner reflected by Soviet tracking. One of these aircraft reported finding kerosene on the surface of the seas in that area.

The United States Government considers this action of Soviet military authorities against a civil air transport vehicle a flagrant and serious attack on the safety of international civil aviation.

This action by the Soviet Union violates the fundamental legal norms and standards of international civil aviation. These norms and standards do not permit such use of armed force against foreign civil aircraft. There exists no justification in international law for the destruction of an identifiable civil aircraft, an aircraft which was tracked on radar for 2 1/2 hours, and which was in visual contact of Soviet military pilots prior to being deliberately shot down.

It is the considered position of the Government of the United States of America that this unprovoked resort to the use of force by the Soviet military authorities in contravention of international civil aviation organization standards and the basic norms of international law must be deplored and condemned by the international community and by world public opinion.

Upon instructions from my government, I request, in association with the Republic of Korea, that you convene an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider this serious matter. I further request that this letter be circulated as a document of the Security Council.

Sincerely,

CHARLES M. LICHENSTEIN

Reactions to the Soviet Destruction of the Korean Civilian Airliner

First let me just say that Nancy and I were deeply saddened last night to learn of the death of Senator Henry Jackson. He was a friend, a colleague, a true patriotic, a deserted—devoted servant of the people. He will be sorely missed, and we both extend our deepest sympathy to his family.

Now, in the wake of the barbaric act committed yesterday by the Soviet regime against a commercial jet liner, the United States and many other countries of the world made clear in compelling statements that expressed not only our outrage but also our demand for a truthful accounting of the facts. Our first emotions are anger, disbelief, and profound sadness. While events in Afghanistan and elsewhere have left few illusions about the willingness of the Soviet Union to advance its interests through violence and intimidation, all of us had hoped that certain irreducible standards of civilized behavior nonetheless obtained. But this event shocks the sensibilities of people everywhere.

The tradition in the civilized world has always been to offer help to mariners and pilots who are lost or in distress on the sea or in the air. Where human life is valued, extraordinary efforts are extended to preserve and protect it. And it's essential that as civilized societies we ask searching questions about the nature of regimes where such standards do not apply.

Beyond these emotions, the world notes the stark contrast that exists between Soviet words and deeds. What can we think of a regime that so broadly trumpets its vision of peace and global disarmament and yet so callously and quickly commits a terrorist act that sacrifices the lives of innocent human beings? What can be said about Soviet credibility when they so flagrantly lie about such a heinous act? What can be the scope of legitimate mutual discourse with a state whose values permit such atrocities, and what are we to make of a regime which establishes one set of standards for itself and another for the rest of humankind?

We've joined in the call for an urgent U.N. Security Council meeting today. The brutality of this act should not be compounded through silence or the cynical distortion of the evidence now at hand.

And tonight I will be meeting with my advisers to conduct a formal review of this matter, and this weekend I shall be meeting with the Congressional leadership.

To the families of all those on the ill-fated aircraft, we send our deepest sympathy, and I hope they know our prayers are with them all. (Applause)

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz), September 2, 1983 [67]

"The World Is Waiting For the Soviet Union To Tell the Truth"

The Soviet Union has today issued another statement in its continuing effort to cover up the facts of the inhuman Soviet attack on an unarmed civilian airliner. They still will not admit the truth—that they shot down an unarmed civilian aircraft.

The facts are:

1. The aircraft was a commercial airliner on a regularly scheduled flight—and the Soviet fighter came close enough to see that.

2. The passengers on the flight came from many nations and included a number of women and children.

3. The airliner in question was not of U.S. registry.

4. The United States was not aware that the Korean airliner was in jeopardy until after it was shot down. Our first knowledge of this incident was based on subsequent analysis of Soviet defense activity.

TASS also asserts that the Soviet aircraft fired-warning shots with tracer shells along the route of the plane. We know the Soviet pilot reported that he had fired on the target and it was destroyed. There is no indication that the Soviets tried to warn the plane by firing tracers.

[67] Source: Department of State Press Release 331, September 6, 1983; printed also in Department of State Bulletin, October 1983, p. 5. Secretary Shultz read the statement at 5:45 p.m. The source text also contains the introductory comments by Department of State Spokesman John Hughes: "At the direction of the President, the Secretary of State will read a statement responding to the TASS statement of this afternoon. He will not, unfortunately, be able to answer any questions." The TASS statement referred to was presumably the one printed in Pravda on September 3, 1983, and in Izvestia on September 4, 1983. For text, see Current Digest of the Soviet Press, September 28, 1983, pp. 1–2.

The Soviet Union is clearly engaged in an effort to divert attention from its own actions by false claims of a U.S. intelligence connection with the Korean civilian airliner.

None of this can obscure the facts. The Soviet Union must accept the responsibility for having shot down an unarmed commercial airliner, taking the lives of 269 human beings. No cover-up, however brazen and elaborate, can change this reality—or absolve the Soviet Union of its responsibility to explain its behavior. The world is waiting for the Soviet Union to tell the truth.

Statement by the Deputy Representative at the United Nations (Lichenstein) in the U.N. Security Council, September 2, 1983 (Extracts) [68]

Facts on the Korean Airliner Incident and Their Implications for International Law

Mr. President, I wish at the outset to read the statement issued today by the President of the United States, as he left California on his return to Washington [69]—where at 1830 hours he has convened an extraordinary meeting of his National Security Council.

This strong and eloquent expression of anguish for the families of 269 victims, this expression of deep concern for what this heinous crime means for international peace and security, indeed, for the best hopes of decent people everywhere, this statement by the President of my country needs no amplification by me.

What I will try to do this afternoon is, first, to provide some framework, some context for this tragedy. I will then spell out the facts as best we now know them—and let me note here that hour-by-hour these last 2½ days, more and more facts have become and are becoming available to my government, and as they do our concern deepens and our outrage grows. Then, finally, I will draw some few, preliminary conclusions about the meaning of this tragedy—the lessons that it may hold for us here in this Council and, more generally, for all people everywhere in the world who enjoy freedom . . . [70] who would preserve the freedom they enjoy . . . those who seek freedom.

How can we begin to characterize this crime? And a crime worse compounded, Mr. President, by the Soviets' continuing denial of any responsibility for it, a denial which is in contempt of the truth as, gradually, we are learning it and in contempt of the opinion of civilized mankind.

On the basis of the facts presently available to my government, the crime must be characterized as calculated and deliberate. From all presently available evidence, the pilot of the SU-15 Soviet interceptor—the pilot who pulled the trigger or pushed the button that unleashed the heat-guided missile which destroyed Korean Airlines flight #007 and 269 innocent lives along with it—that pilot had the Korean 747 in his sights, clearly identified as a civilian airliner, well within 2 kilometers of the 747, for more than ten minutes running, prior to launching the destructive missile.

The crime committed was indeed calculated, and indeed, it was deliberate—and it was wantonly irresponsible. On no conceivable assumption of the peril posed by a single commercial airliner to the putative security of the Soviet Union, a regularly scheduled nighttime flight, however much off course it may have strayed—on no conceivable such assumption could the Soviet reaction be characterized as other than incommensurate, as outrageously excessive, as wantonly irresponsible.

Let us call the crime for what clearly it is: wanton, calculated, deliberate murder.

Most of us by now know the basic facts of this criminal act of mass murder—but let me again outline them in brief:

At 1400 hours, Greenwich mean time, August 31, 1983, a Korean Airline Boeing 747 en route from New York to Seoul, Korea, departed Anchorage, Alaska, carrying 269 passengers and crew.

At approximately 1600 hours (GMT), the aircraft came to the attention of Soviet radar personnel. It was tracked constantly by Soviet military authorities from that time. According to information available to my government, the aircraft strayed into Soviet airspace over the Kamchatka Peninsula, over the Sea of Okhotsk and over Sakhalin Island.

The Soviets tracked the commercial airliner for some 2½ hours. A Soviet pilot reported visual contact with the aircraft at 1812 hours. The Soviet plane was in constant contact, was receiving orders and instructions from its ground control.

At 1812 hours the Korean aircraft was reported by the Soviet pilot at 10,000 meters, roughly 33,000 feet. At 1826 hours the Soviet pilot reported that he fired a missile and the target was destroyed. At 1830 hours the Korean aircraft was reported by radar at an altitude of 5,000 meters. At 1838 hours the Korean plane disappeared from the radar screens.

The United States Government knows that at least eight Soviet fighters reacted at one time or another throughout this period in excess of 2½ hours to the airliner. The pilot who shot the airliner down reported after the attack that he had in fact fired a missile, that he had destroyed the target, and that he was breaking away—as he put it, "I am leaving the attack." (I must defer to our Soviet colleague. It may well be that I am not adequately or properly translating the Russian. But then he has all of the facts in his possession.) It is also of interest to note that prior to firing the heat-seeking missile, the Soviet SU–15 interceptor deliberately circled back around behind the Korean 747, the better to aim his heat-seeking missile and in order to avoid any possibility of being hit by flying debris.

As we reflect on the possible meaning of this crime, and its possible consequences, I want very briefly to touch on its implications for any reasonable approximation to the codes and conventions of international law.

First and foremost are the legal obligations which flow from what the International Court of Justice—whose jurisdiction, needless to say, the Soviet Union usually does not accept—has called "certain general and well-recognized principles, namely elementary considerations of humanity, even more exacting in peace than in war."

If there were no other relevant rules, these well-recognized principles of humanity would rule out shooting down a passenger plane, a clearly marked airliner engaged in international civil aviation. But there are other very relevant rules. There are the rules of the Charter about the prohibition of the use of force. There are rules specific to civil aviation. Annex 2 to the Chicago Convention on Civil Aviation [71] contains "Rules of the Air." These Rules set forth the procedures to be used when intercepting a foreign aircraft not properly within the airspace of the intercepting country, that is to say, radio communications, rocking of wings, and irregular flashing of lights. The "Rules of the Air" do not include shooting down a civil airliner.

Attachment A to Annex 2 of the Chicago Convention is even clearer:

> "Interception of civil aircraft should be avoided and should be undertaken only as a last resort. If undertaken, the interception should be limited to determining the identity of the aircraft and providing any navigational guidance necessary for the safe conduct of the flight . . . . Intercepting aircraft should refrain from the use of weapons in all cases of interception of civil aircraft."

It is interesting as I have looked over the detailed log of some 75 instances, documented instances in which Soviet aircraft have strayed into Western, into American airspace. I have looked over the log carefully to discover the response in each case. I wish to recite from that long catalog only two rather interesting such flights. Among the numerous incidents there was that of the Aeroflot flight into Dulles Airport on November 8, 1981. This flight entered United States airspace at an unauthorized entry point in New England, flew over New England land area although its clearly demarcated route was almost exclusively over open water. It continued to fly according to an unauthorized route over the Pease Air Force Base and the naval facility at Groton, Connecticut. And then, finally, it landed in Dulles, Washington, D.C. Several days later, the same aircraft on leaving Dulles for its return flight flew a similiar unauthorized route over New England. My government lodged a very firm protest. My government then imposed what it considered a proportionate penalty. It suspended Aeroflot scheduled service into Dulles for two flights. It did not authorize the use of a heat-seeking missile!

What might we expect that a normal, reasonably civilized government do in such a situation such as the one that confronts us? It would, first of all, admit and accept responsibility for the act. It would express profound regret for the loss of life. It would undertake a credible investigation of the circumstances of the act to determine if there was individual responsibility, and it would discipline the responsible individuals. It would also pledge that such an act would never be repeated, and it would demonstrate that appropriate steps are being taken to insure against any repetition.

What by contrast has the Soviet Union done until now? Has it given the slightest indication that it accepts responsibility for this heinous act? Has it shown the least bit of compassion for the families of those innocent people who were killed, who were, as I have said, murdered? Has it taken any steps to initiate a process of investigation to determine responsibility? Has it given any sign of reassurance to the international community that it appreciates the gravity of what has happened and will take whatever steps are necessary to insure against its repetition? On the contrary, Mr. President, the Soviet attitude has lacked even a trace of contrition. In the face of utter disbelief on the part of the entire international community it denies any responsibility for shooting down this unarmed civilian airliner. It has shown no regret over the loss of life. It has indicated no readiness to punish those responsible. It has demonstrated no determination to avoid a repetition of such an incident.

It has, in other words, behaved with complete—and I must add, characteristic—contempt for the international community and for even minimal standards of decency and civilized behavior. In its refusal to admit the truth—to accept responsibility for this act —it is lying openly, brazenly, knowingly. In so doing it is—ironically—showing its true face to the world, the face that is so often hidden behind the peace offensive and the propaganda machine, behind all the talk of brotherhood and human solidarity, and international co-existence.

It is the face of a ruthless totalitarian state, a state which has been responsible over the past six and a half decades for killing more people—the latest estimate I have read is between 70 and 80 million—and enslaving more nations than any state in the history of mankind; a state that tailors its concept of truth to what will advance its own interests—that and nothing else; a state that does not accept responsibility for a minimally decent international order; a state whose ultimate objective is to remake the world in its own image, which necessarily means a world in which it will control the lives of people and the fate of nations as completely and as ruthlessly as it exercises control over its own people—and I should add, over those who innocently stray into its airspace.

If we are to learn anything from this awful tragedy, it is this message and this terrible warning.

It is said that we must, and of course we must, live in the same world with the Soviet Union. But if we are to live in that world—in freedom, and not in slavery—and if that world is to continue to allow room for the individual existence of nations and the survival of freedom and comparable human values, then it is best that we recognize now, before it is far, far, too late, the true nature of Soviet totalitarianism and the threat it poses to all people, those living under its yoke and those still free of such domination.

Let me complete my statement, Mr. President, by reading the words of a noble and eloquent Russian, formerly a citizen of the Soviet Union—not atypically a former citizen of the Soviet Union who now finds it neccessary to live outside his country. I quote from Alexander Solzhenitsyn:

> "Let us not forget that violence does not and cannot exist by itself. It is invariably intertwined with the lie. They are linked in the most intimate, most organic and most profound fashion. Violence cannot conceal itself behind anything except lies. And lies have nothing to maintain them except violence. Anyone who has once proclaimed violence as his method must inexorably choose the lie as his principle."

Background Information on the President's Forthcoming Address to the Nation

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. . . . I am at somewhat of a disadvantage here tonight, ladies and gentlemen, because the President is still working on the speech which is very much his own and I, therefore, cannot be totally precise on everything that may be in it. [73]

Having said that, it is clear that the President really wishes in this speech to do three general things: First of all is to stress once again on his own behalf and on behalf of the American people our horror at the act of the shooting down of KAL 007; secondly, to continue the process of laying out the facts as we obtain them before the nation and the world, a process that was begun by Secretary Shultz last Thursday in his statements; [74] and thirdly, to describe in a general way the actions the United States intends to take in response to the KAL shoot down.

It is important to remember that what we are dealing with is a Soviet act that has horrified public opinion. It is the U.S.S.R. against the world. Our objective is to act with the international community both broadly and in the civil aviation context in specific terms to accomplish several things.

First of all, to demand the facts and an admission from the Soviet Union that the plane was shot down by the Soviet Union; secondly, to obtain appropriate recompense for those injured by that act; and thirdly, to assure that acts of this sort do not happen again.

Our objectives will not be served if the shoot down of KAL 007 can be portrayed as simply a part of the East–West struggle. That is not what it is. It's another demonstration of the character and nature of the Soviet Union: its values, its priorities, its decision making process. The act is hideous, of course, but so is Afghanistan and Poland and yellow rain. A realistic assessment of the Soviets must recognize that the shoot down of KAL 007 is not out of keeping with past Soviet performance.

The way to change Soviet behavior is through economic, military and alliance strength—objectives which the President has been pursuing from the moment he was inaugurated as President of the United States.

At the same time—and the President will make this clear tonight, the United States must continue its efforts to maintain a dialogue with the Soviet Union where it is in our interests. It is for that reason that he has already announced that Paul Nitze will return to Geneva to continue the negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear force in Europe.[75] It is for that reason that we will continue the START negotiations, because our objective is to seek reductions in nuclear arms of both categories. It is, in short, in our interests.

The President will make clear that he has instructed Secretary Shultz to go to Madrid to meet with Mr. Gromyko in order to emphasize to the Soviet Foreign Minister our great concern about the shoot down of KAL 007. That will be the principal focus of the discussion that Secretary Shultz has with Mr. Gromyko. We [72] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing was conducted on background by two senior administration officials in the Briefing Room of the White House beginning at 5:50 p.m. The briefers were introduced by Larry Speakes, Principal Deputy Press Secretary to the President.

[74] For text of Secretary Shultz's statement on Thursday, September 1, 1983, see document 215. The Secretary made no other statement on the KAL incident that day.

[75] For the President's statement following his meeting with Nitze, September 3, 1983, in which he affirmed his decision to continue arms control talks with the Soviet Union, see Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, September 12, 1983, p. 1198.

consider it particularly appropriate since the Madrid meeting is, after all, dedicated to the question of human rights, and travel without fear to person or property is certainly a human right. In short, the shoot-down does not change our estimate or approach to the Soviet Union. Rather, it confirms it. It was a terrible act, but one which must be dealt with in a way that increases the chance that it won't happen again.

So to summarize, we will deal with this issue on two levels: with a response to the specific act itself and the fact sheet you have been handed largely details the direction in which the President is moving in that regard. [76]

And in the broader sense we will reaffirm the approach of this administration to dealing with the Soviet Union; that is, an approach combined of realism, strength, and dialogue.

As Larry Speakes indicated at the beginning—and I want to highlight this—the President in his speech tonight will include a part of the tape we have of the conversation of the Soviet pilots. He will also announce that at the Security Council tomorrow Ambassador Kirkpatrick will play the entire tape that we have in our possession. And I should indicate that we will at the same time or as we play that tape make available a transcript of the tape also tomorrow.

Q. Will that be in the Security Council?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It will be in the Security Council.

Q. Afternoon, morning, do you think?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I am not sure yet. The last I heard there was still conversation going on. I am sorry I can't tell you yet. It will go in the morning or afternoon.

Q. Is it the same 8-minute tape that was played for the congressional leaders yesterday? [77]

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I am not sure exactly how much was played for the congressional leaders. We will play the entire tape which I—don't hold me to this—but it runs about 20 minutes. Let me deal with one other issue before we open this to questions.

I have been told by Larry Speakes and others that there are a host of questions relating to the RC-135 question. [78] And I want to deal with that for a moment. I think you will be handed a piece of paper which will contain everything I am about to say. [79] I want to emphasize that that is all I have to say on this subject today.

A U.S. RC-135 aircraft was in the vicinity of the Korean airliner on August 31, when the airliner was initially detected by Soviet radar. Both aircraft were then in international air space and the U.S. aircraft never entered Soviet air space. The United States routinely conducts unarmed RC-135 flights in international air space of the Kamchatka Peninsula to monitor by national technical means Soviet compliance with the SALT Treaty. The Soviets conduct similar monitoring activities near U.S. missile testing sites. The Soviets are aware of our flights and track them routinely. They know that our aircraft do not enter their air space. The Korean aircraft's inadvertent entry into Soviet territory should have been an early and strong indication to the Soviets that the flight was not a U.S. reconnaissance aircraft.

[76] In his introduction of the briefers, Larry Speakes indicated that this "fact sheet" was a draft or outline of the address the President would give later that evening.

[77] Reference is to a meeting at the White House with the bipartisan leadership of the Congress on the KAL incident on September 4, 1983, from 10 to 11:40 a.m. It was followed by an additional hour of discussion on the Middle East. Among those who attended were: President Reagan; Vice President Bush; Secretary of State Shultz; Secretary of Defense Weinberger; Director of Central Intelligence, William J. Casey; Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General John W. Vesey, Jr.; Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, William P. Clark; Senate Majority Leader, Howard H. Baker, Jr.; Senate Minority Leader, Robert C. Byrd; Senate President pro tempore, Strom Thurmond; House Speaker, Thomas P. O'Neill; House Majority Leader, James C. Wright, Jr.; and House Minority Leader, Robert H. Michel.

[78] An example of this questioning was the White House press briefing on September 4, 1983, beginning at 2:13 p.m., which was conducted by Larry Speakes. According to a transcript of this briefing, questions on the U.S. RC-135 aircraft in the vicinity of the Korean airliner took up nearly one hour of the briefing. (Office of the Press Secretary to the President)

[79] The paper, which is quoted in full below, is also printed in Department of State Bulletin, October 1983, p. 6, but the latter erroneously gave the date of release as September 4, 1983.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICIAL. The Soviets traced the Korean aircraft and the U.S. aircraft separately and knew there were two aircraft in the area. So we do not believe this was a case of mistaken identity. The closest point of approach of the two aircraft was approximately 75 nautical miles while the U.S aircraft was in its mission orbit. Later, the U.S. aircraft crossed the path taken by the Korean airliner, but by then the airliner was 300 miles away. Still later, as the Korean airliner strayed off course, and overflew the Kamchatka Peninsula, it was initially identified by the Soviets as an RC-135 and then as an unidentified aircraft. Approximately 2 1/2 hours after the Soviet and Korean aircraft were near each other in international space, the Soviets shot down the Korean airliner as it was exiting or had exited their territory west of Sakhalin Island, some 1,000 miles from the operating area of the U.S. aircraft.

During the 2 1/2 hours of Soviet surveillance of the Korean aircraft, the Soviets had radar images, both ground and air, of the Korean 747. The two aircraft are distinctly different in shape and size. Their fighter aircraft also had visual contact with the Korean aircraft. The SU-15 and the MIG-23 aircraft pilots' voices are on the tape obtained by the United States and played for the congressional leadership never referred to the Korean aircraft as an RC-135, only as "the target."

They made no serious effort to identify the aircraft or to warn it. They did not appear to care what it was. Instead, they were intent on killing it. If the Soviets made a mistake in identification, which stretches the imagination, they have not said so to date. In fact, they have not to date admitted shooting down the Korean commercial aircraft with 269 people aboard. We continue to ask the Soviets for their full accounting of this incident. The presence of a U.S. reconnaissance aircraft on a routine monitoring mission to assure Soviet compliance with treaty obligations some 1,000 miles and 2 1/2 hours flight time from the scene of the shoot down in no way excuses or explains this act which speaks for itself. In fact, the RC-135 in question at the time that KAL flight 007 was shot down had been on the ground at its home base in Alaska for more than one hour.

Now, that is the end of the statement which I think is being handed out to you. I do want to add one other fact because I am told that it has been a question.

Our aircraft, that is the RC-135, was not monitoring commercial aircraft, and did not know that the Korean aircraft was, of course, in jeopardy. I have with me. . . . As I indicated to you, I really cannot go any further on the question of the RC-135, but between us, we would be glad to try to answer any questions you may have on the speech.

Q. What are the negotiations you are suspending?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The fact sheet there—well, it's done in a general way. But to be a bit more specific, let me be a little more specific there. For example, as I think you will know, we were in the process of discussions with the Soviets which would return us to negotiations on opening a Kiev council [consulate]. We were in discussions with the Soviets on resuming negotiations on a cultural agreement. Those two will be suspended. I think there is in the fact sheet a specific reference to the transporation agreement. [80]

Q. What is that?

Q. What is the transportation agreement?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. There's an agreement—you probably can explain this in more detail than I—there's an agreement between the Soviets and the United States on transportation. I'll now let the brains explain it further.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. This was an agreement that was signed in the mid-seventies—frankly, I don't remember precisely what the year of original signing was—which recently expired. And the question was, should it be renewed.

[80] Reference is to the Agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union on Cooperation in Transportation, which entered into force on June 19, 1973; for text, see 24 UST 1463. This agreement was amended and extended for 2 years on June 19, 1978, with the provision of extension for an additional 3 years unless terminated by one of the parties at least 30 days before June 19, 1980; for text, see 30 UST 1584.

Q. What is the practical effect of not renewing? What does it do?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The agreement itself again covers several areas of transporation, including civil aviation, civil aviation cooperation. These are cooperative research and other cooperative efforts. As a matter of fact, since the invasion of Afghanistan, activity under the agreement was reduced and one of the new areas we had some projects going under is civil aviation. I think this was one. Given that fact, it's particularly inappropriate at this time to renew until we can receive assurances that the Soviets are no longer threatening the safety of civil aviation.

Q. You mentioned this transportation agreement which no one seems to know too much about, that it just expired but you were not going to renew it. What it says on the fact sheet was in fact it was renewed for 18 months in June of this year and now you are cancelling the renewal. Which is correct?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me tell you the specific situation and if the fact sheet says 18 months it is, I think, wrong.

Q. They also say—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The agreement expired, I think, at the end of August. We will get you the exact facts. We were in discussions with the Soviets about a renewal of that agreement. We had sent a diplomatic note in fact to the Soviet Union saying we were prepared to extend the agreement for 6 months while we discussed renewing it for a greater length of time. We have now withdrawn that note which informed the Soviet Union that we were prepared to extend it for the 6 months while we discussed a further or a renegotiation or a pursuit of the agreement so that we have withdrawn the note to the Soviets which would have extended it for 6 months. It is now, therefore, expired.

Yes, sir?

Q. What is your view of the Carter administration sanctions that they took after Afghanistan, boycott of the Olympics and the grain embargo? Was it your view that, the administration's view, that this does more harm than good and is that why you are not pursuing this kind of thing?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think the view of this administration with regard to the grain embargo is clear. It was clear when the President was campaigning for office. In addition as you know we now have legislation which makes a grain embargo even more difficult to impose.

With regard to the Olympic sanctions I won't argue at all that those actions were important and should have been taken—for example, the Olympic sanctions. But I am simply saying that with regard to this specific case and without trying to get into an argument about whether Poland deserves more sanctions or less than this event, it is our judgment that the best way to proceed in response to this act is to deal with it particularly in the area of civil aviation, at the same time, by the way and they are in the fact sheet, but pursuing claims on the part of those who have been injured or killed, the families of those who were killed but to pursue it in the civil aviation area while recognizing that with regard to the general question of dealing with the Soviet Union the way you deal with them is in the broader aspects that I have tried to identify.

Yes, sir?

Q. Is it also true—

Q. Could you tell us the three negotiations that you have suspended or cancelled, are those the only ones that you mentioned or are there more?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. There are those three, yes.

Q. Could your statement be taken to mean that no further bilateral actions stemming directly from this are contemplated by the United States?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No. you can't take it at that. You can simply take it as a statement that as of this time right now these are the steps that the President wishes to take. All I am saying then is I can't predict what further actions he may decide in the next weeks to take.

. . . . . .

Q. Can we just try one more on this Kiev council [consulate]; just what is is? Is this a council—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Factual.

Q. You are not going to open; is that what it is?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Got it. We were in the process of negotiating for the opening of a consulate, a U.S. consulate in Kiev, and a Soviet consulate in New York prior to the Afghan invasion. At the time of the Afghan invasion, President Carter stopped those negotiations. Earlier this year we began again with the Soviets discussions of opening a U.S. consulate in Kiev, and a Soviet consulate in New York. We have now suspended those discussions.

THE PRESS. Thank you.

Address by President Reagan, September 5, 1983 [81]

U.S. Measures In Response to the Soviets' "Korean Airline Massacre"

My fellow Americans, I'm coming before you tonight about the Korean airline massacre—the attack by the Soviet Union against 269 innocent men, women, and children aboard an unarmed Korean passenger plane. This crime against humanity must never be forgotten, here or throughout the world.

Our prayers tonight are with the victims and their families in their time of terrible grief. Our hearts go out to them—to brave people like Kathryn McDonald, the wife of a Congressman whose composure and eloquence on the day of her husband's death moved us all. He will be sorely missed by all of us here in government.

The parents of one slain couple wired me: "Our daughter . . . and her husband . . . died on Korean Airline Flight 007. Their deaths were the result of the Soviet Union violating every concept of human rights." [82] The emotions of these parents—grief, shock, anger—are shared by civilized people everywhere. From around the world press accounts reflect an explosion of condemnation by people everywhere.

Let me state as plainly as I can: There was absolutely no justification, either legal or moral, for what the Soviets did. One newspaper in India said, "If every passenger plane . . . is fair game for home air forces . . . it will be the end to civil aviation as we know it."

This is not the first time the Soviet Union has shot at and hit a civilian airliner when it overflew its territory. In another tragic incident in 1978, the Soviets also shot down an unarmed civilian airliner after having positively identified it as such. In that instance, the Soviet interceptor pilot clearly identified the civilian markings on the side of the aircraft, repeatedly questioned the order to fire on a civilian airliner, and was ordered to shoot it down anyway. The aircraft was hit with a missile and made a crash landing. Several innocent people lost their lives in this attack—killed by shrapnel from the blast of a Soviet missile.

Is this a practice of other countries in the world? The answer is no. Commercial aircraft from the Soviet Union and Cuba on a number of occasions have overflown sensitive United States military facilities. They weren't shot down. We and other civilized countries believe in the tradition of offering help to mariners and pilots who are lost or in distress, on the sea or in the air. We believe in following procedures to prevent a tragedy, not to provoke one.

But despite the savagery of their crime, the universal reaction against it, and the evidence of their complicity, the Soviets still refuse to tell the truth. They have persistently refused to admit that their pilot fired on the Korean aircraft. Indeed, they've not even told their own people that a plane was shot down.

They have spun a confused tale of tracking the plane by radar until it just mysteriously disappeared from their radar screens, but no one fired a shot of any kind. But, then, they coupled this with charges that it was a spy plane sent by us and that their planes fired tracer bullets past the plane as a warning that it was in Soviet air space.

Let me recap for a moment and present the incontrovertible evidence that we have. The Korean airliner, a Boeing 747, left Anchorage, Alaska, bound for Seoul, Korea, on a course south and west which would take it across Japan. Out over the Pacific, in international waters, it was for a brief time in the vicinity of one of our reconnaissance planes, an RC–135 on a routine mission. At no time was the RC–135 in Soviet air space. The Korean airliner flew on and the two planes were soon widely separated.

The 747 is equipped with the most modern computerized navigation facilities, but a computer must respond to input provided by human hands. No one will ever know whether a mistake was made in giving the computer the course or whether there was a malfunction. Whichever, the 747 was flying a course further to the west than it was supposed to fly—a course which took it into Soviet air space.

The Soviets tracked this plane for 2 1/2 hours while it flew a straight line course at 30–35,000 feet. Only civilian airliners fly in such a manner. At one point, the Korean pilot gave Japanese air control his position as east of Hokkaido, Japan, showing that he was unaware they were off course by as much or more than 100 miles.

The Soviets scrambled jet interceptors from a base in Sakhalin Island.

Japanese ground sites recorded the interceptor plane's radio transmissions—their conversations with their own ground control. We only have the voices from the pilots; the Soviet ground to air transmissions were not recorded. It's plain, however, from the pilot's words that he's responding to orders and queries from his own ground control.

Here's a brief segment of the tape which we're going to play in its entirety for the United Nations Security Council tomorrow.

Those were the voices of the Soviet pilots. In this tape, the pilot who fired the missile describes his search for what he calls the target. He reports he has it in sight, indeed he pulls up to within about a mile of the Korean plane, mentions its flashing strobe light and that its navigation lights are on. He then reports he's reducing speed to get behind the airliner, gives his distance from the plane at various points in this maneuver, and finally announces what can only be called the "Korean Airline Massacre." He says he has locked on the radar, which aims his missiles, has launched those missiles, the target has been destroyed, and he is breaking off the attack.

Let me point out something here having to do with his close up view of the airliner on what we know was a clear night with a half moon. The 747 has a unique and distinctive silhouette unlike any other plane in the world. There is no way a pilot could mistake this for anything other than a civilian airliner. And if that isn't enough, let me point out our RC–135 that I mentioned earlier had been back at its base in Alaska, on the ground, for an hour when the murderous attack took place over the Sea of Japan.

And make no mistake about it, this attack was not just against ourselves or the Republic of Korea. This was the Soviet Union against the world and the moral precepts which guide human relations among people everywhere. It was an act of barbarism, born of a society which wantonly disregards individual rights and the value of human life and seeks constantly to expand and dominate other nations.

They deny the deed, but in their conflicting and misleading protestations, the Soviets reveal that, yes, shooting down a plane—even one with hundreds of innocent men, women, children, and babies—is a part of their normal procedure if that plane is in what they claim as their air space.

They owe the world an apology and an offer to join the rest of the world in working out a system to protect against this ever happening again. Among the rest of us there is one protective measure: An international radio wave length on which pilots can communicate with planes of other nations if they are in trouble or lost. Soviet military planes are not so equipped because that would make it easier for pilots who might want to defect.

Our request to send vessels into Soviet waters to search for wreckage and bodies has received no satisfactory answer. Bereaved families of the Japanese victims were harassed by Soviet patrol boats when they tried to get near where the plane is believed to have gone down in order to hold a ceremony for their dead. But we shouldn't be surprised by such inhuman brutality. Memories come back of Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, the gassing of villages in Afghanistan. If the massacre and their subsequent conduct is intended to intimidate, they have failed in their purpose. From every corner of the globe the word is defiance in the face of this unspeakable act and defiance of the system which excuses it and tries to cover it up. With our horror and our sorrow, there is a righteous and terrible anger. It would be easy to think in terms of vengeance, but that is not a proper answer. We want justice and action to see that this never happens again.

Our immediate challenge to this atrocity is to ensure that we make the skies safer and that we seek just compensation for the families of those who were killed.

Since my return to Washington, we have held long meetings, the most recent yesterday with congressional leadership. There was a feeling of unity in the room, and I received a number of constructive suggestions. We will continue to work with the Congress regarding our response to this massacre.

As you know, we immediately made known to the world the shocking facts as honestly and completely as they came to us.

We have notified the Soviets that we will not renew our bilateral agreement for cooperation in the field of transportation so long as they threaten the security of civil aviation.

Since 1981, the Soviet airline Aeroflot has been denied the right to fly to the United States. We have reaffirmed that order and are examining additional steps we can take with regard to Aeroflot facilities in this country. We are cooperating with other countries to find better means to ensure the safety of civil aviation and to join us in not accepting Aeroflot as a normal member of the international civil air community unless, and until, the Soviets satisfy the cries of humanity for justice. I am pleased to report that Canada today suspended Aeroflot's landing and refueling privileges for 60 days.

We have joined with other countries to press the International Civil Aviation Organization to investigate this crime at an urgent special session of the Council. At the same time, we're listening most carefully to private groups, both American and international, airline pilots, passenger associations and others, who have a special interest in civil air safety.

I am asking the Congress to pass a joint resolution of condemnation of this Soviet crime.

We have informed the Soviets that we're suspending negotiations on several bilateral arrangements we had under consideration.

Along with Korea and Japan, we called an emergency meeting of the U.N. Security Council which began on Friday.[83] On that first day, Korea, Japan, Canada, Australia, the Netherlands, Pakistan, France, China, the United Kingdom, Zaire, New Zealand, and West Germany all joined us in denouncing the Soviet action and expressing our horror. We expect to hear from additional countries as debate resumes tomorrow.

We intend to work with the thirteen countries who had citizens aboard the Korean airliner to seek reparations for the families of all those who were killed. The United States will be making a claim against the Soviet Union within the next week to obtain compensation for the benefit of the victims' survivors. Such compensation is an absolute moral duty which the Soviets must assume.

In the economic area in general, we're redoubling our efforts with our allies to end the flow of military and strategic items to the Soviet Union.

Secretary Shultz is going to Madrid to meet with representatives of 35 countries who, for 3 years, have been negotiating an agreement having to do with, among other things, human rights. Foreign Minister Gromyko of the Soviet Union is scheduled to attend that meeting. If he does come to the meeting, Secretary Shultz is going to present him with our demands for disclosure of the facts, corrective actions, and concrete assurances that such a thing will not happen again and that restitution be made.

As we work with other countries to see that justice is done, the real test of our resolve is whether we have the will to remain strong, steady and united. I believe more than ever, as evidenced by your thousands and thousands of wires and phone calls in these last few days, that we do.

I have outlined some of the steps we're taking in response to the tragic massacre. There is something I've always believed in, but which now seems more important than ever: The Congress will be facing key national security issues when it returns from recess. There has been legitimate difference of opinion on this subject, I know, but I urge the Members of that distinguished body to ponder long and hard the Soviets' aggression as they consider the security and safety of our people, indeed all people who believe in freedom.

Senator Henry Jackson, a wise and revered statesman and one who probably understood the Soviets as well as any American in history, warned us, "The greatest threat the United States now faces is posed by the Soviet Union." But, Senator Jackson said: "If America maintains a strong deterrent—and only if it does—this Nation will continue to be a leader in the crucial quest for enduring peace among nations."

The late Senator made those statements in July on the Senate floor speaking in behalf of the MX missile program he considered vital to restore America's strategic parity with the Soviets.

When John F. Kennedy was President, defense spending as a share of the Federal budget was 70 percent greater than it is today. Since then, the Soviet Union has carried on the most massive military buildup the world has ever seen. Until they are willing to join the rest of the world community, we must maintain the strength to deter their aggression.

But while we do so, we must not give up our effort to bring them into the world community of nations. Peace through strength as long as necessary but never giving up our effort to bring peace closer through mutual, verifiable reduction in the weapons of war.

I've told you of negotiations we've suspended as a result of the Korean airline massacre, but we cannot, we must not give up our effort to reduce the arsenals of destructive weapons threatening the world. Ambassador Nitze has returned to Geneva to resume the negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear weapons in Europe. Equally, we will continue to press for arms reductions in the START talks that resume in October. We are more determined than ever to reduce and, if possible, eliminate the threat hanging over mankind.

We know it will be hard to make a nation that rules its own people through force to cease using force against the rest of the world. But we must try.

This is not a role we sought—we preach no manifest destiny. But like Americans who began this country and brought forth this last, best hope of mankind, history has asked much of the Americans of our own time. Much we have already given. Much more we must be prepared to give.

Let us have faith, in Abraham Lincoln's words, "that right makes might, and in that faith, let us, to the end, dare to do our duty as we understand it." If we do, if we stand together and move forward with courage, then history will record that some good did come from this monstrous wrong that we will carry with us, and remember for the rest of our lives.

Thank you, God bless you, and good night.

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) in the U.N. Security Council, September 6, 1983 [84]

"The Transcript We Have Just Heard . . . Establishes That the Soviets Decided To Shoot Down This Civilian Airliner, Shot It Down, Murdering the 269 Persons Aboard, and Lied About It"

Most of the world outside the Soviet Union has heard by now of the Korean flight 007 carrying 269 persons between New York and Seoul which strayed off course into Soviet air space, was tracked by Soviet radar, was targeted by a Soviet SU-15 whose pilot coolly, and after careful consultation, fired two air-launched missiles which destroyed the plane and, apparently, its 269 passengers and crew.

This calculated attack on a civilian airliner—unarmed, undefended, as civilian airliners always are—has shocked the world.

Only the Soviet people have still not heard about this attack on KAL–007 and death of the passengers because the Soviet Government has not acknowledged firing on the Korean airliner. Indeed, not until September 5 did Soviet officials acknowledge that KAL–007 had disappeared in its icy waters. [85]

The Soviet Government has not been silent about the plane, it has merely lied.

On September 1, Foreign Minister Gromyko announced that:

"An unidentified plane coming from the direction of the Pacific Ocean, entered the air space of the Soviet Union over the Kamchatka Peninsula and then for the second time violated the Soviet air space over the Sakhalin Island. The plane did not have navigation lights, did not respond to queries and did not enter into contact with the radio control service.

"Fighters of the Anti-Aircraft Defense, which were sent aloft towards the intruder plane, tried to give it assistance in directing it to the nearest airfield. But the intruder plane did not react to the signals and warnings from the Soviet fighters and continued its flight in the direction of the Sea of Japan." [86]

The next day, September 2, TASS repeated Gromyko's charge that Soviet airspace had been rudely violated by "an unidentified plane" which "in violation of international regulations" . . . flew without navigation lights . . ." [87] TASS referred to efforts to establish contacts with the plane "using generally accepted signals and to take it to the nearest airfield in the territory of the Soviet Union. Over the Sakhalin Island," they said, "a Soviet aircraft fired warning shots with tracer shells along the flying route of the plane. Soon after this the intruder plane left the limits of Soviet air space and continued its flight toward the Sea of Japan. For about 10 minutes it was within the observation zone of radio location means, after which it could be observed no more. . . ." [88]

Yesterday, when Soviet General Romanov finally admitted that the Korean plane had crashed killing "numerous" people, he also asserted, "the jetliner was flying with its lights out. . . ."

This is what TASS said, but we do not have to wonder about what really happened to the airliner, or when it happened, or what Soviet officials knew about its fate. We know, because we know what the Soviet pilots who intercepted the Korean airliner over the Sakhalin Island said to their ground controllers during the 50-minute period from 17:56 to 18:46 on August 31 while they tracked, discussed and destroyed the Korean airliner and its passengers.

The U.S. Government in cooperation with the Government of Japan has decided to spread the evidence before this Council and the world. It is available on the video tape I am about to play. On this tape you will hear the voices of the pilots of Soviet interceptors—which included three SU–15 Flagons and one MIG–23 Flogger, including the SU–15 pilot who pulled the trigger which released the missiles that destroyed Korean Airlines flight 007. While it is obvious that the pilots are acknowledging instructions from ground controllers, those instructions are not audible. What I am about to play back for you is the intercepted tape of the actual air-to-ground reports; it is of course in Russian; on the monitor screens you will see, simultaneously, the original Russian and the English translation; through your audio system you will listen to these voices in translation into all the working languages of the United Nations. (Immediately following my presentation, Mr. President, the Russian-to-English transcript will be made available to all who may wish to study it.[89] After this session of the Security Council an audio cassette on which voices are still clearer will be provided to any interested mission.)

Nothing was cut from this tape. The recording was made on a voice-actuated recorder and, therefore, it covers only those periods of time when conversation was heard.

(Play tape)

The transcript we have just heard, Mr. President, needs little explanation. Quite simply, it establishes that the Soviets decided to shoot down this civilian airliner, shot it down, murdering the 269 persons aboard, and lied about it.

The transcript of the pilots' cockpit conversations illuminates several key points.

—The interceptor which shot KAL–007 down had the airliner in sight for over 20 minutes before firing his missiles.

—Contrary to what the Soviets have repeatedly stated, the interceptor pilot saw the airliner's navigation lights and reported that fact to the ground on three occasions.

—Contrary to Soviet statements, the pilot makes no mention of firing any warning shots, only the firing of the missiles which he said struck the "target."

—Contrary to Soviet statements, there is no indication whatsoever that the interceptor pilot made any attempt either to communicate with the airliner, or to signal for it to land in accordance with accepted international practice. Indeed the Soviet interceptor planes may be technically incapable of communicating by radio with civilian aircraft presumably out of fear of Soviet pilot defections.

—Perhaps the most shocking fact learned from the transcript is that at no point did the pilots raise the question of the identity of the target aircraft nor at any time did the interceptor pilots refer to it as anything other than the "target". The only activity bearing on the identity of the aircraft was a statement by the pilot of the attacking interceptor that "the target isn't responding to IFF." This means the aircraft did not respond to the electronic interrogation by which military aircraft identify friends or foes (IFF). But, of course, the Korean airliner could not have responded to IFF because commercial aircraft are not equipped to do so.

We know the interceptor which shot down KAL–007 flew behind, alongside, and in front of the airliner (coming at least as close as 2 kilometers) before dropping back behind the plane and firing his missiles. At a distance of two kilometers under the conditions prevailing at that time, it was easily possible to identify a 747 passenger airliner. Either the Soviets knew the Korean plane was a commercial airliner or he did not know his target was a civilian passenger airliner. If the latter, then he fired his deadly missiles without knowing or caring what they would hit. Though he could easily have pulled up to within some number of meters of the airliner to assure its identity, but did not bother to do so. In either case there was shocking disregard for human life and international norms.

In the days following the destruction of KAL–007, Soviet leaders and the Soviet press have said they do not understand what all the fuss is about. They began by accusing the United States of creating a "hulabaloo" about nothing, and more recently they have accused us of a "provocation"—implying, though never quite saying, that we "provoked" them into shooting down an airliner that strayed into their space, "provoked" them into violating the internationally agreed upon standards and practices of behavior. They have spoken as though a plane's straying off course is a crime punishable by death. They have suggested that "like any self-respecting state, [they][90] are doing no more than looking after [their] sovereignty which [they] shall permit no one to violate." (From a newscast, September 4, 1983, Moscow Domestic Television Series.) They have claimed still without acknowledging that they shot down the Korean airliner that "our antiaircraft defense has fulfilled its duty for the defense of the security of our motherland." They have suggested that they may have mistaken the Korean airliner for an American reconnaissance plane, but still do not admit that they attacked and destroyed it.

But none of these lies, half lies and excuses can withstand examination. Straying off course is not recognized as a capital crime by civilized nations. And no nation has the sovereign right to shoot down any person or vehicle that may stray across its border in peacetime. There are internationally agreed upon standards for intercepting unwelcome aircraft. They call for serious efforts at identification, verification, warning, and if the case is serious, for intercepting the intruder and forcing it to land or to leave one's airspace. Sovereignty neither requires nor permits shooting down airliners in peacetime.

Recently the Soviets have implied that the KAL-007 may have been mistaken for a U.S. (aerial) reconnaissance flight. But that is no more persuasive. The Korean Boeing 747 was on a routine scheduled flight. At the time it was shot down the U.S. reconnaissance plane referred to by the Soviets had been on the ground 1,500 miles away for more than an hour.

Moreover, the United States does not fly reconnaissance missions in Soviet airspace. We do regularly operate aircraft in international airspace to monitor Soviet compliance with SALT and other arms control agreements. The Soviets know what our usual flight patterns are and can readily identify these missions.

Finally, neither the United States nor any other country upset about the slaughter of the 269 passengers of KAL-007 is creating a "hulabaloo" by exaggerating the importance of the events. We are protesting very important violations of the norms of civilized conduct on which international aviation rests, without which it will not be possible for any of us to board airliners, fly across continents and oceans without fear of being the object of a murderous attack. To a degree we rarely consider, international air travel depends on networks of mutual trust that we will not shoot down one another's airliners, kidnap, jail, or poison passengers and crews.

Why did the Soviet Union violate these norms— why have they lied about it? Two reasons are most often advanced to explain why the Soviet pilot shot down the airliner. One is that it was a mistake—the mistake of a trigger happy pilot who with his ground controller followed a philosophy of shoot now, identify later.

But if pilot error was responsible for this tragic mistake, why has the Soviet Government not said so? Why has it lied, and why is it complementing its murderous attack on KAL-007 with a lying attack on the United States for provocation and aggression?

As I considered this question my mind returned to a debate that took place in this Security Council twenty one years ago when my distinguished predecessor, Adlai Stevenson, called the attention of the Council to the "unmistakable evidence" that a series of facilities for launching offensive nuclear missiles were being installed in the Western Hemisphere. Soviet Representative Zorin flatly denied the charges and, as Soviet Representatives so often do, coupled his lying denial with a vicious attack on the United States. Our calling attention to threatening Soviet behavior, Zorin asserted, only masked the U.S. own aggression and piracy. But Adlai Stevenson, too, had the photographic evidence to back up his charge[91]—as irrefutable as the audio tapes we have today.

The fact is that violence and lies are regular instruments of Soviet policy. Soviet officials regularly behave as though truth were only a function of force and will—as if the truth were only what they said it is; as if violence were an instrument of first resort in foreign affairs. They occupy Afghanistan and accuse the U.S. of interference in internal affairs. They create massive new European vulnerabilities with their SS-20's and accuse NATO of seeking to upset the balance of power.

[91] Reference is to the exchanges between Stevenson and Zorin in the U.N. Security Council on October 25, 1962, during the Cuban missile crisis.

We think otherwise. We believe that truth is as vital to cooperation and peace among nations as among people.

It is depressing to consider seriously our global prospects if they must be built on relations devoid of truth, devoid of trust. It is depressing to consider a world in which a major nation equipped with the most powerful modern weapons believes it has a sovereign right to fire on a commercial airliner lost over its territory. These Soviet actions and claims illuminate the Soviet conception of appropriate relations among nations in peacetime. They illuminate the world in which we live and work and make policy.

Of course, some sophisticated observers believe that the destruction of flight 007 was not the work of an isolated Strangelove, unconcerned about human life, but was instead a deliberate stroke designed to intimidate—a brutal, decisive act meant to instill fear and hesitation in all who observed its ruthless violence much as the destruction of Afghan villagers or the imprisonment of the Helsinki monitors are intended to secure compliance through terror.

Whichever the case—whether the destruction of KAL-007 and its passengers reflects only utter indifference to human life or whether it was designed to intimidate—we are dealing here not with pilot error but with decisions and priorities characteristic of a system. Not only did Soviet officials shoot down a stray commercial airliner and lie about it, they have callously refused offers of international participation in search and rescue efforts in spite of clearly stated "International Standards and Recommended Practices" of the International Civil Aviation Organization, which call on states to "grant any necessary permission for the entry of such aircraft, vessels, personnel or equipment into its territory and make necessary arrangements . . . with a view to expediting such entry."

We are reminded once again that the Soviet Union is a state based on the dual principles of callousness and mendacity. It is dedicated to the rule of force. Here is how Lenin described the "dictatorship of the proletariat" in 1920: "The scientific concept of 'dictatorship' means nothing more than unrestricted power, absolutely unimpeded by law or regulations and resting directly on force." (The Fifth Russian Edition of Lenin's Collected Works, Vol. 41, p. 383.)

It is this principle of force—this mentality of force—that lies at the root of the Korean Airline tragedy. This is the reality revealed to the world by this horrible tragedy. It is a reality that we all must ponder as we consider the threats to peace and human rights that face all of us today.

The United States deeply believes that immediate steps should be taken here in the United Nations to decrease the likelihood of any repetition of the tragedy of KAL-007. We ask our colleagues to join with us in the coming days in the effort to wrest from the tragedy of KAL-007 new clarity about the character of our world, and new constructive efforts to render us all more secure in the air and on the ground.

Thank you.

Statement by the Acting Secretary of State (Eagleburger), September 6, 1983 [92]

"Today the Soviet Government At Last Admitted That Its Forces Shot Down KAL #007 . . . . Today's Release Continues To Lie to the World but Also Raises the Most Serious Questions About the Competence of the Soviet Air Defense System"

Today the Soviet Government at last admitted that its forces shot down KAL #007.[93] Their confession comes only after the truth was known everywhere, that the U.S.S.R., without any justification, shot down an unarmed civilian airliner with 269 people aboard. And their admission was made only after the entire civilized world had condemned the Soviet action. Yet the Soviet Union has still not apologized, nor has it accepted responsibility for this atrocity. On the contrary, the Soviet Government states flatly that it will take the same action in the future in similar circumstances.

The international community is thus being asked to accept that the Soviet Union is not bound by the norms of international behavior and human decency to which virtually all other nations subscribe.

The Soviet Government statement claims that the Soviet air defense forces concluded that the Korean airliner was a reconnaissance plane on a spying mission. It strains credulity to accept the argument that the Soviets, after more than 2 1/2 hours of tracking, and after the SU-15 that later shot down KAL #007 had moved to approximately 1 mile from the Korean aircraft, failed to identify the KAL airliner for what it was—a distinctively shaped Boeing 747 commercial aircraft. Despite statements by the Soviet Government to the contrary, it is clear from the recording of the Soviet interceptor pilots' conversations with ground control that the Korean airliner's navigation lights were, in fact, illuminated. The recording reveals no warnings given to the doomed KAL flight.

The statement that attempts were made on the international distress frequency—121.5 megacycles—is not borne out by the facts. Even if the Soviet aircraft had that capability—which we do not believe—there is no evidence on the tapes of the Soviet pilots making any such transmission. The Korean airliner's radios were working prior to the shootdown—as evidenced by the position reports made by the pilot to Japanese ground radio stations up to the time he was blasted out of the sky by a Soviet fighter. These transmissions were remarkable only by the routine nature of the conversations.

Just as there is no indication that the Soviet fighters attempted to contact the innocent airliner using the established international procedures, there is no indication that the airliner was either aware of or trying to evade the Soviet fighters or even that it was aware of the presence of those aircraft. Tragically, there is no indication that the Korean airliner even thought it was off course.

Previous Soviet accounts have been demonstrated by this most recent statement to be, at a minimum, grossly misleading. Today's release continues to lie to the world but also raises the most serious questions about the competence of the Soviet air defense system, with all the danger that implies.

The world community still needs straight answers. We are tired of lies and half-truths. Decent respect for the opinion of mankind requires that:

The Soviet Union must provide a full accounting of what transpired;

It must make an unequivocal apology for its actions;

It must make restitution for the victims' families; and

It must cooperate with international efforts to investigate this tragedy and to recover its victims.

The Soviet Union must accept the norms of civilized society in respecting the lives of innocent travelers. The world demands that the Soviet Union give assurances and take specific steps to ensure that the events of August 31 cannot occur again.

Reaction To Gromyko's Speech at the CSCE Conference

I have just these comments on Minister Gromyko's speech, and have the text of it here and particularly I want to comment on what he said about the Korean Airline shootdown. He says, first, "We state Soviet territory, the borders of the Soviet Union are sacred."

There is no weight given in that statement to the human values involved in an airliner crossing those borders by mistake, or a ship getting off-course. It is an unequivocal statement in favor of the security dimension with no weight whatever to the human values involved, when you have a boat or a plane that is lost at sea or in the air. That expresses very well one of the differences between our societies.

He goes on and talks about a juggling of facts and falsehoods. I would have to say that from the very beginning, we have heard nothing but falsehoods from the Soviet Union and it is disappointing to me to sit in that hall at a conference that is dedicated to human rights, to truth, and hear the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union continue to state these same falsehoods that have been going on all week long.

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Madrid, September 8, 1983 [95]

"Foreign Minister Gromyko's Response To Me Today Was . . . Totally Unacceptable"

The unprovoked Soviet destruction of a defenseless unarmed Korean airliner has underlined the basic themes of this conference in the most distressing conceivable way. This Madrid conference has been about the fundamental relationship between human rights and security. This brutal Soviet action has vividly displayed the Soviet Union's lack of concern for the human lives involved, and the preposterous explanation the Soviets have offered and continue to offer to a disbelieving world has only compounded the problem.

In his formal statement to the conference yesterday, Foreign Minister Gromyko made matters even worse by claiming that his country had the right to do what it did, and has the right to do it again.

My comments in our meeting this afternoon were appropriately focused on human rights, and particularly on the rights of people everywhere who expect decent regard for their lives and safety when they travel by air.

Foreign Minister Gromyko's response to me today was even more unsatisfactory than the response he gave in public yesterday. I find it totally unacceptable.

This is not the end of the matter. In the days and weeks ahead, the United States, along with others throughout the international community, will press hard for justice for the families of those murdered and safety and security for innocent travelers.

Shultz–Gromyko Meeting

Thank you, John. I am not going to make a lengthy statement. I will make a few points about the meeting. As you know even in these very extraordinary circumstances we have a practice of not commenting on our confidential discussions with the Soviet Union.

Q. Can you speak louder?

[A.] As you know, we do not comment on our confidential exchanges, but I will make a few brief points. As the Secretary of State stated, the meeting was from our perspective totally unsatisfactory because the Soviet Union and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko were completely insensitive to the concerns felt around the world created by the Korean airline massacre. The Secretary of State treated the Korean massacre as a human rights problem and addressed it in that context. Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko did not want to discuss this issue, but was made to discuss it at the meeting. The Soviet Foreign Minister had a different agenda, wanted to discuss arms control. He made a lengthy and somewhat stale presentation on Soviet support for arms control which included nothing new in the way of negotiating proposals and his presentation on arms control subjects, mainly INF, did not appear to demonstrate much flexibility in terms of the Geneva negotiations.

While our concern at the meeting was to focus on the Korean massacre as a human rights problem, the Secretary did describe President Reagan's strong commitment on arms control. His initiatives in different fora including strategic arms reduction talks, the mutual balance force reduction talks in Vienna, the INF negotiations where the United States has proposed that all INF missiles be eliminated and a complete ban in the chemical weapons area. But as I said, the focus of the Secretary of State's presentation was the Korean airline episode where he stated I think, the world community's case very forcefully, asking the Soviet Union not only for an explanation but for steps to insure that this episode would never take place again.

As in his public presentation yesterday, Foreign Minister Gromyko sought to shift the responsibility for this to the United States. It became clear in the meeting that further discussion on the subject was not going to be constructive and the Secretary of State suggested that the meeting come to an end. Which it did.

I will be happy to take your questions.

Q. In what respect was it worse today than—

[A.] I would only say that in terms of substance of the presentation the line was very similar to yesterday's. In terms of style, the Foreign Minister's presentation was more aggressive.

Q. Sir, you said that—(inaudible) and the statement in front of us says that this is not the end of the matter. Does this imply then that the meeting in New York between the two Foreign Ministers would also not take place?

Q. Can you describe—did Shultz talk first or did Gromyko talk first and how long did it take Shultz to lay out his views, or his piece?

[A.] . . . , I don't really want to go into that kind of detail. I think that they Omitted is the introduction by Department of State Spokesman John Hughes, who explained the ground rules for this background briefing.

both had a chance to go back and forth. There was some discussion early on in the meeting about the agenda along the lines I suggested. The Soviet Foreign Minister did not early on in the meeting want to address the airliner incident at all.

Q. Can you then on a different level, can you talk about whether all of this is really a lot of sound and fury and nothing is going to come of it, since you don't seem to be getting a lot of rush to cooperate on any kinds of actions?

[A.] Well, first of all that's not correct. And the purpose of this press conference is not to talk about those actions. But that is incorrect. Second of all, it is not all sound and fury. Just based on the speeches that you've undoubtedly listened to here at this conference. From the fair sample of world opinion, it is clear that people are very upset about the massacre. And as the Secretary of State's statement following his meeting with Gromyko makes clear, this is not the end of the matter. We are going to continue along with other countries to push this question, to demand an explanation, and to demand that the Soviet Union take steps to insure that we don't see this happen again.

Q. I think you have to give us a little bit more of how it went since it is important for the substance. You seem to suggest that Gromyko perhaps had spoken first about arms control. The Secretary made some comment on arms control, which is a question he had said earlier he would not talk about anything else. And secondly he seemed to talk about the plane incident and Gromyko then apparently started giving an explanation and the impression you gave was that the Secretary then cut him off in the middle.

[A.] Well, . . . you're trying to put a lot of words into my mouth mainly designed to give you more information. We normally, in these cases, and I've briefed on other Gromyko meetings, I think we've gone into as much detail today as we have in previous meetings. There was a discussion early on in the meeting about the agenda. There was a fairly lengthy and typical Soviet statement about arms control. The Secretary of State defended the administration's position on arms control, making it clear that it was the United States that has come forward with innovative and imaginative approaches. But that conversation only took place after the Soviet Foreign Minister had agreed that he would discuss the airliner episode. In the discussion of the airliner episode, it became clear that Mr. Gromyko's line was the same as the one he presented in public yesterday. That is, that this was a U.S. responsibility, which is totally preposterous and unacceptable. The Soviet Union in today's meeting was insensitive to the concerns felt around the world by this heinous act.

Q. . . . Would you care to pass a judgment on the reaction in this conference to the Gromyko statement yesterday meaning, the speeches today, the mention or lack of mention. For instance, the Yugoslavs and the Rumanians did not mention it, others did.

[A.] Well, our judgment is that the countries, the vast majority of countries represented at this conference are greatly concerned.

Q. . . . , why did it take 2 hours? Were speakers using interpretation or was Gromyko listening to Shultz and then (inaudible).

[A.] Gromyko was speaking in Russian and that was being interpreted. And as your question implies, that tends to drag the meeting out somewhat.

Q. But he didn't ask for any interpretation of Shultz?

HUGHES. One back here.

Q. Yesterday Foreign Minister Gromyko said at the conference that it appeared that the Korean jet was actually doing some form of spy work. Did he repeat clearly these things to the Secretary?

[A.] I said earlier that the substance of the presentation closely paralleled what was said yesterday in public.

HUGHES. Mr. . . . .

Q. Can we say that the bulk of the conversation this afternoon dealt with the airliner?

[A.] I would say that it was a good portion of today's subject. I wouldn't want to get into fractions whether it was 60 percent, 40 percent, I don't think that is a very sensible way to describe it.

Q. On the agenda, the discussion on arms control there seemed to have been a bit of change in the position described to some of us on the plane. Then Shultz said he wouldn't talk about arms control if Gromyko raised it. I'm just wondering if he had to decide to have some discussion of this before he could get Gromyko to come to the meeting.

[A.] You didn't listen closely enough to what I had said. There was no negotiation about arms control going on in this meeting. What we heard was a stale reiteration of Soviet commitment to arms control with very little new in substance. And all that the Secretary of State did in a very forceful way was to defend the President's record in the area of arms control.

HUGHES. One in the back in the aisle there.

Q. How long. . . .

HUGHES. No, the gentlemen next to you. Go ahead.

Q. (Inaudible.) What do you think that the Russians have interest to shoot the plane?

HUGHES. (To . . .) What was the Russian motivation?

[A.] Well, I think the Soviets explained that pretty clearly. They consider their territory to be sacred and that anything that seems to overfly it runs the very serious risk of being shot down. In other words their territory rather than human life is sacred.

HUGHES. This gentlemen here in front of us.

Q. You said that Mr. Shultz called the meeting to an end. Was there at any point the indication that Mr. Gromyko was about to walk out or to leave?

HUGHES. Mr. . . . .

Q. I would like to ask two sort of unrelated questions. While we were in there, we were listening to the news broadcast which said that the U.S. fleet had started shelling in Lebanon. Did this matter come up in any way in today's meeting? And secondly, what happens now, did the two men say to each other we will talk about this again in New York? Did they express to each other any kind of future contacts on this subject or on any other subject?

HUGHES. Mr. . . . .

Q. Did Secretary Shultz use the word massacre? Or is that your word using the word massacre?

[A.] Well, he has certainly used that word publicly and I can't recall that off the top of my head whether he did or he didn't.

Q. Did he use it in the meeting?

Q. Did the Secretary bring up other human rights matters, the Helsinki monitoring groups, immigration matters?

[A.] I think because he treated this issue in the human rights context that you can assume that he did.

HUGHES. . . .

Q. As you know, on Friday the Secretary said that there might not be a meeting at the UN with Mr. Gromyko if the answers here still were not satisfactory. Does he plan to meet Foreign Minister Gromyko at the UN or not?

HUGHES. Over here.

Q. How far do you think that this meeting with Gromyko will change the content, the subject of Shultz's speech tomorrow at the conference?

[A.] That's—I think the meeting has just taken place—It is something we'll consider prior to the speech.

HUGHES. Mr. . . .

Q. Mr. . . . How would you describe Soviet-American relations now?

[A.] Well, I don't really want to say too much about that simply because that we again have to think about the implications of this meeting and assess it. We've said before that the massacre has had an adverse impact. That's an obvious point to make. I think a more important point to make though is that this episode of the massacre itself is not a U.S.-Soviet problem. A more appropriate question to ask is what does the Korean airliner incident mean for the Soviet Union's relationship with the rest of the world? It's standing within the international community.

Q. Sir, there was a report that following today's meeting between Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Fernando Moran, the Spanish Foreign Minister, that Mr. Gromyko told Mr. Moran or suggested that the decision to shoot down the South Korean plane was taken at a local level. Has any of this surfaced during today's meeting with Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Shultz or has there been any news of this version?

[A.] Well, I'm not going to comment on a news report about another meeting. I just will say that we found that the Soviet Union is insensitive to the desires of the world to find out the true explanation and sought instead to claim as he did yesterday that this was a U.S. responsibility.

HUGHES. Go ahead, no, no, right next to you. No, the gentleman there. Go ahead.

Q. The Secretary's statement says that the United States will press hard along with others throughout the international community for justice. Now that you've had the chance to talk to other people here, what forms of pressure do you expect to take?

HUGHES. Well, we have purposely not talked specifically about these things because we are consulting with our friends about various steps that can be taken. And I don't think it's very useful now to say much in public about this although I can reiterate the kinds of things that the President of the United States said in his speech earlier this week.

Q. Do you think anything will actually develop at all?

Q. I just wanted to ask about this question about where the decision to shoot down the airliner had been taken. Did you actually pose that question?

[A.] There were a number of questions posed to Gromyko and none of the answers, to the extent there were answers, were satisfactory.

Q. Are you not worried that by pushing this onto the schedule you may undermine or endanger the spirit of Madrid?

[A.] Well, it seems to me that as the Secretary of State pointed out that the spirit of Madrid is all about the relationship between security and human rights. What better example of steps that endanger the spirit of Madrid than a country that not only downs a defenseless airliner but then refuses to accept responsibility for that act and as such tells the world that it is prepared to do the same thing again.

Q. (Garbled)

HUGHES. We will take a couple more questions. We have one here in the aisle.

Q. Were the only subjects of conversation the airliner, disarmament and other human rights issues?

HUGHES. . . .

Q. Can I try once more? I didn't mean to. If I offended you in asking my earlier questions, it's just that day after day here we keep—Gromyko escalates and Shultz responds and there is at least in my impression listening to this a much higher level of, you know, a higher pitch to this whole thing and Shultz was obviously very emotional when we spoke there today. How can all of that not have some effect on U.S.-Soviet relations? And what effect does it have? Because you all have been saying it doesn't affect the chances of INF or any of the specific arms control talks.

[A.] Well, the President has taken a very important decision which is, that it is in the interest of the United States, it is in the interest of the world to seek meaningful and verifiable arms control agreements. That said, this is an issue which cuts to the core of basic concerns about human rights and I think you are correct. The Secretary of State and the President feel very strongly about this question.

HUGHES. We will take one more here.

Q. You made Andrei Gromyko talk about something he doesn't want to talk about. You used the word "made"—the Secretary made him discuss the airliner.

What in fact did Mr. Gromyko proceed with?

HUGHES. Unless either . . . or . . . .

HUGHES. O.K. Thank you gentlemen.

Statement Read by the Department of State Acting Spokesman (Romberg), September 8, 1983 [97]

Closing of Soviet Airline Aeroflot Airlines in the United States

As directed by the President, Acting Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger informed Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin today that the Soviet airline Aeroflot must close its offices in the United States by September 15 and that airline officials must depart this country by September 15. This is in response to the brutal and unprovoked Soviet shooting down of an unarmed Korean civilian airliner and the resulting loss of 269 lives.

In response to the brutal and unprovoked Soviet attack on Korean Air Lines flight 007 on September 1, 1983, the President has requested the Civil Aeronautics Board to take strong action against the Soviet airline Aeroflot. In a letter sent this morning to CAB Chairman Dan McKinnon, the President asked the Board to take the following action, effective September 12, 1983:

(1) to suspend the right of Aeroflot to sell tickets in the United States;

(2) to prohibit U.S. airlines from selling tickets in the United States for transportation on Aeroflot;

(3) to preclude U.S. airlines from carrying traffic to, from or within the United States where an Aeroflot flight is on the ticket;

(4) to direct U.S. airlines to suspend any interline service arrangements with Aeroflot; and

(5) to prohibit U.S. airlines from accepting any tickets issued by Aeroflot for air travel to, from or within the United States.

The President has also reaffirmed the suspension of Aeroflot flights to and from this country which has been in effect since January 5, 1982. The impending Board decision would prevent Aeroflot from marketing any of its services through U.S. carriers or their American agents.

The President requests all U.S. airlines and travel agents to comply with the letter and spirit of these actions.

The duration of these measures in the civil aviation area will be for a period of time, in part dependent upon the extent to which the Soviet Union demonstrates its willingness to honor essential standards of civil aviation, makes a full account of its shoot down of the airline, and issues an apology as well as compensation to aggrieved parties.

The United States will continue to work with the members of the international community in their efforts to promote air safety and to deter such Soviet actions from happening again.

Transcript of a Department of State Press Briefing, September 8, 1983 [98]

U.S. Sanctions Imposed Against Soviet Airline Aeroflot

MODERATOR. . . .We're now on background. Let me turn this over to three experts. They may all be referred to as senior administration officials or senior Department officials or senior CAB officials, as you wish, but that is the attribution.

Why don't you come on up and they'll take your questions, as appropriate, if you would just be patient so they can come to the mike. Let me also say that the subjects of the questions should be limited exclusively to these actions taken today and not sort of broader questions.

Q. Has this been announced at the White House?

MODERATOR. The White House has also made the statements available. [99] Yes.

Q. If a passenger with a foreign ticket turns up a—but it's got a partial Aeroflot stub on it—comes up, what then happens? Is he then transferred to a European carrier, or is he asked to buy another ticket? Doesn't this mean that the U.S. airliners are going to lose money in the process?

FIRST OFFICIAL. The first thing that I should stress is that the order that the Board has been requested to issue would not apply to foreign air carriers other than Aeroflot.

Q. But if I have a Lufthansa ticket, but I'm flying Pan Am, I have to go to a Pan Am desk to fly, but it's also got an Aeroflot stub, that ticket will not be affected?

FIRST OFFICIAL. If you bought a Lufthansa ticket—let's suppose that you flew from Munich to New York on Lufthansa on a ticket issued by Lufthansa that had on it a flight segment, New York to Chicago, on Pan American. Under the order the Board issues today, Pan American would not be permitted to honor that ticket.

The passenger could under those circumstances take that ticket to Lufthansa for a refund and could purchase a separate ticket.

MODERATOR. Okay. Next? (No response) We've stunned you with our brilliance.

SECOND OFFICIAL. Let me add one, I think, very, very general explanation here. The action which has been taken is directed against Aeroflot. It is not addressed to other foreign airlines.

It only applies where you have conduct that is not wholly outside of the United States. In other words, we are attempting very hard in this case not to have any so-called extraterritorial application of U.S. law or U.S. regulation.

That is a purpose here to achieve, in effect, parallel action from other nations around the world. In effect, we are addressing only those instances in which there is a contact with the United States.

Again, it does not address foreign carriers other than Aeroflot, either inside or outside of the United States. It does address, in effect, conduct which is not wholly outside of the United States.

Q. Could you tell us something about the expected impact of your decisions today?

MODERATOR. On whom?

Q. On the Soviet Union. On Aeroflot in its capacity to fly, its economic movement, its sales—

THIRD OFFICIAL. Aeroflot maintains in the United States two full-time offices: one in New York, one in Washington. Both will be shut down. The personnel who staff those offices will be required to leave one week from today.

The number of personnel involved is about three full-time permanent Aeroflot officials plus a number of other Soviets who work at Aeroflot, who are spouses or dependents of Soviet Embassy people or people here with other Soviet organizations.

[98] Source: Department of State files. The briefing was conducted on background by three senior administration officials beginning at 5:25 p.m. Omitted here is preliminary discussion between the moderator and members of the press on a filing break for the statement supra.

The total number of Soviets who will leave as a result of the shutdown and the order to depart will probably—I'm not exactly sure of the detail—but probably will be a little under 20.

Q. As far as movement of the planes, how much are they going to lose in revenues as a result of this?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Let me take a shot at that. We have made some effort to try to identify the impact, and I must say that it is quite difficult to come up with the precise estimate. But we do believe that the order, when implemented, will have a significant effect on Aeroflot revenue.

You must appreciate that the United States is the largest generator of air traffic in international air traffic in the world, and we believe that the effect of the Board's actions as requested by the President will be to divert significant traffic and thus hard currency revenues away from Aeroflot.

Aeroflot has always been a rather minor factor in the U.S. market, but the U.S. market and the travelers that it generates have been a more important source of revenue to Aeroflot. So we think the action will have economic impact.

Q. Can you give us some idea of those revenues that were being earned by Aeroflot in the United States?

FIRST OFFICIAL. We are still trying to get a good fix on that. I would prefer not to do it at this point because my staff tells me that the numbers are too loose to be quoted.

Q. Can we make the request that that question be taken and come back with an answer, please?

MODERATOR. We'll try, but it's very difficult at a briefing like this to take a question and come back in any timely way, but—

Q. In some time.

MODERATOR. At some point we'll try and do that.

Q. Does anybody have a feel for what contract holdings Aeroflot may have in this country such as maintenance, terminal space and that sort of thing that they may be giving up and will result in lost revenue to the municipalities?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Aeroflot has not served this country since January of 1982 when, as a result of the troubles in Poland, Aeroflot's right to fly to this country was suspended. Therefore, they have effectively not been serving this country in approximately a year and a half, so I think that they have—

Q. (Inaudible)

FIRST OFFICIAL. Yes. You may recall, they only served two points, in any event, New York and Washington.

Q. But could they sell tickets even if they couldn't fly?

MODERATOR. Previously.

FIRST OFFICIAL. Aeroflot had authority which expired in January of 1982 to sell tickets in the United States. There was some question as to whether Aeroflot might in fact have had authority to continue to sell tickets for transportation from Montreal to Moscow or to points in Russia.

In order to make sure that there was no doubt, the Board will, I am sure, clarify that and make it clear that they have no authority to sell anything in the United States.

Q. Two questions, please. The first is, is this likely to divert business currently held by American airlines—U.S. airlines to foreign flag carriers?

And the second is, was there consultation with allies? And the obvious followup to that is, do you expect parallel actions by allies?

THIRD OFFICIAL. We have been in consultation with not just the allies but also neutral and nonaligned countries around the world over the last week, and we have told them in these consultations that we were planning to take certain steps which would not have extraterritorial application to affect the operations of Aeroflot, the lingering relationship and operation here, and so on. So I don't think that these measures will come as a surprise to the allies.

As to the effect on American carriers, can you take that one?

FIRST OFFICIAL. We don't expect this to have a significant effect on American carrier revenues or costs. Again, we have made a quick attempt to ascertain what the present level of doing business between the United States and the Soviet carrier is, and as nearly as we've been able to tell it appears to be a roughly even exchange of revenues from transportation provided over the lines of U.S. carriers and Aeroflot.

We think that the effect of our actions—the actions the President has requested—will be to divert those revenues that they currently get in conjunction with American airlines away from Aeroflot.

Q. What was Dobrynin's reaction to all of this, and did he say anything markedly different from the kind of presentation that Gromyko made to Shultz in Madrid?

THIRD OFFICIAL. First of all, we're not going to get into aspects other than the specific Aeroflot operations today. As to his reaction, I don't think it's appropriate to go into how he reacted to a private diplomatic exchange, but the note was presented to him and he accepted it.

Q. Do we have any idea how many U.S. air travelers went to Moscow or the Soviet Union last year? Can you tell by the visas or the tickets? Do you have any idea at all?

FIRST OFFICIAL. To the best of my recollection—and I would like to get back on this one, the numbers slipping my mind—I believe the number of travelers out of Montreal, in total, which included U.S. and Canadian citizens, was on the order of 20,000 last year.

But, if you would like, I will get back and get Alan the best numbers we have. I don't recall at this point.

Q. With only three full-time employees at these two offices, it suggests to me that Aeroflot wasn't doing any business in this country anyhow.

Do you have any figures on how many tickets are written on a monthly or an annual basis?

FIRST OFFICIAL. That is private commercial information. Aeroflot is not a party to any joint arrangements, clearinghouse arrangements, where we might be able to get that information. So, we have a very hard time getting a fix on that.

Q. Three employees—does that not suggest that their operation is minimal, at most?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Well, their operation—it is hard to dispute they are not flying. Their operation is minimal. It is hard to imagine a more minimal operation. But I think that the important thing to remember here is that no airline, even the largest U.S. airline, sells the majority of its tickets by itself. The vast majority of tickets that are sold in this country are sold by travel agents or by other U.S. airlines. And both travel agents and other U.S. airlines, as a result of the actions requested by the President will be precluded from selling transportation on Aeroflot.

Now, we point out that Aeroflot, although it no longer flies from the United States to Moscow, flies to many points in Europe, and Asia to Moscow. And in the past, travelers from the United States, ticketed by U.S. travel agents and U.S. airlines, have, in fact, used Aeroflot services. So, don't look at just the three, think about the 18,000 travel agents in this country and the 20 or 25 airlines who are selling tickets.

Q. It sounds from the way you have described it, in fact, from what you have just said, that who this is really going to hurt is the U.S. travel industry, and I am not trying to sound like the Chamber of Commerce on this. But suppose I wanted to fly from Irkutsk to Kiev, I think that my only choice is Aeroflot. If I can't buy a ticket here, I buy a ticket through the travel agent down the street to Montreal, and when I get to Montreal, I still buy the same ticket.

I mean, I am not sure from what you say how much U.S.—Americans—who buy Aeroflot tickets, to whatever extent the Aeroflot tickets they buy are for internal travel within the Soviet Union, certainly aren't going to hurt Aeroflot because they aren't going to lose the business. It is just going to require me to go to Montreal to buy the ticket.

FIRST OFFICIAL. First of all, we wouldn't want to prejudge what the Canadians are going to do, and perhaps the Canadians will consider some of the steps, in which case you would have to go a lot farther than Montreal to buy a ticket.

The second thing, though, is that I think it is important to remember that the precentage of its revenues that Aeroflot derives from U.S. travelers, who are ticketed by U.S. travel agents and airlines, we believe is significant. It is much more significant than the percentage of service that Aeroflot can provide to the U.S. traveler. U.S. travelers, we think, will not be severely or seriously inconvenienced by what we are doing, but we believe the proportional impact on Aeroflot will be much greater.

Q. Let me put it, just to put a point on the question, what I mean to say, of the Aeroflot services that Americans buy, how much of that service, if you can tell us, is service which they will be able to get elsewhere, or as opposed to service which they can only get from Aeroflot, and they will therefore have to find a way to obtain?

FIRST OFFICIAL. That in part depends, in large part depends upon what other countries decide to do in response to our initiatives and approaches.

MODERATOR. I remind you, too, we had a travel advisory today, and I refer you back to that.

Q. I understand the Soviets have been permitted to fly, to land Aeroflot in Washington, and I suppose New York, to supply their Embassy here and the U.N. Mission in New York. Is that correct, and will they be allowed to continue doing that?

THIRD OFFICIAL. From time to time, the Soviets have made special flights into this country for cargo or to bring distinguished visitors, just as we have done the same thing into the Soviet Union. We have that under review.

Q. I am a little mixed up about one thing. Suppose I go over to the Air France ticket office here and ask them to book me from Paris—let's assume Aeroflot is flying from Paris—from Paris to Moscow on Aeroflot. Can they do it under this—?

FIRST OFFICIAL. Yes.

Q. This applies only to U.S. travel agents and U.S. airlines?

SECOND OFFICIAL. Let me again emphasize what the entire purpose here is. One, it is to take a strong United States action against Aeroflot. It is also not to impose upon other countries, or to profess to impose upon them, what we are doing for ourselves.

What we are trying to do is to encourage the rest of the world to adopt similar and parallel actions. If they do so, we will have effectively, around the world, stung a very strong blow against Aeroflot.

But we recognize it is going to take united action for this to be effective around the world. But as far as the United States goes, we have taken actions involving U.S. carriers and also other conduct that is either to, from, or within the United States.

It does require a U.S. contact, in effect.

The purpose is to encourage others to do the same.

Q. Have you spoken with any representatives of the travel industry about the impact of this?

FIRST OFFICIAL. We have a bit of a legal problem here, because the Board has now been requested by the President to issue an order that will accomplish, to do the things that . . . laid out in his initial presentation.

The Board will, I believe, very shortly, issue an order that may go out tonight, or at the latest tomorrow morning, which will give the affected parties 48 hours to comment—a little longer than 48 hours, until noon Monday—to comment on the proposed effect of the order.

As a result, through what may seem arcane legal procedures, we will be in a position of being precluded from speaking with parties that might be affected without violating conflict of interest regulations.

Q. Do you anticipate any kind of loud outcry? Have you analyzed this enough so that you don't expect travel agents, 18,000 of them, to be highly annoyed?

FIRST OFFICIAL. The CAB has had a lot of experience with travel agents, not all of it favorable, but I really believe on this one that we can expect very strong support from the travel industry, and I don't expect any outcry other than one saying it is the right thing to do.

MODERATOR. We'll take two more questions and then close it down.

Q. I am confused about the CAB order. Would that be effective immediately, or would it be effective at noon Monday,[1] or when would it be effective?

FIRST OFFICIAL. The order will be effective when the Board issues the final order. I would anticipate now that that order will be effective on Monday, probably, I would say, by close of business on Monday.

Q. Subject to comment in the meantime?

FIRST OFFICIAL. It will be subject to comment by interested people.

Q. Is it accurate to call it an order or as a proposed order, or what?

FIRST OFFICIAL. It can either be called a tentative order or a show-cause order.

Q. Did I understand you correctly to say that last year there were 20,000 U.S. citizens flying to the Soviet Union through Montreal?

FIRST OFFICIAL. No. I said I believe the total number of passengers flying on Aeroflot services from Montreal to Moscow was 20,000. The U.S. passengers on that would have been a smaller amount. I will have to get back to you with the best numbers we have. That is just a recollection, top of the head.

MODERATOR. Okay. Thank you all.

U.S. Reaction to Statements by the Chief of the General Staff of the Soviet Armed Forces

. . . . . .

Q. Alan, could we turn briefly, please, to the plane? Regarding the statements of the Soviet Army Chief of Staff in Moscow today, again that the Korean jetliner was on a spy mission, it was a deliberately, thoroughly planned intelligence operation. [3]

Have you seen those remarks of the Chief of Staff, and do you have a response?

A. We've certainly gotten reports of it, Mike. Let me respond in this way. The Soviet event today clearly did not provide us and the rest of the world with answers to the questions we all have about Soviet actions in this case. The Soviet Union still owes the world answers and assurances that civil aviation will not be targeted in the future.

It is interesting to note what the Soviets did not do today. They offered no evidence to support their assertion that the plane was on a reconnaissance mission. They offered no evidence to support their claim that they attempted to identify or force down the KAL plane. They offered no answer when asked why Soviet authorities did not try to contact U.S. or Japanese authorities before firing on the aircraft.

I might also add that the plane's black box would provide data which would help clear up questions about the KAL flight's movements. Soviet refusal to allow us to search in their waters reduces the likelihood that the black box will be recovered and answers provided which could help clarify the situation.

Q. The Soviet statement says that when the plane started to veer off course, it was still under the range of U.S. radar aids. Can you confirm that?

A. No. My information is that the Anchorage radar, which would control it when it first took off, followed it out—I forget how many miles; 200 miles, I guess—and that, as of the time it left the range of that radar, there was no indication that it was off-course. I'm not saying that it might not have diverted to a certain extent—I can't really tell you that; but anyway, there was no indication on the radar that Anchorage had that there was anything seriously wrong at that point. Then, it went out of radar range, as you know, and didn't go back into anybody's range until it got near Tokyo.

Q. If I may follow, Alan, they also mentioned 120 shots of tracers. Have you had any confirmation of this?

A. No; nor, as I said in the opening answers to the questions on the flight today, is there any evidence that the Soviets have presented other than an assertion that they did that. And I think I would refer you back to the transcript of the Soviet pilots,[4] which certainly did not indicate any such activity.

Q. Alan, do you know about the encripted information that is in the possession of the United States that proves conclusively that the Soviets knew they were shooting at a civilian airliner?

A. John, I think we've addressed this before, and I don't have anything new to add to this. I'm not going to get into the question of any more intelligence information than we have already provided. The fact of the matter is that the Soviet aircraft which shot down that plane, if it didn't know, it sure should have known that it was a civilian aircraft. It was close enough; it had an obligation to get close enough; it had an obligation to do an awful lot of things that it did not do.

We pointed, in Acting Secretary Eagleburger's remarks the other day,[5] to questions of competence which are raised by this whole Soviet explanation of what went on.

Q. My question is, leaving encription aside, do we know that the Soviets knew they were shooting at a civilian airliner?

A. I'm going to stand on the answers I've just given you.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, September 11, 1983 [6]

Further Review Findings of the Tape of the Soviet Fighter Pilots

As part of the policy of the U.S. Government to develop full information on the tragic shootdown of KAL 007 by Soviet forces on August 31, U.S. Government experts have continued to review the poor quality transmission on the tape which was played at the UN Security Council September 6. That review has now been completed.[7] After efforts at electronic enhancement and hundreds of replays of the tape, U.S. Government linguists were able to interpret three passages more clearly as indicated below.

The first segment at 1819:08 which originally was translated "I have enough time," now is translated as "they do not see me." The second segment was a previously unintelligible phrase at 1820:49, which has now been translated as "I am firing cannon bursts." Because of the Soviet pilot's reference at 1828:05 to launching "both" rockets, the linguists also rechecked the reference at 1823:37 which was previously translated as "rocket." They were able to clarify that the plural was used; thus the translation should be " . . . . now I will try rockets."

The transcript does not indicate whether the cannon shots were aimed at the KAL plane or were tracer rounds. We do note that, according to information made available by the Government of Japan to the United Nations, KAL 007, in its routine radio transmission to Tokyo at 1823 [8]

[6] Source: Department of State files; also printed in Department of State Bulletin, October 1983, p. 14.

[7] The corrected transcript was released along with this statement to the press. A portion of the corrected transcript was printed in the Washington Post, September 12, 1983, p. A8.

(over 2 minutes after the cannons were fired) gave no indication it was aware of Soviet aircraft in the vicinity or that cannon had been fired. The evidence indicates that the pilot was totally unaware of the fact that he was off course, that he was intercepted by Soviet fighters, or that any warnings—visual, radio, gunfire—were given.

This additional analysis of the tapes reinforces our belief that the totality of the events remains exactly as stated by the United States and Japan. The Korean airliner was not aware of the Soviet fighters, nor was it aware that any warning was given. The Soviets consciously made the decision to shoot down the aircraft. The fact is that it was an unarmed, civilian airliner, and it cost the lives of 269 innocent people.

Note From the United States Government to the Soviet Government, September 12, 1983 [9]

U.S. Demand For Compensation for the Lives of U.S. Nationals Aboard KAL Flight 007

The United States refers to the Soviet Union's action of September 1, 1983 in firing upon and destroying an unarmed civil airliner, Korean Air Lines Flight No. 007, in the vicinity of Sakhalin Island, thereby causing the deaths of 269 innocent persons. The United States considers this action as a flagrant and unjustifiable breach of applicable principles of international law and as a direct violation of internationally agreed procedures to be followed when an aircraft inadvertently intrudes on a state's territorial airspace. The United States submits that the Soviet Union's action was wrongful and gives rise to responsibility under international law to make reparation.

The United States Government therefore demands that the Soviet Union provide prompt, adequate, and effective compensation to the United States Government for the lives of United States nationals aboard Korean Air Lines Flight No. 007 and for any other compensable loss incurred by any United States national as a result of the Soviet Union's wrongful actions. The United States will advise the Soviet Union at a later date of the specific losses for which the United States considers the Soviet Union responsible under international law.

This demand is in addition to any other form of redress that the United States may lawfully require from the Soviet Union for its action in firing upon and destroying Korean Air Lines Flight No. 007.

Release of FAA Transcripts and Tapes of Communications Between KAL 007 and FAA Traffic Control in Anchorage; U.S. Demand For Compensation From the Soviet Union

. . . . . .

Third, to let you know that the FAA is releasing today the transcripts and tapes of communications between the flight crew of KAL 007 and the FAA traffic control tower, or facilities at Anchorage. As I understand it, those—well—

[10] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. The briefing was conducted by Department of State Acting Spokesman Alan Romberg beginning at 12:40 p.m.

Let me just go on with the announcement. These tapes and transcripts indicate that no one was aware that KAL flight 007 was off course. Since the communications cover a period of several hours, both the transcripts and the tapes have been compressed by eliminating all material that doesn't relate in any way to the flight of KAL 007, and anyone who wants to listen to the full tapes can make arrangements with FAA. I suggest you set aside quite a bit of time if you're interested in doing that.

Q. Alan—

A. Let me go on and finish what I am doing. As I said, the tapes do indicate that the KAL pilot was not aware of any problem in maintaining course. He followed all of his required position reports in U.S.-controlled air space. However, the FAA only has radar coverage for approximately 165 miles from Anchorage, so there normally is no effective way for the agency to check these position reports for accuracy, and it was impossible to tell from these tapes the pilot-controller communication where KAL 007 began to deviate from its assigned route.

One thing I should note. The tapes show that KAL 007 was relaying its position reports after it left the mainland through another Korean airliner in the general vicinity. The chief of FAA control center in Anchorage says, "It is not unusual for an aircraft to relay information through another aircraft. In itself, this relay would not alert a controller that an abnormal situation exists."

For your convenience, we have copies of the transcript available in the Press Office for you after the briefing.

Q. Are the tapes here—

A. No, we do not have the tapes here. You have to go to the FAA for that.

And, finally, an announcement—make sure it's finally—about a note presented to the Soviets this morning.[11] At 10:30 a.m. today, Acting Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs John H. Kelly presented the Soviet Embassy's Deputy Chief of Mission, Sakoloff, with a diplomatic note demanding compensation from the Soviet Union for the lives of U.S. nationals aboard Korean Airlines flight 007.

The note indicated that the United States considers the Soviet Union's destruction of that aircraft as a "flagrant and unjustifiable breach of applicable principles of international law" and as a "direct violation of internationally-agreed procedures to be followed when an aircraft inadvertently intrudes on a state's territorial airspace."

The note further characterized the Soviet Union's action as wrongful and as giving rise to "responsibility under international law to make reparation." The United States' diplomatic note did not specify an amount of compensation but indicated that the United States will supplement its claim with specifics at a later date.

Soviet DCM Sakoloff refused to accept the note. Acting Assistant Secretary Kelly refused to accept Mr. Sakoloff's rejection of the U.S. note. (Laughter) At the same time the U.S. note was presented to DCM Sakoloff, Mr. Kelly presented a similar diplomatic note on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Korea demanding compensation for its losses as well.[12] DCM Sakoloff also rejected that note.

We shall continue to press the Soviets to meet their clear obligation under international law to pay compensation to both the United States and Korea.

We will also make available to you the text of both of those notes in the Press Office. That is it for announcements.

Q. What happens next? Does the United States take it to the International Court of Justice or try to get the Soviets to accept it or what?

A. I think we are going to be presenting that note again; sending it over to them. In terms of what one could do with the International Court of Justice, specifically, or even in general in an international fora, we're carefully considering every possible avenue by which we might press the claim.

As far as the Court of Justice is concerned, the ICJ has jurisdiction over claims between states only to the extent that the states accept its jurisdiction. The Soviet Union has not accepted the Court's general jurisdiction. Nevertheless, as I say, I can assure you that we will be carefully monitoring all of our options.

Q. What is the status of the note, since we didn't accept their refusal to accept it? Do they have the note or what? What does that mean in real terms?

A. We will re-present that note.

Q. In other words, they have not taken it physically?

A. They did not physically take it this morning.

Q. (Inaudible).

A. I'm not going to go into the details of what the exact next step will be in terms of presenting it, but we will continue to press this issue.

Q. In other words, you just resubmit it to them?

A. I think I'll leave you with what I just said about it. We'll re-present the note.

Q. Was it read in toto to Sakoloff?

A. Was the note read in toto to Sakoloff? It was.

Q. How long was it, please?

A. You'll get the copy of the note.

Q. The note is in our possession, then?

A. Yes, that's correct.

Q. Alan, a technical point. Do we represent South Korea in diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union on all issues?

A. No, we don't represent the—

Q. Who is their representative?

A. I don't know. You would have to check with the Koreans.

Q. Has Canada and other nationals presented to the Russians similar demands?

A. The short answer to the question is, there have been others. Based on information we now have, it would appear that passengers from the following places were aboard the aircraft: Korea, Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong, the Philippines, Australia, Malaysia, India, Thailand, Canada, Great Britain, and Sweden.

In addition to Korea, for which as I had mentioned, we presented a claim at the same time as our own, several other countries already have presented claims. Thailand and the Philippines did so almost immediately. Canada presented a claim on Friday to the Soviets. We expect several others to do so this week.

I would note, too, that a great many other countries that do not have claims of their own have called on the Soviet Union in the U.N. and elsewhere to fulfill its international legal obligation to compensate the families of the victims.

Q. How many countries were there, please, Alan (inaudible)?

A. I think it's 13. Twelve plus the United States is thirteen.

Q. Can we get a copy of that?

A. I identify 13—no, I think I'm going to refer you to the record instead of presenting all these Q's and A's.

Q. Were the other claims refused as well?

A. You'll have to check with the other governments as to what happened with their claims.

Gravely disturbed that a civil air liner of the Korean Airlines on an international flight was shot down by Soviet military aircraft, with the loss of all 269 people on board,

Expressing its sincere condolences to the families of the victims of the incident, and urging all parties concerned, as a humanitarian gesture, to assist them in dealing with the consequences of this tragedy,

Reaffirming the rules of international law that prohibit acts of violence which pose a threat to the safety of international civil aviation,

Recognizing the importance of the principle of territorial integrity as well as the necessity that only internationally agreed procedures should be used in response to intrusions into the airspace of a State,

Stressing the need for a full and adequate explanation of the facts of the incident based upon impartial investigation,

Recognizing the right under international law to appropriate compensation,

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) in the U.N. Security Council, September 12, 1983 [14]

"The Soviet Union Has Demonstrated an Attitude That Is As Contemptuous of the Truth As It Is Callous Toward Human Life—an Attitude Underscored by Its Veto of the Resolution Before Us Today"

Mr. President, the issue that we have been discussing now for more than a week

[14] Source: U.S. Mission to the United Nations Press Release USUN 71-(83), September 12, 1983; printed also in Department of State Bulletin, October 1983, pp. 15–17. All emphases are in the source text.

bears directly on the ability of all of us working together, working singly to secure and preserve peace in this world. It bears also on the readiness of members states to take responsibility for achieving a civilized and peaceful international order.

Destruction of the civilian airliner, KAL 007, was a deeply shocking act. But even more disturbing than the deed itself has been the behavior of the Soviet Government in the days since it shot down that plane. Had the Soviet Government taken responsibility for the action, admitted that a terrible mistake had been made, offered compensation to the families for the loss of life, and in cooperation with other states, undertaken a review of the incident to ensure that such a tragedy would not recur, then the consequences of the event would have been contained and, to the degree possible, minimized. Nothing, to be sure, could reclaim the lives of 269 people. But relations among nations would not have suffered, and civilian air travel might have been rendered less vulnerable to such errors in the future.

But as we all know, the response of the Soviet Government has been quite different. Instead of admitting error, it has insisted that no error was made. Instead of taking responsibility for the act, it has lashed out with groundless accusations. Instead of taking steps to ensure against a repetition of such an incident, it has emphasized that it would do the same thing all over again.

By taking this position the Soviet Union has magnified the negative consequences of a tragic incident and has damaged anew the already tattered fabric of international relations. It has further poisoned the international atmosphere. For this, as for the incident itself, the Soviet Union must bear heavy responsibility.

During the past 10 days, the Soviet Union has taken a position at once inconsistent and contradictory. It has been self-justifying and self-defeating in its statements. In its determined defense of an indefensible act, the Soviet Union has demonstrated an attitude that is as contemptuous of the truth as it is callous toward human life—an attitude underscored by its veto of the resolution before us today. [15]

For nearly a week, the Soviet Union refused to admit it shot down flight 007. Then it admitted to having fired warning shots. Only after the public disclosure of the tape recordings in which the Soviet pilot told Soviet ground control that he had executed the order to destroy "the target," did the Soviet Government announce that one of its pilots had, in fact, "stopped the flight," as they euphemistically put it.

In the ensuing days we have heard a tangle of charges from the Soviet Union. On the one hand, it has been said that flight 007 was itself on a spy mission and therefore invited destruction. But it has also been said that the presence, earlier in the evening, of an RC 135 reconnaissance plane, which had landed more than 1,500 miles away from the location of the incident, "caused" the Soviet pilot to mistake the two aircrafts, thus acknowledging tacitly that the Korean 747 was not on a spy mission after all.

Not surprisingly, the testimony of the Soviet pilot who shot down KAL 007 corroborates the official Soviet version of events. The Korean pilot is dead and cannot refute this testimony. But it is interesting and significant, I believe, to note in this context the testimony given to the New York Times by Kim Chang Kyu, the pilot of the Korean Airlines plane that strayed over Soviet airspace in 1978, thus becoming the target of a Soviet missile that sheared off nearly 15 feet of the plane's left wing and killed two of the plane's passengers. [16] The pilot was able to regain control of the plane and was able to make an emergency landing on a frozen lake 400 miles northeast of Leningrad.

"After I was shot down," the pilot recounts, "the Russians made the same claims we're hearing now. They said, 'We tracked you for more than 2 hours, flew around the plane, fired tracers in front of you'—all that. It all sounds exactly the same this time."

Mr. Kim gives a different version of what actually happened. He tells us he saw the plane only once, off to the right and somewhat behind him. He thought this was strange, since international guidelines call for intercepting fighters to fly to the left of the plane, where the pilot sits. When Mr. Kim's co-pilot, who had a clearer view of the plane, reported that it bore the red Soviet star, Mr. Kim immediately slowed his speed and turned his landing lights off and on repeatedly, the recognized international signal that an aircraft will follow the interceptor's directions. In addition, Mr. Kim tried to establish contact with the Soviet craft, but the two planes' radios were on different frequencies. In any event, the next thing Mr. Kim knew a missile fired by the Soviet pilot had torn off a good part of his plane's left wing.

In light of this previous incident, and in view of the established fact that the pilot of KAL 007 made no radio transmissions indicating that he had been intercepted, one can only conclude that there was no communication with the pilot of KAL 007 in accordance with normal procedures and on normal emergency frequencies.

The fact that the tapes now show that the Soviet pilot fired "cannon bursts" 6 minutes before he destroyed KAL 007 does not alter this conclusion. Clearly the Korean pilot was not aware of the Soviet fighters, nor was he aware that any warning was given. If there were shots fired 6 minutes in advance of the fatal shot, it, therefore, seems likely that they were not tracers but regular, normal cannon rounds which are not visible.

Even assuming for the sake of argument that the Soviet pilot had tried to establish communication with the pilot of KAL 007, but for some reason that we do not know had failed to get through, this would not justify shooting down a 747 civilian airliner.

Mr. President, what conceivable harm could the plane have done, especially since it was within 60 seconds of leaving Soviet airspace, a fact that renders absurd the statement by one of the Soviet pilots that the 747 might have been carrying "a bomb that might have fallen, maybe on my house"—presumably located in the Sea of Japan.

Let us recall for a moment the incident almost 2 years ago when a Soviet W-class submarine penetrated deep into restricted Swedish waters near Karlskrona naval base and ran aground there. In response to the protest of the Swedish Government, the Soviet Government said: "It was expected, of course, that the Swedish authorities would abide by existing international norms under which if a foreign warship does not even observe the rules of a coastal state regarding passage through its territorial waters, the only thing the coastal state may do with respect to the given warship is to demand that it leave its territorial waters."

According to this unique interpretation of international law, if a Soviet warship—a *war*ship mind you—invades the territorial waters of another state, that state cannot even detain the warship but must simply escort it out of its territorial waters. But if a civilian airliner with 269 people aboard happens to stray into Soviet airspace, the Soviet Union is justified in shooting it down, even as it is about to exit that airspace. Mr. Leonid M. Zamyatin, the spokesman on the Central Committee for General Secretary Yuri Andropov, went so far as to say that Soviet air defense forces were "humane" to have waited so long before destroying KAL 007. How callous it is to talk about "humaneness" with regard to a ruthless act that resulted in 269 deaths. Is a Soviet warship entitled to more "humane" treatment than a civilian airplane?

The Soviet leadership refuses to concede the possibility that a civilian airliner, traveling a scheduled flight, with 269 people aboard, might have strayed accidentally into its airspace—despite the fact that there have been 21 recorded incidents where civilian planes with similar navigational equipment have strayed off course. Here, too, the incident of the Soviet W-class submarine offers an interesting analogy. In its statement to the Government of Sweden, the Soviet Government rejected the Swedish charge that this warship was engaged in "carrying out impermissible activities," namely, spying. According to the Soviet statement, the submarine "went off course as a result of the failure of its navigational instruments and resultant mistakes in position finding" and therefore "entered unintentionally the territorial waters of Sweden . . . ."[17] The Soviet side, taking into consideration the breakdown character of the incident, could rightfully expect at least a manifestation of correct attitude and objective appraisal of what happened." Instead, it charged the Swedish Government with "distorting facts" and it flatly rejected the Swedish demand "to prevent the recurrence of such a gross violation," saying—and I quote—"In this concrete case this sounds like a demand to rule out the very possibility of breakdown situations occurring at sea. This demand," said the Soviet Union, "is simply out of tune with common sense."

Yet the Soviet Union finds it is inconceivable that such a "breakdown situation," to use their term, might have occurred in the case of the civilian airliner, KAL 007.

Now we come to the final Soviet argument—its ultimate line of defense. It was stated in explicit terms last week by Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko: "We state," he said: "Soviet territory, the borders of the Soviet Union are sacred." It is on the basis of this principle that the top Soviet leadership has defended, and by so doing, has assumed responsibility for, the destruction of a civilian airliner.

In this context, we would like to ask the Soviet Union: Are the borders of the Soviet Union more sacred than, say, the borders of Sweden, not to speak of the borders of Afghanistan? Are they more sacred than the airspace of the United States, which has frequently been violated by Soviet planes flying off-route over sensitive military facilities, though these planes have not as a result of such violations been shot down? And how, may we ask, can the Soviet Union reconcile this remarkable doctrine of absolute Soviet sovereignty, according to which the Soviet Union is within its rights to shoot down a civilian airliner that strays across its sacred borders, with its doctrine of "limited sovereignty," which was propounded 15 years ago in relationship to the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia?

In the article in Pravda (September 26, 1968) where this doctrine of "limited sovereignty" was propounded, the Soviet Union not only claimed the right to invade any Soviet bloc country that threatened to deviate from the path of fealty to Moscow; it also claimed the right to intervene in the internal affairs of states that are not part of the Soviet bloc.

This same article explains how the Soviet Union reconciles the doctrine of absolute Soviet sovereignty with the doctrine of "limited sovereignty" for everyone else, as well as with the norms of international law. Accordingly, it states that "Laws and the norms of law are subordinated to the laws of the class struggle and the laws of social development . . . . The class approach to the matter cannot be discarded in the name of legalistic considerations. Whoever does so forfeits the only correct, class-oriented criterion for evaluating legal norms and begins to measure events with the yardsticks of bourgeois law."

In other words, there are two forms of law—"bourgeois law," which includes the Charter of the United Nations, and "the laws of the class struggle," and there is no question that in the Soviet view, the former are conditioned by and subordinate to the latter. This dual conception of international law accords to the Soviet Union absolute rights but no obligation to respect the rights of others, while it accords to all other states no rights but absolute obligations to respect the rights of the Soviet Union.

The destruction of KAL 007, and especially the manner in which the Soviet Union has defended that action, have illuminated as few events in recent years the nature of the predicament that faces us all.

Mr. President, I would like to quote from a letter written by a Soviet citizen who is surely one of the outstanding and most courageous persons of our age. I am referring to Dr. Andrei Sakharov whose letter was secretly transmitted to the outside world from within the Soviet Union where he has been internally exiled. In his letter from exile, Dr. Sakharov warns that "the world is facing very difficult times and cruel cataclysms if the West and the developing countries trying to find their place in the world do not now show the required firmness, unity and consistency in resisting the totalitarian challenge. This relates to governments, to the intelligentsia, businessmen, and to all people. It is important that the common danger be fully understood—everything else will then fall into place."

If the destruction of KAL 007 helps us to understand the nature of the world in which we live and the dangers to our rights and laws therein, helps us to show the necessary clarity and firmness in defending precisely the principles of international law contained in the Charter of the United Nations—then perhaps the 269 people aboard that ill-fated airliner will not have died in vain.

In closing, Mr. President, I should like to say that there is one question which above all confronts this Council and the world in this debate, which is responded to by the resolution we have adopted, in spite of its veto. Does a nation which is not at war have the right to shoot down planes that enter their air space without authorization—that is the question with which we have been confronted. The answer to that question must be no. We do not believe that the protection of sovereignty of any nation gives that nation an absolute right in peace time to shoot down any plane flying any place over its territory. There are internationally agreed on procedures to take care of such problems. We believe that this view has been endorsed by a majority of this Council in the resolution we have considered this afternoon.

We stand ready to work with our colleagues to ensure greater safety for all passengers and pilots, indeed, for all people. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

Resolution Adopted by the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization, Montreal, September 16, 1983 [18]

Endorsement of a Full Investigation of the KAL Incident and the Need For Improvement of Procedures Relating to the Interception of Civil Aircraft

The Council

Having considered the fact that a Korean Air Lines civil aircraft was destroyed on September 1, 1983, by Soviet military aircraft,

Expressing its deepest sympathy with the families bereaved in this tragic incident,

Urging the Soviet Union to assist the bereaved families to visit the site of the incident and to return the bodies of the victims and their belongings promptly,

Deeply deploring the destruction of an aircraft in commercial international service resulting in the loss of 269 innocent lives,

Recognizing that such use of armed force against international civil aviation is incompatible with the norms governing international behavior and elementary considerations of humanity and with the rules, standards and recommended practices enshrined in the Chicago Convention and its annexes and invokes generally recognized legal consequences,

Reaffirming the principle that States, when intercepting civil aircraft, should not use weapons against them,

Concerned that the Soviet Union has not so far acknowledged the paramount importance of the safety and lives of passengers and crew when dealing with civil aircraft intercepted in or near its territorial airspace,

Emphasizing that this action constitutes a grave threat to the safety of international civil aviation which makes clear the urgency of undertaking an immediate and full investigation of the said action and the need for further improvement of procedures relating to the interception of civil aircraft, with a view to ensuring that such a tragic incident does not recur,

(1) Directs the Secretary-General to institute an investigation to determine the facts and technical aspects relating to the flight and destruction of the aircraft and to provide an interim report to the Council within 30 days of the adoption of this resolution and a complete report during the 110th session of the Council, [19]

[18] Source: Department of State Bulletin, October 1983, p. 20. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 26 in favor (Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Cameroon, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Indonesia, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Madagascar, Mexico, Netherlands, Nigeria, Pakistan, Senegal, Spain, Uganda, United Kingdom, United States, and Venezuela), 2 against (Czechoslovakia and Soviet Union), with 3 abstentions (Algeria, China, and India), and 2 absent (Iraq and Lebanon).

[19] The report of the ICAO factfinding investigation, entitled "Destruction of Korean Air Lines Boeing 747 Over Sea of Japan, 31 August 1983," was completed in December 1983.

(2) Urges all parties to co-operate fully in the investigation,

(3) Further directs the Secretary-General to urgently report to the Council on the status of adherence to, and implementation of, the provisions of the Chicago Convention, its annexes and other related documents as they bear upon this incident,

(4) Directs the Air Navigation Commission urgently,

(a) To review the provisions of the Convention, its annexes and other related documents and consider possible amendments to prevent a recurrence of such a tragic incident;

(b) To examine ways to improve the coordination of communication systems between military and civil aircraft and air traffic control services and to improve procedures in cases involving the identification and interception of civil aircraft:

(5) Instructs the President of the Council to report this decision to the 24th session of the Assembly of the Organization for the Assembly to take the appropriate action.

Second U.S. Note Demanding Compensation From the Soviet Union; U.S. Response to Refusal by New York and New Jersey To Grant Landing Rights to Soviet Plane

. . . . . .

This morning Assistant Secretary for European Affairs Richard Burt called in Soviet Minister Sokolov and presented him with a second diplomatic note demanding that the Soviet Union accept diplomatic notes which the United States has attempted to present the Soviets on its behalf—that's the United States—and on behalf of the Republic of Korea. [21]

These notes demand compensation from the Soviet Union for the lives and property of United States and Korean nationals lost as a result of the wrongful shooting down of Korean Airlines flight 007 on September 1. The presentation of claims of this nature by one state against another through diplomatic communications and the consequent payment of appropriately substantiated claims is an established international practice with hundreds of precedents going back several centuries.

After this briefing we will be happy to make the text of the notes available, but briefly the note presented this morning reiterated the U.S. position that the Soviet Union's actions in firing upon and destroying the airliner were wrongful under international law and require compensation. The note also reiterated the similar position of the Republic of Korea.

Today's note said that the United States would regard a second Soviet refusal to accept the previous diplomatic notes as an additional delict or violation which would give rise to a right to additional redress under international law. So we'll make those—

Q. Did he accept it?

A. He did not accept the note formally on this occasion, but the note has since been delivered to the Soviet Embassy.

Q. Was it accepted there?

A. It has not, as of 12:36, been returned to us.

Q. I lost you there.

Q. What does it mean, John, when he doesn't accept it? Does he throw it back at you? Does he refuse to take the thing in his hands, to—

A. I guess he refused to accept it formally during the meeting, and so we sent it around physically.

Q. Did he read it out to him during the meeting?

A. It was presented and handed. It was left at the Soviet Embassy. It has not so far been returned.

Q. Could I just follow on my question? What happened during the meeting with Burt? Did Burt read him the thing and then try to give it to him, and he said, "I'm not going to accept it?"

A. I wasn't at the meeting, but I think that that's a fair, I think, scenario.

Q. Are you talking about the second note?

A. I'm talking about a second note today.

Q. Did he accept that second note?

A. No. He did not.

Q. Does the second note differ in any substantial manner from the first one of a few days ago?

A. I think it makes the point that continued refusal to accept these notes would open the way to international legal action.

Q. Otherwise it repeats the other part of it?

A. It repeats the substance of the other. We'll give you these notes. But you can have—

Q. Was the note left at the Embassy left inside the Chancery or outside the Chancery?

A. I don't know how it was delivered physically.

Q. Can you find out about the mechanism on that, John?

A. No. I think we'll just assure you that it was delivered, and it has not so far been returned.

Q. Could you tell who took it? At what level?

A. No, I can't.

Q. Could you discuss additional international redress? What do you have in mind?

A. That's something we're looking at. I don't have anything for you in detail.

Q. What are available?

A. There is the International Court of Justice.

Q. They don't recognize its jurisdiction.

A. We're looking at what—

Q. Was it one note that was read today, or two? You're a little blurred—

A. It was a second note referring to the two previous notes, one presented by ourselves on behalf of the Government of Korea and one in our own right, which they had earlier refused to accept.

Q. John, can you say what his response is in not accepting the note? Did he say anything at all? Did he give any explanation?

A. No. I don't know what he said.

Q. John, the other day Alan said that the notes had been forwarded—the first notes had been forwarded to the Soviet Embassy.

A. That's correct.

Q. Were they returned on that occasion?

A. They have not, to my knowledge, so far been returned.

Q. John, did—

A. You need to be careful about the difference here between physical delivery of notes and formal diplomatic acceptance of notes.

Q. John, there's a conflict here. Yesterday, on background, an American official said that the note had not been—this is the first note—had not been delivered to the Embassy.

A. You need to be careful about the distinction between physical delivery and official diplomatic acceptance. It is one thing to put something in the mail or hand it in at an Embassy. It is another thing to formally present it to a diplomat and have it accepted.

Q. John, can we infer from what you're saying now that continued refusal to accept these notes by the Soviet Union could conceivably jeopardize our diplomatic relationship?

A. No. I don't think we said that. I think what this language suggests is that continued refusal to accept these notes opens the way to further international legal action.

. . . . . .

Q. Did the matter of the Governors of New York and New Jersey refusing landing rights to the Gromyko plane come up during this meeting with Sokolov? [22]

A. I do not know whether that specifically came up at this meeting, Jim, but I'm aware of the situation in which you're—

Q. What is the situation?

A. I think the facts are that Mr. Gromyko will not arrive on an Aeroflot plane, and we are looking at the manner in which he might arrive. That, of course, is a U.N. representation which we accept. We're not going to bar people from attending the United Nations, so we have no problem with Mr. Gromyko coming.

Q. Have the Soviets told you he is not coming on an Aeroflot—

A. No, no. We're saying that he will not come—

Q. You're not going to allow him to land anywhere?

A. Let me see if I can give you a little more specific language on that. He will not be coming on a civilian Aeroflot aircraft. The Department of State has approved Soviet requests for a special flight to bring Mr. Gromyko and the Soviet delegation to New York to participate in the U.N. General Assembly session, but the Soviets have been informed—and I'm not sure whether that was at this morning's meeting or not—by Assistant Secretary Burt that they will have to use noncivilian aircraft, and that plane will not land at a U.S. commercial airport.

Q. Noncivilian means military?

A. In my book it does. Yes.

Q. Wait. Can I distinguish on this? He usually comes in a plane that carries the Aeroflot designation, but it's clearly a government plane. Does that meet your requirements, or does it have to have "Aeroflot" not on the—

A. I can't get into the details, but he will not land at a commercial airport, and I presume that means a military airport, which is something we're looking at; and, obviously, the Pentagon has all kinds of rules and regulations about what kinds of aircraft fly into those bases.

Q. But wait—his plane has landed in the past at Andrews.

A. Yes. I'm not suggesting that it will land at Andrews.

Q. John, have you heard whether he may not care for the specifics that you're outlining here and may boycott the meeting?

A. I have not so heard. Have no indication.

Q. Are you suggesting a noncivilian aircraft, a Soviet military plane?

A. Yes.

Q. And would it land at, say, McGuire, or some place like that?

A. It might land somewhere in the vicinity of New York.

Q. A lot of commercial airports have military sides to them, whether National Guard or—are you thinking in terms of something like that?

A. No. We're in the middle of this, but I don't want—we do not expect him to land at a commercial airport.

Q. John, what's the significance of not allowing him to land in an Aeroflot plane, but allowing him to land in a Russian military plane? What's the difference?

[22] On September 15, 1983, the Governors of New York and New Jersey, citing the Soviet destruction of the South Korean airliner and the possibility of violent new anti-Soviet protests, said they would deny permission of Soviet planes carrying Andrei Gromyko and other Soviet delegates to the U.N. General Assembly session to land at Kennedy and Newark International Airports. (New York Times, September 16, 1983, p. A9)

A. I think you'd have to talk to the Pentagon about that. They run military airfields.

Q. This is as a result of the ban on Aeroflot, isn't it?

A. As I understand it, the local authorities in New York and New Jersey would not permit him to land at a commercial airport, so it's academic.

Q. John, are we trying to discourage him from coming, or just trying to embarrass him?

A. No. It's not a question of trying to discourage him from coming. It's a question of facing the realities of the decision by the local authorities in certain States, which have said that he can't land—

Q. You won't let him land at a military airfield in an Aeroflot plane, is that what you're saying?

A. That's correct.

. . . . . .

Q. Is it possible, John, that the—is there a legal thing here? Is it possible that the local governments might be taking action in violation of the U.S.-U.N. host country agreement? [23]

A. I think that's a legal question, but, I mean, you have to face the realities of what is happening. They have so decided: that they are not going to accept this plane.

Q. Can I go back for a minute to—what was the sequence in which you advised the Soviets that they could not come in here with an Aeroflot plane for Gromyko? Did you advise them first and they then got your approval, got approval for, made application for a military flight?

A. This is an on-going situation, so I'm not suggesting that everything is cut-and-dry. What I'm suggesting is that there was an application, in terms of our obligations in terms of U.N. attendance. We sought permission for them to land in New York or in the New York area. That permission was denied by the local authorities. So when that became evident, one was presented with a situation where you have to discuss alternative methods for them to get here, but I don't know quite—

Q. You then advised them that they could not come with an Aeroflot plane?

A. Not into a military base.

Q. And is that the sequence of events, John?

A. So far as I know, but obviously this is moving along—

Q. When exactly did all this take place? Can you tell us that?

A. I don't know. I imagine very recently.

Q. You said before about asking the Port Authority of New York, you said "we made the normal application."

A. Yes.

Q. Does that mean that everytime somebody comes in, that somebody from the State Department has to make an application to the Port Authority of New York?

A. I don't know how wide that permission goes. But certainly I think in the case of the Soviet Union—I don't know. I would have to check on what other authorizations were— [24]

Q. Have we ever allowed a Soviet military craft to land at an American military base?

[24] On September 21, 1983, the Department of State provided the following additional information: "Special flights by U.N. delegations are customarily cleared with the Port Authority of New York. This is not a matter of making application, but rather of routine coordination of the details on arrangements for such flights. The Port Authority was similarly notified in advance of Mr. Gromyko's previous annual visits to N.Y." (Office of Press Relations, Department of State; posted statement) The posted statement erroneously said that the question was taken from the noon briefing on September 17, 1983. There was no noon briefing on that day.

A. I don't know. A good advisor back there is nodding his head, but of my own knowledge I don't know that.

Statement by Vice President Bush, Belgrade, September 17, 1983 [25]

Discussions With Yugoslav Leaders on Economic and Security Issues and Terrorism

As you know, I arrived in Yugoslavia yesterday as the guest of Vice President Zarkovic. I have held talks with him and with President Spiljak, Prime Minister Planinc, Foreign Secretary Mojsov and other Yugoslav officials. I was extremely satisfied with our discussions. As always, our talks were held in the friendly, open and constructive manner which is characteristic of the good bilateral relationship between our countries.

As a result of those talks it is clear that the principles that have successfully governed the Yugoslav-American relationship for so many years—respect for independence, sovereignty, equality and noninterference—remain valid today and will remain valid in the future. A completely independent, truly nonalligned Yugoslavia is a positive factor for both European security and world peace, and the United States supports such a role and position of Yugoslavia.

My Yugoslav hosts discussed Yugoslavia's economic prospects and the Yugoslav Government's policy of economic stabilization. I have expressed my government's strong support for these determined efforts to place the Yugoslav economy on a firm basis. In that connection, I discussed the upswing in the U.S. economy and recent developments in our international economic policy. I expressed my conviction that these improvements in the U.S. economic performance will benefit Yugoslavia's own efforts to expand exports to the convertible currency area. We reviewed recent examples of bilateral, political, economic, and cultural cooperation and the prospects for strengthening such cooperation in the future.

We discussed the problem of terrorist attacks against Yugoslav diplomatic, consular, and other representatives in the United States. The United States deplores all such acts of terrorism and will not tolerate such acts in its territory. We also reviewed the specific measures that the United States has taken to prevent such attacks against Yugoslav representatives.

We also discussed pressing international issues. We are both sincerely concerned about the problems of peace and security in the world today. My government profoundly respects the Yugoslav point of view on international issues, on which we have had and will continue to have a very rewarding and ongoing dialogue.

Thank you.

Address by President Reagan, Camp David, Maryland, September 17, 1983 [26]

"The Most Effective, Lasting Action Against Their [the Soviets'] Violence and Intimidation . . . Will Be To Go Forward With America's Program to Remain Strong. . . . This Is the Most Enduring Lesson of the Korean Air Lines Disaster"

My fellow Americans, 5 days after the Soviets shot down KAL 007, I went on nationwide television to urge that all of us in the civilized world make sure such an atrocity never happens again, and I pledged to you that night we would cooperate with other countries to improve the state of civil aviation, asking them to join us in not accepting the Soviet airline Aeroflot as a normal member of the international civil air community, not, that is, until the Soviets satisfy the cries of humanity for justice. [27]

On Thursday, an American delegation lead by Lynn Helms, who heads up the Federal Aviation Administration, went to Montreal for an emergency session of the ICAO, the International Civil Aviation Organization. This meeting was called at the request of the Republic of Korea, and 32 countries are attending. The group immediately went to work on a resolution to call for an international investigation to deplore this atrocity and to review procedures to prevent civilian aircraft from ever being attacked again. Yesterday, the resolution passed by an overwhelming majority. [28]

The Soviets have not budged. Apparently, their contempt for the truth and for the opinion of the civilized world is equaled only by their disdain for helpless people like the passengers aboard KAL Flight 007. They reserve for themselves the right to live by one set of rules, insisting everyone else live by another. They're supremely confident their crime and cover-up will soon be forgotten and we'll all be back to business as usual. Well, I believe they're badly mistaken. This case is far from closed. The Soviets' aggression has provoked a fundamental and long overdue reappraisal in countries all over the globe. The Soviet Union stands virtually alone against the world.

Decent people everywhere are coming together, and the world's outrage has not diminished. Repercussions such as that emergency ICAO meeting in Montreal are just beginning. Take the example of aviation. Canada suspended Aeroflot landing rights for 60 days and froze the signing of an agreement for Aeroflot refueling at Gander. The Canadian Air Traffic Controllers Association has withdrawn from a longstanding exchange agreement with the Soviet counterpart organization. The IFALPA, that's the International Federation of Air Line Pilot Associations, declared the U.S.S.R. an offending state. It called for its member associations to ban all flights to Moscow for 60 days, and it called on related international unions and professional associations to take similar actions. It demanded Soviet guarantees that similar attacks will never be repeated, and what is most encouraging, because it underscores this reappraisal I mentioned, the IFALPA promised to consider further actions against the Soviets if no such guarantees are given. Scandinavian Air Lines has suspended flights within Soviet airspace for 60 days. Norwegian pilots and air traffic controllers are boycotting all air service between Norway and the Soviet Union. With the exception of France, Greece, and Turkey, all the NATO nations and Japan have temporarily suspended civil air traffic between their respective nations and the Soviet Union. Even neutral Switzerland and pilots in Finland have joined the general boycott. Australia and New Zealand are also taking strong measures in the area of civil aviation. In the United Nations, the Security Council voted a resolution deploring the Soviet attack, forcing the Soviets to cast their veto to block its adoption. [29]

Here, too, we're seeing evidence that a fundamental reappraisal is in the works. Most countries rebuke the Kremlin. Only a few of Moscow's dependables stood up for its defense. Nonaligned nations are looking to the United States for leadership. I've instructed our Ambassador to the United Nations, Jeane Kirkpatrick, to sit down with them to seek out new areas of cooperation. In the Congress, both the House and the Senate mobilized overwhelming bipartisan support for a resolution of condemnation. [30]

Some would have us lash out in another way, by cancelling our grain shipments, but that would punish American farmers, not the Soviet aggressors. The most effective, lasting action against their violence and intimidation, and it's the one action the Soviets would welcome least, will be to go forward with America's program to remain strong. I'm confident that if enough of you at the grass roots make your voices heard, we can and will do just that. We may not be able to change the Soviets' ways, but we can change our attitude toward them. We can stop pretending they share the same dreams and aspirations we do. We can start preparing ourselves for what John F. Kennedy called a long twilight struggle. It won't be quick, it won't make headlines, and it sure won't be easy, but it's what we must do to keep America strong, keep her free and yes, preserve the peace for our children and for our children's children.

This is the most enduring lesson of the Korean Air Lines disaster. If we grasp it, then history will say this tragedy was a major turning point because this time the world did not go back to business as usual.

Until next week, thanks for listening. God bless you.

Conversations With Romanian Leaders

. . . . . .

VICE PRESIDENT BUSH. Thank you, Ambassador Funderburk and let me just say how pleased we have been in as much as the visit is drawing to the end to be here. As Mrs. Bush and I leave Bucharest, we want to express our appreciation to President Ceausescu, to Vice President Radulescu, who hosted this visit, Foreign Minister Andrei, for the hospitality and the kindness shown to us and the members of our party. Bucharest's well-known reputation as a warm and charming city is by no means exaggerated. Our Ambassador having been here before knows this well and has made our visit specially pleasant because of his own past experience. It was a pleasure to meet and exchange views with President Ceausescu on a full range of important international problems and bilateral issues. My talks with Vice President Radulescu and Foreign Minister Andrei were similarly of value. Among other topics we discussed ways to achieve a fuller realization of the Helsinki Final Act including the new and expanded scope [given] that act in [the] recently concluded Madrid document. It's essential that the ideals and the hopes of Helsinki and Madrid with regard to human contacts, security and economic cooperation be given concrete expression. Only then can true peace and security be achieved for our peoples. The President, the Vice President, the Foreign Minister and I also discussed the interests our nations share in expanding our trade and in keeping our cultural relations active and fruitful. Our meetings took place in an open, we felt very cordial atmosphere, and I am convinced that the better understanding we have achieved will serve to enhance the cooperation that lies ahead, in the years ahead. And let me close before I respond to your questions by once again expressing our appreciation for the hospitality that has been shown to us here and our admiration for the beauty of this land. With no further adieu I would be pleased to respond to questions. Yes sir.

Q. (Inaudible). Are there any concrete results through your talks with President Ceausescu or any of the other ministers, or were you just discussing things?

BUSH. Well, there were one or two bilateral things that concretely move forward but I should have said this at the outset—I have a policy when I am the guest of the President or Vice President of a country to have this statement on the details of what we talk about come from the host government. But, yes, there was some progress in a couple of specific areas but mainly there was a wide array of discussion on the issues with the President of a wide array of world issues, and certainly concern on the issues that are of the front page of every paper. We discussed those things. Yes ma'am.

Q. (Inaudible)—Johnson, Associated Press, Frankfurt. I noted that this remark about the Helsinki and Madrid documents was similar to the one you made at a luncheon toast yesterday,[32] but yesterday's mentioned human rights and this one doesn't. Is there a reason for that omission today?

BUSH. No, I just didn't want to be too repetitive, semantical. The message is exactly the same. There is no substantive reason for that. Yes, ma'am.

Q. Cathy B. [?] Press, long. I wonder if you could tell us a general outline of some of the specific agreements you reached. I understand there was something reached on commercial relations. Can you tell us generally while leaving the specifics of [to] our host. What agreements were reached?

BUSH. No, I can't. But I prefer that to come for [from] them. They may have already announced it, but it is just a courtesy thing and they were related to the trade field but I really will insist that their spokesman and their people have an opportunity to respond and put whatever spin they want on it. But in terms of our commerce and our trade we are trying to move forward and I think the steps relate to that. Yes, sir, in the back.

Q. From the Romanian News Agency and television. Mr. Vice President, could you tell if in your view the letter of President Ceausescu addressed to the President of the United States and to Comrade Andropov could help in the talks about arms reduction?

BUSH. Well, we feel that any expression of concern any communication of that nature that expresses strong conviction is helpful. The allied position is well known and it is not going to change, and it is first serious about negotiating for reduction in intermediate nuclear forces at Geneva and says nothing of strategic arms talks. We have supported and continue to support the best answer for all Europe, the best answer for the world, and that is to get rid of an entire generation of these intermediate nuclear forces, get rid of them all, everyone, get rid of them all together. That is the high moral ground that offers a lot of hope to the people of Romania and that's our position and as I understand it in the past it has had some appeal to Romania. Not being able to work that out because the Soviets don't want to do that at this point, we then suggested equal numbers, and our negotiators are there. They are at the table, they are serious, they are trying to achieve the results that in my view the whole world wants, a reduction. A significant reduction of these weapons. And we are going to stay there. And that is a concerted allied position that is not going to change. But our arms negotiators are there and they will stay there as long as it takes before, after deployment, whatever it takes to negotiate this and we are very serious about it. Our President is serious about it. I think some do not understand that. It happens to be true. Yes, in the corner. Yes, sir.

Q. Tom Bodin, Radio Free Europe. Mr. Vice President, you mentioned in your opening statement the importance of human contact in the context of the Helsinki agreement. I wonder if you could expand a little more on what the United States would like to see.

[32] Reference is to a toast Vice President Bush made at a luncheon hosted by Romanian Vice President Radulescu on September 18, 1983, in which Bush said, among other things, "We must work together to ensure that the ideals of Helsinki and Madrid are given concrete expression, particularly in human rights, including human contact and emigration." (Press Release, September 18, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the Vice President)

BUSH. Well, the United States position is—I mean I think if we stand for anything it's for people to come and go, the freedom of people. Freedom to rejoin families. Freedom to reunite loved ones, and so we will continue to control, as every country will, its own emigration policies. But we want to see as much freedom of this nature as possible and we will, that is the hallmark of the United States, that is what the Statue of Liberty is about in a sense, and so when we come to countries, some who have different systems, some who have the same, we advocate this principle. Rejoining families for example, and of being free to move on to new horizons. And so that is the simplistic summary of a deeply held conviction by the American people. It isn't political in the United States for those who maybe haven't been to our country. It transcends political party systems. It's deeply ingrained into the makeup of our nation itself and therefore we advocate those principles, whether it is in Helsinki, or whether it's bilateral relations, or wherever else it is, whether it is happily received or not. It is something we feel strongly about. Yes, sir.

Q. (Inaudible) Is the United States Government satisfied with the human rights position in Romania and if not could you tell us whatever is causing you concern?

BUSH. Well, the differences that we have had with Romania, frankly I think things have improved. It is well known the difference we had with this country on the emigration tax.[33] What they do in terms of taxes is their business. What we do in terms of things we control are our business. But we made strong appeals and we believe that real progress has been made. We want to see it continuing in this field and a lot of fields. This is what the United States, you know we don't try to intervene in someone's internal affairs, but when we have a principle we can stick to it. And we will try to effect change that benefits mankind. Yes ma'am.

Q. From the New China Agency. In your opinion, Mr. Vice President, what steps can be taken by the American administration for the development of the relations, especially in the economic field, between Romania and the United States?

BUSH. Well, we have taken some steps in the economic field. Both have, and we think that their progress is good. The steps that I referred to, the concrete things that I talked about, will be, I am sure, announced by the Romanian Government. But basically, we want to see more trade with Romania. The concrete steps have been taken, and so I think when this joint commission comes under Secretary Baldrige there will be a follow-on.[34] Secretary Baldrige is a strong proponent of free trade of more trade with Romania, and I think out of that there may be even more specifics. But my visit wasn't to come here to outline certain mechanical steps to be taken. We have with Romania the most-favored-nation treatment. We have a wide array of trade items with them. They are concerned about the imbalance that exists and we would like to see them achieve more exports. We believe as the economy recovers that will naturally follow. But we also feel that more understanding of our markets can be very helpful to them, and there are ways in which these meetings can enhance that kind of thing. Yes, in the back, yes ma'am.

Q. (Inaudible). You have discussed the most important international problems. May I ask you how do you see the participation of Romania, the constitution of Romania to the international life?

BUSH. Well, on these major international questions, President Ceausescu is known widely for having strongly held views and being in a somewhat unique position to effect steps towards peace. I think of the Middle East. I think of his ability and interest in keeping contact with both sides in the major difficulties in the Middle East. I am talking about the Palestinians; I'm talking about Israel. So there's an area where he has had almost a unique experience from a leader of a country of keeping interest in both sides and then that leads him to make suggestions, some of which the United States might agree with, some of which we couldn't, as to what would be helpful in bringing peace to that troubled corner of the world. I had

[34] Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige visited Romania, October 4–7, 1983, as head of a U.S. delegation to a joint American-Romanian Economic Commission which attempted to resolve commercial differences between the two nations. the opportunity to explain with him the Reagan plan what it is that we think needs to be done in Lebanon—getting all foreign forces out of Lebanon. The Israelis having agreed to get out, now we think Syria ought to do what they said and get out of Lebanon, for example. But, going back to your question, it's a much more fruitful exchange for a leader in the American government structure to come and find a leader who has a keen interest and has established contacts in all these troubled corners of the world. Africa is another place. We want to see a solution to the Namibian question and so does he. And he has a rather unique vantage point as he discusses it. The question of missiles in Europe that concerns everybody, he has a very unique vantage point. So in a lot of these places we find consultation with him to be extraordinarily useful. Now whether there is going to be any concrete steps, that we have to wait and see.

Q. Romanian News Agency. Mr. Vice President, which would be the attitude of the United States Government of the proposal by Mr. Ceausescu about direct participation of the European states in the negotiations in Geneva?

BUSH. Well, we didn't dwell on that. Our position in terms of the negotiation is the biggest contribution that the United States can make having had extraordinarily full consultation with its allies. Consultations really that seasoned diplomats say have been better than any consultations in the past with those countries affected, and with an alliance that in my view is strongly together. The best contribution that we can make given the time, the clock running, and the time frame, is to for the United States not to start some new initiative but to stay there at that negotiating table under our extraordinarily able negotiator Paul Nitze and do everything we can to achieve accommodation with the Soviet Union. What else happens and what our allies decide to do in consultation with the pact countries and all of that, that is something else again. And maybe it can be helpful, and maybe not. But the only thing that the United States can do, and we are operating in a relatively short time frame here in terms of our, the second track of that dual track decision the deployment track, is to concentrate on the one forum that can solve this problem and we want to solve the problem. And we want to move forward with, as I said, hopefully an elimination of weapons. But if that's too idealistic for the Soviets, if they can't bring themselves to lower the level of terror by getting rid of the entire generation which all the allies want, why then we are there to negotiate some equitable balance arrangement. And that is the role we'll take. What role others take in terms of more people coming in that comes under the heading of their business.

Q. Yes. Mr. Vice President, you say the United States will stay at the Geneva table as long as it is absolutely necessary. At this point, do you foresee an extension of the negotiations beyond the November scheduled close?

BUSH. We'll stay there past November, the deployment will go forward but there. Those are two tracks; one is the negotiating track and the other one is the deployment. The deployment date is fixed, it is set, it has been tested in ree [?] elections and it is going forward and what goes in can also come out. And we ought to remember that. I can't conceive of any power walking away from the table once deployment starts. I mean the idea is to negotiate, the idea is to rid the world of the fear of these things. And we will stay there as long as it takes. Before or after negotiations, I assume the Soviets, if the rhetoric is matched by the fact, would want to do the same thing. Nobody wants to stop talking. Nobody wants to stop negotiating. I can't imagine any country adopting such a negative attitude as that.

Q. One last question. Can you tell us anything about your discussions on U.S.-Soviet relations?

BUSH. I can't tell you about the discussions but I can tell you about the relations. One, we want a negotiation to bring about a reduction, a serious major, verifiable reduction in nuclear arms. Two, this Korean airline incident—there is no question about it, that has made relations more difficult. I cannot convey to you who have not been in the United States recently the depth of feeling in my country about the barbarous downing of that airplane. About the killing of 269 innocent people. That was bad. That was bad enough, but then to say we [they] would do it again is unconscionable, in terms of any kind of understanding in the United States, unconscionable. So that incident and you have seen the reaction all around the world has made tense the relationship. Now the President acted in a restrained way. He said these talks are going to go on and they are as far as we are concerned, but to ask me to size up for you the relationship and not discuss that matter would be, there would be no diplomatic word for it. It would simply be inexcusable because it is very serious, and it has happened before. Korean airliner downed in 1978 with two civilians killed and now it happens again and now they say they will do it again. The world doesn't understand this. Most people in the world don't understand it. So it has complicated relations. There is no question about it. But when it comes to reduction of missiles, when it comes to trying to lower the levels of tension in the world, the United States is there at the table now, didn't leave, will continue to be there, will reach out, go that extra mile, to try to achieve arms reductions. And maybe it would be a good time for all to consider, well isn't this given the problem that incident caused, wouldn't it be a good time to take the high moral ground and just say: "Let's make a major step together to eliminate a whole generation of these weapons, get rid of them all." I think maybe it would. Let's hope that out of something horrible something good eventually can come. Thank you very much.

Conversations With Hungarian Leaders

[Bush.] We have now come to the end of what for Mrs. Bush and me has been a satisfying and useful visit. The productive meetings we engaged in here have strengthened my own convictions about the importance of continued cooperation and exchange between our two countries. Both sides have clearly demonstrated their commitment to working for peace and security in Europe and throughout the world, through further improvement of our bilateral relationship and continued participation in broader international arenas. I leave Hungary convinced that every effort is being made to continue the warm and sturdy relationship our two countries enjoy. And I am confident that such efforts will not only continue now on both sides, but lead to further cooperation. I am grateful to those whose dedication make our relationship such a good one, and particularly to those whose hard work has made this visit such a success today. Then, I leave with a fuller understanding of Hungary, its interests and its people. To all of you who have contributed to the fruitful and enjoyable experiences during my stay here, I extend my heartfelt thanks. The hospitality, courtesy, and friendship that we have enjoyed on this, our first visit to Hungary, encourage me to hope that it will not be our last. Thank you.

Reporter for Hungarian TV Newsreel. Q. Yours is the first Vice Presidential visit to Hungary from the United States. Now after having had an opportunity to meet and get acquainted with our leaders, how do you see that this visit will facilitate and encourage the further development of our bilateral relations?

Bush Reply. Well I think I have a better understanding from talking to the top leaders of the system of the desire to move forward in all areas where we can, and the first one that comes to mind, in particular, is the field of commercial relationship. We exchanged ideas as to how this can go forward. And so I think the answer to the question lies in much more understanding. Not just on my part, but on the part of all those who are traveling with us: What we refer to in the United States as differentiation. We are respectful of Hungary in its alliances and all this, but we differentiate. When we see countries that want to work with us, who want to trade with us, who want to cooperate in other areas. I think of culture and other areas of that nature. That's good. And the United States, I hope, will continue to be a strong partner, a good partner and a partner that wants to see relations continue to improve. So it's understanding which will enhance the relationship that both sides value.

Q. Istvan Szabo of Nepszabadsag, Communist Party newspaper.

In your interview in the Hungarian TV, you mentioned the possibility that the cooperation of our countries may be extended. First of all, in the economic field, my question is: What do you expect us to do in the interest of this kind of development and what may be the U.S. Government's contribution to this aid?

BUSH REPLY. More trade. And we don't expect any special considerations or special requirements from Hungary. We want to see those market forces work. We want to see mutual trade. I'll be very honest with you. We are trading with Hungary because it is in the interest of the United States to do so. Hungary is trading with the United States, I assume, because it is in the interest of Hungary to do so. What we believe is that the freer and fuller trade we have, the more benefit it is to both peoples. So we are not asking for some special consideration or asking the Hungarian Government officials or the Hungarian people to diminish any relationship they have with anyone else. All we are saying is, let's have open trading relations develop as strongly as possible. That is what we are pressing for. And I am encouraged with the way that is moving. Now there are certain considerations in the way in which U.S. trade works where Hungary has needed support from the United States in terms of the multinational organizations to which we are the largest contributor in terms of special trade provisions such as MFN, which is a component of the U.S. law. And in there, we try to work with our Congress so that the markets will be available in the freest possible way to Hungarian commercial interest.

VOA CORRESPONDENT. Q. What kind of a personal message, if any, did you bring from President Reagan to President Losenczi?

BUSH REPLY. The greeting we did. I handed him a letter. I think it would be more appropriate for that to be released by the President. But it was a message of friendship. It was a message of cooperation. It was a message of genuine good will recognizing the improved relations that exist. You know, I have been in the diplomatic field from time to time as Ambassador at the United Nations and as Ambassador in China. And in diplomacy, you are taught to use funny words like full and frank discussion and all these words which have double and triple-entendres. When you don't like somebody, you say we had a frank exchange instead of saying we started shouting at each other. But these meetings, leaving out all the diplomatic language, have been really good. Where we have had differences, we have discussed them. Where we see things that could complicate the life of one country or another we discussed them. And so there has been an openness here that I find refreshing and that I want to certainly report to our President.

MAGYAR HIRLAP. Q. Do you see a chance for the most-favored-nation status for Hungary to be prolonged for more than one year?

BUSH REPLY. That's a matter that has been discussed. That's a matter, very frankly, and I don't think this is violating a confidence, we discussed at great length with the leaders. The question is: "Do I see a chance?" The answer is yes. The certainty of it or when that will happen, I am not prepared to comment on. But that is the kind of matter I was talking about earlier that, as relations improve, certainly it is understandable that that would be wanted by both sides. So, yes, there's a chance.

Q. In the past decades Hungarian intellectuals have gained fame in the U.S.A. Is the Government of the United States planning to take steps to further utilize Hungarian intellectuals?

BUSH REPLY. Yes, in a very special sense, Hungary has enriched the United States technologically, culturally and in many other ways. So that kind of experience, that kind of talking to each other really does help improve relations, and very candidly it has been an enormous benefit to the U.S. in many ways. We have many people of Hungarian heritage living in the United States. They still feel a great affinity for Hungary and the more of the kind of exchange you just mentioned that takes place, the better it is as far as the United States Government and people are concerned. Most of these exchanges, or a lot of them, go into relationships with private groups, private universities, private think tanks, private research organizations, medical organizations, and we respect Hungary's massive contribution to the U.S. development.

Address by Vice President Bush Before the Austrian Association for Foreign Policy and International Relations, Vienna, September 21, 1983 (Extracts) [36]

U.S. Policies Toward Eastern Europe

. . . . . .

You Austrians so aptly call this part of the world Mitteleuropa—Central Europe. Can a wall, can guard dogs and machine guns and border patrols deny hundreds of years of European history? Can they create and enforce this fictitious division down the very center of Europe?

When we think of that monstrous wall, we think first of the very personal violence it expresses: Families divided, a people held prisoner in their own country. But what of the violence—just as real—it does to our history and traditions? What of the violence it does to Europe?

It has often been remarked that of the three great events in European history—the Renaissance, the Reformation, the Enlightenment—Russia took part in none. But Mitteleuropa, the region that gave birth to Jan Hus, took part in them all. This region has always looked west, not east. I was struck by the close ties in even its easternmost quarter when I heard the beautiful romance language, so similar to French and Italian, spoken by the people of Romania.

Fortunately, we are beginning to see fissures in the wall. During my visit I saw that, more and more, the natural forces which bring people closer together, rather than push them apart, are beginning to reassert themselves.

We in America feel strong and unbreakable ties with the people of Central Europe. So many Americans came to our country from this region to escape poverty and religious and political persecution. Many still do. America was built in great part through the industry of Hungarians, Germans, Czechs, and Poles. Across the street from my office in the White House stands a statue of Tadeusz Kosciuzko, a hero of our revolutionary war, whose brilliance as a military engineer helped free my country from foreign domination. The United States, in fact all of the civilized world, remembers with the deepest gratitude the part played by the free Polish forces in World War II, the brave fighters who rejected Hitler's and Stalin's infamous pact to partition their country. And we will never forget the courage of the Poles who, after years of suffering the ravages of war and the ruthless suppression of their people, rose up again in Warsaw—they fought to the end, while those who called themselves their allies cooled their heels on the east bank of the Vistula River.

The ties of my country to Central Europe are many, our histories are often intimately intertwined. The founder and President of the first Czechoslovak Republic, Thomas Masaryk, married an American. Sixty-five years ago this October, he wrote the Czechoslovak Declaration of Independence, a document founded on the same "historic and natural" rights that guided our own forefathers in writing our Declaration of Independence. To quote from that document written by Masaryk: "We accept and shall adhere to the ideals of modern democracy, as they have been the ideals of our nation for centuries." The "nation of Comenius," he said, accepts "the principles of liberated mankind, of the actual equality of nations, and of governments deriving all their just power from the consent of the governed."

The Czechoslovak Republic, which lasted from 1918 until 1938, was one of the most prosperous countries in Europe; its charter guaranteed "complete freedom of conscience, religion and science, literature and art, speech, the press, and the right of assembly and petition."

Today, according to their own constitution, the Czechs are promised the same freedoms; so, too, by written law and international treaties to which the Soviet Union and the governments of Eastern Europe are signatories, are the people of other countries in the region promised these basic human rights. But we have seen how often governmental deeds diverge from official promises. The people in many parts of Eastern Europe must now carry on their culture, their traditions, underground and in fear.

But there are groups, such as the Charter 77 movement in Czechoslovakia, and Solidarity in Poland which have sought to persuade their government to abide by their own laws and international commitments. Because of these individuals, who courageously demand their human rights, and because of the more imaginative leaders in some of these countries who have listened to the just wishes of their people and have sought to democratize their social and economic systems, European culture on the eastern side of the continent will never die.

The United States shares with these people a vision of Eastern Europe in which respect for human rights becomes the norm and not a rare concession to international pressure, where prosperity and advancement replace economic backwardness, and openness overcomes barriers to human contacts and economic cooperation. In approaching the problems of the region, United States policy is guided by certain constants: First, we recognize no lawful division of Europe. There is much misunderstanding about the substance of the Yalta Conference. Let me state as clearly as I can: There was no agreement at that time to divide Europe up into "spheres of influence;" on the contrary, the powers agreed on the principle of the common responsibility of the three allies for all the liberated territories. The Soviet Union pledged itself to grant full independence to Poland and to all other states in Eastern Europe, and to hold free elections there. The Soviet violation of these obligations is the primary root of East–West tensions today.

A similar misunderstanding exists about the Helsinki Accord. Some argue that Helsinki endorses the status quo, the present division of Europe. We reject this notion. At review sessions in Belgrade, Madrid, and the upcoming session here in Vienna in 1986, we have stated and will continue to insist that the heart of Helsinki is a commitment to openness and human rights.

Let me stress here that the United States does not seek to destabilize or undermine any government, but our attitude toward the region is informed by a sense of history—of European history. For this reason we support and will encourage all movement toward the social, humanitarian and democratic ideals which have characterized the historical development of Europe. We appreciate the special role of countries such as Yugoslavia and Austria which have contributed so much to restoring historic patterns of trade and communications.

We share with the people of Eastern and Central Europe three basic aspirations: freedom, prosperity, and peace. We recognize the diversity and the complexity of the region. Of Austria's neighbors to the East, some have shown a greater measure of independence in the conduct of their foreign policy. Some have introduced greater openness in their societies, lowered barriers to human contacts, and engaged in market-oriented economic reforms. Others, unfortunately, continue to toe the Soviet line. Their foreign policy is determined in Moscow, and their domestic policies still flagrantly violate the most fundamental human rights.

In our relations with the countries of Eastern Europe, we take these differences into account. Our policy is one of differentiation—that is, we look to what degree countries pursue autonomous foreign policies, independent of Moscow's direction; and to what degree they foster domestic liberalization—politically, economically and in their respect for human rights. The United States will engage in closer political, economic and cultural relations with those countries such as Hungary and Romania which assert greater openness or independence. We will strengthen our dialogue and cooperation with such countries.

We are not saying that countries must follow policies identical to those of the United States. We will not, however, reward closed societies and belligerent foreign policies—countries such as Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia, which continue to flagrantly violate the most fundamental human rights; and countries such as East Germany and, again, Bulgaria, which act as proxies to the Soviets in the training, funding and arming of terrorists, and which supply advisors and military and technical assistance to armed movements seeking to destabilize governments in the developing world.

Let me stress once more that our hopes for Eastern Europe are peaceful. But we believe that reform is essential. Over the span of many years the United States has provided hundreds of millions of dollars of loans and credits for the Polish economy in the hope that this aid would help build a more plentiful and open society. We cannot, however, be expected to shore up a nation's economy when the government refuses to institute the most basic economic reforms. If countries insist on following the Soviet economic model, even dollars, francs and marcs cannot prevent the certain failure of their economies.

It is by now abundantly clear that highly centralized, command economies cannot fulfill the basic needs of their populations, let alone remain competitive in world markets or keep pace with technological advancement. Just as retarded industrial development relegated much of nineteenth century Central Europe to a backwater of agricultural poverty, there is ample evidence that the unfolding information revolution will sweep past an unprepared Soviet Union and much of Eastern Europe—unless there is basic change. For example, Hungary's relative prosperity demonstrates the practical, positive results that follow on social and economic liberalization.

The countries of Eastern Europe have a choice to make. They can close themselves off, or they can open up and join the world economy positively, as traders rather than debtors. Think about this: 25 percent of all Soviet farm output comes from private plots that occupy less than 3 percent of the Soviet Union's agricultural land. It's doubtful whether Soviet agriculture could survive without this concession to private enterprise.

I'd like to close with the words of a great Mitteleuropean, His Holiness Pope John Paul II. In just three lines he pointed out the road toward a better future:

"Persons over Things.

"Ethics over Technology.

"Spirit over Matter."

I have visited four important nations in Central Europe—nations rich in culture and history; nations with differing systems and perspectives. But in my talks with the leaders and people of these countries, I've become convinced that we all share a common goal—to heal the wounds that separate us, to remove the artificial barriers which divide us, and to reduce the level of fear and terror in the world through arms reduction.

I come away from Eastern Europe with a strong sense of its diversity, a strong sense of the uniqueness of each country. With some, our ties are already greatly improved—my visit is one indication of that. But we are not about to write off a single country. We are ready to respond to each to the extent that they are meeting their own people's aspirations, are pursuing their own independent foreign policy, and are willing to open up to the rest of the world.

I am an optimist. I see a bright future for Central Europe—a future of peace, prosperity, and freedom. I am positive the barriers will come down and that the desire of our neighbors to the East to once more become a full part of Europe will finally, after many hard bitter years, be fulfilled. In this spirit of reconciliation, we must all work together to make this optimistic vision a reality—to once again make Europe whole.

Thank you.

Public Law 98–98, Approved September 28, 1983 [37]

Condemnation of the Soviet Union's Destruction of the South Korean Airliner

Whereas the United States joins with the world community in expressing its outrage over the actions of the Soviet Government on August 31, 1983, which caused the destruction of Korean Air Lines flight 7 with the loss of two hundred and sixty-nine innocent lives;

Whereas on August 31, 1983, Korean Air Lines flight 7 inadvertently entered Soviet airspace;

Whereas Soviet authorities tracked Korean Air Lines flight 7 for more than two hours, but did not adhere to all the internationally recognized procedures necessary to warn the aircraft that it was off course and to protect its passengers;

Whereas a Soviet Air Force fighter fired air-to-air missiles at Korean Air Lines flight 7 and destroyed the unarmed, clearly marked civilian airliner with two hundred and sixty-nine innocent men, women, and children from fourteen nations aboard, including sixty-one of our fellow citizens;

Whereas among the victims was a distinguished Member of Congress, the Honorable Larry P. McDonald;

Whereas the highest levels of the Soviet Government have lied in an attempt to justify this unconscionable act and have continued to deny access to the area where the airplane went down;

Whereas the Soviet Government has publicly proclaimed its intention to repeat its murderous act if another airliner wanders inadvertently into Soviet airspace; and

Whereas this cold-blooded barbarous attack on a commercial airliner straying off course is one of the most infamous and reprehensible acts in history: now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States hereby—

(1) condemns the Soviet crime of destroying Korean Air Lines flight 7 and murdering the two hundred and sixty-nine innocent people onboard;

(2) calls for a full and frank explanation from the Soviet Union for this brutal massacre;

(3) extends its deepest sympathies to the families who lost loved ones, and supports their rights to obtain reparations from the Soviet Union;

(4) calls on the Soviet Union to assist international efforts to recover the remains of the victims;

(5) calls for an international investigation by the International Civil Aviation Organization into this heinous incident;

(6) declares its intention to work with the international community in demanding that the Soviet Union modify its air defense procedures and practices to assure the safe passage of commercial airliners;

(7) finds that this tragic incident, and the Soviet Government's refusal to acknowledge responsibility for its wanton conduct, will make it more difficult for the United States and other nations to accept the Soviet Union as a responsible member of the international community; and

(8) urges our allies and other nations to cooperate with the United States in continuing to demand that the Soviet Government unequivocally apologize for its actions, fully compensate the families of the innocent victims, and agree to abide by internationally recognized and established procedures which are purposefully designed to prevent the occurrence of such tragedies.

2. Vasile Pungan, Minister of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation of the Socialist Republic of Romania, headed the Romanian delegation and presided at the Commission meeting.

Malcolm Baldrige, Secretary of Commerce of the United States of America, headed the American delegation.

The lists of the members of the official American and Romanian delegations are appended. [39]

3. Members of the Romanian-American Economic Council as well as other American firms and Romanian economic organizations participated in the work of the session.

4. On the occasion of the Commission meeting Malcolm Baldrige, Secretary of Commerce of the United States of America, was received by the President of the Socialist Republic of Romania, Nicolae Ceausescu.

5. On October 6, 1983, Secretary Baldrige opened the largest U.S. exhibition at the Bucharest International Fair since 1976.

6. Secretary Baldrige had discussions with Vasile Pungan, Minister of Foreign Trade and Foreign Economic Cooperation, Ioan Avram, Minister of Machine Building, and met with Ioan Florea, Minister of Woodworking Industry and Building Materials, Lina Ciobanu, Minister of Light Industry, Ion Tesu, Minister of Agriculture and Food Industry, as well as other prominent persons from the leading economic sectors of Romania.

7. The work of the Commission session took place in the plenary sessions, working groups on trade promotion (I), development of economic, industrial and technical cooperation (II), and cooperation in agriculture (III), and in meetings of the official representatives of the two countries.

8. On the occasion of the session a seminar on marketing, advertising, and promotion of Romanian products on the American market was jointly organized by the U.S. Department of Commerce and the Romanian Institute of World Economy.

9. The sides expressed satisfaction with the positive development of American-Romanian economic relations in the ten years which have passed since the establishment of the Joint Commission in conformity with the Declaration jointly adopted in 1973. [40]

In the conviction that a substantial expansion of bilateral trade and economic cooperation is possible and desirable, the two sides reaffirmed their determination to act for the accelerated development and diversification thereof on the basis of mutual advantage, as well as their commitment to friendship between the United States of America and Romania, and their continuing readiness to consult on problems in regard to bilateral economic relations, in the spirit of agreements existing between the two countries.

10. The two sides were encouraged by the continuing improvement of Romania's international financial situation and by the economic recovery in the United States, which create conditions favorable to growth of trade. They examined ways of giving a new impetus to American-Romanian economic relations and expressed the belief that special efforts of both sides would result in benefits for both economies and would enhance the warm relations between the American and Romanian peoples.

11. The two sides agreed to support effectively efforts to achieve a level of bilateral trade in 1984 higher than the highest level reached until now, so that in the following few years a level of 2 billion dollars annually may be reached.

12. The sides agreed to facilitate the creation, on the basis of mutual advantage, of appropriate mechanisms to promote accelerated growth of exports, including the establishment of joint marketing ventures and other vehicles to promote sales.

13. The American side explained the possibilities which the Generalized System of Preferences offers Romania and the resulting advantages for the development of economic relations between the two countries.

14. Noting the importance of Most-Favored-Nation tariff status to the development of their bilateral economic relations, the two sides discussed their respective concerns in this regard. They expressed satisfaction at the renewal of Romania's Most-Favored-Nation status in 1983 and agreed that every effort should be made to create conditions favorable to its continued extension. [41]

15. With a view to the further development of bilateral economic relations, the two sides discussed a wide range of issues in respect to the exchange of economic information and data, of import and export administration, specific aspects of negotiation and fulfillment of contracts, countertrade, as well as banking, financial, transportation and tourism matters.

16. The two sides exchanged views on the concern of the American side regarding some aspects of Romanian patent legislation and agreed to continue their efforts to reach mutually acceptable solutions to such problems as might arise, in the interest of the development of trade and bilateral economic cooperation.

17. The parties examined the results obtained until now in the area of bilateral economic cooperation, had a wide exchange of views regarding the possibilities for expanding bilateral economic cooperation, and analyzed proposals of the Romanian side for industrial and agricultural cooperation, including joint production ventures. The Romanian side emphasized its particular interest in the areas of industrial robotics, electronics, telecommunications, pharmaceuticals and other chemical products, fodder production, animal husbandry, and other areas of agricultural production.

Both sides agreed promptly to inform their companies and economic organizations of possibilities for new cooperation projects, including joint production and marketing ventures. They agreed to examine new fields of cooperation in production, including third-country cooperation and cooperation in the areas of banking, maritime transportation, and ocean fishing.

18. On the occasion of the session, the American side presented proposals regarding the program for increasing productivity in industry, agriculture and services in Romania, and discussed the methods for their implementation.

19. The two sides exchanged information on the agricultural situation and outlook in each country. The discussion included an exchange of views on the facilitation of trade and bilateral cooperation in the field of agriculture and the program for the systematic exchange of statistical information, and for the development of scientific and technical cooperation was examined.

20. The two sides agreed that the development of Romanian exports to the United States would lead to the increase in American exports to Romania and would contribute to the increase of bilateral trade.

21. The Romanian side expressed its opinion that the implementation of economically advantageous activities in the field of economic cooperation between the two countries is impeded by delays in the issuance or denial of U.S. export licenses. The American side noted the concern of the Romanian side and stated that export license requests for Romania would receive a full hearing.

22. A fruitful exchange of views took place on business facilities benefitting economic organizations engaged in commercial and cooperation activities in the two countries. The two sides agreed to develop and improve these facilities.

23. The Romanian side expressed its concern in connection with problems in respect to the renewal of the civil aviation agreement and access of Romanian aircraft to airports in the United States. [42]

24. The two sides agreed, within the context of the existing Commission and Council mechanisms, to review periodically progress towards achieving increased trade and industrial cooperation.

25. The two sides expressed their high regard for the contribution of the Romanian-American Economic Council and welcomed the participation of its members in the proceedings of the Commission.

26. The parties agreed that the ninth session of the Commission represented an important step in the development of mutual relations in accord with the understandings between the presidents of the two countries, in the interest of the two peoples and that of international economic cooperation.

27. The Commission agreed to hold its following session, the tenth, in Washington, in 1984. The date and the agenda will be agreed in accord with the terms of reference and the rules of the Commission.

Statement by President Reagan, October 18, 1983 [43]

Condemnation of Soviet Human Rights Policies

Barely a month after attending an international conference in Madrid and joining 34 nations in a commitment to respect human rights, the Soviet Union has gone back on its word, launching a new campaign of repression against human rights activists.

Moscow has just sentenced a well-known Soviet refusenik, Iosif Begun, to 7 years imprisonment and 5 years of internal exile. [44] The punishment of this courageous Jewish believer is the most severe measure specified in Article 70 of the Soviet criminal code, dealing with dissemination of so-called anti-Soviet propaganda.

Soviet persecution of religious and political dissidents is not new. In the case of Mr. Begun, the Soviet regime has refused for 13 years to honor his request to emigrate to Israel.

But Soviet policy toward Jewish emigration and dissident movements has sunk to a new low of brutality and repression. Anti-semitism has escalated dramatically, as has harassment of other human rights defenders. We have received reports that Father Sigitas Tamkevicius, a Lithuanian Catholic priest active on behalf of religious freedom, is facing a similar fate as Iosif Begun.

Finally, we have received reports that Oleg Radzinskiy has also been tried. Mr. Radzinskiy, a member of the unofficial Soviet peace organization "Group to Establish Trust Between the US and USSR" was arrested October 28, 1982, and has been held for almost a year. The inability of Soviet authorities to tolerate any activities by those who are not members of their government-controlled, "captive" peace groups illustrates the hypocrisy of their statements. There is a night and day contrast between aggressive Soviet efforts to encourage peace demonstrations in the West and their brutal arrests and exile of peace activists in the East.

We condemn these illegal and inhumane acts. We hold the Soviet Union ac-

Statement by the President's Principal Deputy Press Secretary (Speakes), November 2, 1983 [45]

U.S. Sanctions Against Poland

In the past months, we and our allies have been engaged in extensive dialog on the situation in Poland. Very serious problems still remain. The Polish Government continues to defy the wishes of the majority of the Polish people; a number of political prisoners are still incarcerated and indictments have been brought against certain of these prisoners; free labor unions have not been restored; no genuine economic reforms have been implemented and stringent censorship still exists.

For these reasons, our sanctions presently remain in place. These include the suspension of Polish civil aviation privileges in the United States; the freeze on Export-Import Bank's line of export credit insurance for Poland; the implementation of a "no-exceptions" policy which restricts export licensing of high technology items to Poland; opposition to the extension of any new credits and Poland's entry into the IMF; suspension of Poland's MFN status; curtailment of the shipment of non-humanitarian agricultural commodities for distribution by the Polish Government; suspension of joint travel under the Maria Sklodowska Curie Fund which finances joint scientific research projects; and curtailment of Polish fishing in U.S. waters.

In the hope of inducing the Polish Government to begin pursuing a path of national reconciliation and restore free trade unions, the President has endorsed two limited steps. Specifically, the United States jointly with its allies has agreed to enter into discussions on the Polish debt to official creditors. We seek repayment of U.S. loans to Poland. In this regard, the United States is not extending Poland new credits nor supporting Poland's entry into the IMF. As a bilateral step, we have agreed to permit Polish officials to engage in discussions with private fishing companies about potential fishing arrangements. Our ban on Polish fishing in U.S. waters still remains in place. Moreover, even though discussions have been authorized no actual allocation of fish will be provided at this time. Rather, any future allocation of fish at the end of the discussions will be contingent on the Polish government's actions on human rights.

These steps taken represent a limited response to very modest improvement in the human rights situation in Poland. The United States has taken note of the successful June visit of His Holiness John Paul II to his homeland, and of the release of the majority of political prisoners in Poland. We are waiting for the Polish Government to take definitive action to restore the human rights of the Polish people—rights which belong to them from birth and which are not government's to take away.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Burt) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, March 9, 1983 (Extract) [1]

Request For Security Assistance for Spain

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this committee in support of the European portions of the administration's proposals for security assistance in fiscal year 1984.

As Secretary Shultz emphasized to this committee on February 15, 1983, [2] the general program of security assistance and economic assistance is of great importance to us in our foreign policy. He also emphasized before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on February 16, [3] in support of our foreign assistance programs, that NATO is an alliance that serves the interest of the United States as well as of our allies. I have participated in the development of the integrated foreign assistance program to meet our national economic and security objectives, as well as those of our close allies who share these objectives. I want to emphasize that security assistance is an essential part of both our foreign policy and defense planning, and I would now like to describe our major programs in support of the NATO allies requiring assistance, as well as a program for Cyprus.

Spain has been an important strategic partner since 1953. [4] Now, with its entry into NATO last May and its democracy firmly in place following elections and a peaceful change of government last fall, Spain has become an important democratic ally as well. The basis for our security cooperation has thus broadened, modernization of Spanish military forces to NATO standards has gained new importance, and our security assistance relationship has become more vital than ever.

In this context, the United States and Spain signed a successor agreement to the 1976 Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation [5] on July 2, 1982. [6] The new Spanish Government, after negotiating a supplementary protocol which clarifies the relationship between the agreement and NATO has proceeded with the ratification process, which is expected to be completed in late April or early May. It has, however, "frozen" further military integration into NATO pending an overall review of its security policy. The new agreement provides for United States "best efforts" in security assistance and ensures continued United States use of important Spanish military facilities.

U.S. security assistance is thus an integral part of this important security relationship. It is vital to the credibility of our "best efforts" pledge and to our reliability as an ally, and it is vital to Spanish efforts to bring their force to NATO standards. And, apart from securing U.S. direct military benefits in Spain, U.S. security assistance will serve broader security interests, encourage Spain to see the greater benefits of cooperation in a NATO context, and signal our continuing support for Spain's still young democracy.

The proposed fiscal year 1983 security assistance program for Spain consists of $400 million of foreign military sales financing (FMS), $3 million of international military education and training (IMET), and $12 million of Economic Support Fund (ESF) assistance. The FMS financing request will help Spain to purchase advanced fighter aircraft, an air defense missile system, helicopters, Harpoon missiles, torpedo improvement kits, and ground support weapons (LTV's and tanks).

The fiscal year 1984 IMET will support armed forces modernization by increasing the overall professionalism of the Spanish Armed Forces. It will also provide specific training courses (pilots training missile systems, maintenance, logistics, administration) to help ensure the most efficient use of FMS-supplied resources. The fiscal year 1984 ESF request will fund the educational, cultural, and scientific programs administered by the Department of State and the U.S. Information Agency. These programs enhance the nonmilitary aspects of our relationship with Spain and are important in developing a broad range of ties appropriate for two friends and allies.

Statements by President Reagan and Spanish Prime Minister Gonzalez, June 21, 1983 [7]

U.S.–Spain Discussions of International and Bilateral Issues

THE PRESIDENT. I would like to take this opportunity to underscore our great pleasure at receiving President Gonzalez and express once again our friendship and admiration and support for the government and the people of Spain.

The President and I had an exceptionally productive and cordial meeting today. We reviewed international and bilateral matters in an open, understanding and democratic spirit that one would expect between friends and allies. We affirmed the need for strong leadership to deal with the political and economic and social problems which underlie so much of the unrest in the world today.

We agreed on the importance of maintaining Western strength and solidarity in these critical times and expressed our desire to work closely together as we faced the challenges ahead. We agreed on the desirability of early, positive and balanced conclusion to the CSCE Review Conference presently underway in Madrid.

I expressed our appreciation for President Gonzalez' recent initiative in this regard, which we'll be discussing with our friends and allies.

There are numerous areas of closer cooperation, including the pursuit of our common energy security interests. We value Spain as an important partner. We welcome the President's high sense of responsibility in guiding his country at this critical moment in its history. We applaud Spain's aspirations to join Europe fully and to make its voice heard in Europe's leading institutions.

We believe the West's most fundamental resource is the strength of democratic institutions. The consolidation of democracy in Spain is a ringing affirmation of the vitality of Western institutions and the appeal of Western values.

PRESIDENT GONZALES. Good Afternoon. First of all I want to thank President Reagan for this occasion to hold an open conversation with the U.S.A. which we consider a friendly country, a good friend of Spain.

As you know, Spain is a very old European country who, among other things, discovered this land that nowadays occupies this great country of yours. But it's also a young country, not only because the country people are young, but because we just recovered the dignity of being a democratic country. A simple definition of Spain would characterize what her foreign policy would be. Spain is a European and a Western country—the most Western of the European countries. Nothing then more logical than its wish to, and its [7] Source: White House Press Release, June 21, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, June 27, 1983, pp. 903–904. The remarks were made at 1:36 p.m. on the South Grounds of the White House. Earlier, the two leaders met in the Oval Office and subsequently held a working luncheon with U.S. and Spanish officials. desire, to participate and integrate in the European and the Western world and cooperate with the Western world in a common destiny.

But we are also a Southern country in Europe. We are very close to Africa and our coast is in the Mediterranean Basin. This defines another important aspect of our foreign policy: the North of Africa and the important waters of the Mediterranean Basin. The fact that I cannot communicate with you in English means that there is another dimension in our policy and identity: the fact that we can communicate in our language, in Spanish, with practically 300 million people in the American Continent. This gives a third dimension in the foreign policy of Spain, without meaning that any one of them means a priority against the other.

Let me tell you that I am 41 years old, and during 33 of these years, I was dreaming of a free and democratic Spain. This is, of course, what we want and we hope for our people. But this is also what we want and we hope for other peoples wherever we can project this foreign policy. We, therefore, wish and want for other countries who can communicate with us on a cultural level: peace, freedom, pluralism, and progress.

Because it's America and because it's such an important country in the world, you'll understand perfectly well that we want also to make our links with the United States even closer which explains two things: first of all, my presence here accepting our gracious and very kind invitation of President Reagan, and my satisfaction because of the course of this conversation we have just had.

Thank you, Mr. President. Thank you very much.

Joint Statement Issued by the U.S.–Spanish Council, October 4, 1983 [8]

Review of Progress and Problems Under the 1982 Agreement

The U.S.-Spanish Council, as the body responsible for supervising the implementation of the Agreement on Friendship, Defense and Cooperation between the United States of America and Spain, [9] met on Tuesday, October 4, 1983, in Washington, D.C., under the chairmanship of Secretary of State George Shultz and Foreign Minister Fernando Moran. This is the first meeting of the council to be held by both parties as allies since the entry into force of said agreement.

The two ministers reviewed the work accomplished by the various organs that report to the council, as well as that which had been carried out in accordance with the provisions of the agreement.

In the military field, the accomplishment of various U.S.-Spanish joint military exercises was reported and mention was made of the progress achieved in programs of military cooperation. Special note was taken of the establishment of the new Joint Committee on Defense Industrial Cooperation and of the progress made toward establishing an industrial cooperation program in this area.

Progress was also noted in the reports to the council concerning the development of scientific and technological cooperation, as well as advances realized in the cultural and educational area.

In the economic area the two cochairmen noted negative aspects in commercial, fishing, and technological relations between the two countries and agreed to make new efforts to overcome the problems raised.

The two ministers stated their intention to adopt the necessary measures to increase U.S.-Spanish cooperation in fields foreseen in the agreement and in any

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Policy (Perle) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 16, 1983 (Extract) [1]

Significant Increase in Military Assistance to Turkey

. . . . . .

I can say one concluding word about the Turkish request and I single Turkey out because we have asked for a significant increase this year compared to last year. [2]

I have had occasion to visit Turkey three times now since I have been in the Department of Defense. I have been in the field with Turkish forces. I have visited the Turkish facilities all over that critical country. I can tell you that the requirement for assistance in order to modernize Turkish forces is widespread. One sees it everywhere in Turkey.

It affects all elements of Turkish military power, land, sea, and air. Turkey is facing, to put it simply, block obsolescence in the equipment for their military establishment and therefore the second largest force in our military alliance is lacking.

The situation has reached a critical point and without assistance on the scale that we have proposed, which is, as I said earlier, not sufficient, but it is a gauge, I am afraid that we see Turkey unable to meet its critical NATO missions.

Among the most important of those NATO missions that is worth singling out is closing of the straits because in the event of failure to close the straits in wartime we will see the Soviet Black Sea Fleet enter the Mediterranean and engage U.S. naval forces.

I have yet to talk to a naval commander who is experienced in the Eastern Mediterranean who believes we could survive if we had to face the combined Soviet Fleet in that vital sea.

Obviously Turkey has profound implications for the stability of Southwest Asia. I would like to be very clear about the relationship that we in the Department of Defense see between Turkey as a valuable NATO ally and the stability of Southwest Asia. If one looks at the map, it is clear that the existence of a vacuum in Eastern Turkey, which is the present situation, Mr. Chairman, [3] leaves the Soviets with a great deal of freedom to move their Transcaucus force which consists of 19 divisions and associated air power.

It leaves the Soviets free to move that Transcaucus force south into Southwest Asia if they should choose to do so with virtually no prospect that they would be exposing a vulnerable flank.

[2] The administration requested $934 million in security assistance programs for Turkey in fiscal year 1984 as follows (with comparable actual figures for fiscal year 1983 in parentheses): Foreign Military Sales Financing Program Guaranty—$525 ($290) million; Economic Support Fund—$175 ($285) million, consisting of $100 ($200) million in grants and $75 ($85) million in loans; Military Assistance Program—$230 ($110) million; and International Military Education and Training Program—$4 ($2.772) million. [3] Representative Lee H. Hamilton.

We would not like to see Soviet military commanders with the confidence that that would give them. We would much rather that they have reason to question the wisdom of moving those troops south, the wisdom of exposing themselves on a vulnerable flank, and therefore we believe that a significant deterrent effect is achieved by the strengthening of Turkey in its own territory.

We do not envision Turkey as a way station for American forces enroute to Southwest Asia. It is quite sufficient for us that a strong Turkey will have a profound deterrent effect on the Soviet leaders.

Given the importance of Southwest Asia to the stability of the world economy we think that strengthening Turkey is vital in this regard.

Testimony by the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs (Abrams) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, April 14, 1983 (Extract) [4]

Recognition of Human Rights Progress in Turkey

. . . . . .

[MR. ABRAMS.] In Turkey, terrorism was the biggest source of human rights violations in the years immediately before 1980. This problem has been virtually solved by the Evren government. The problems that need to be solved today are to return to democracy, as the Evren government is now in the process of doing, and to eliminate the restrictions on civil and political liberties that exist under martial law. In addition, Turkey's statesmen and citizens now face the difficult task of reconstituting a democratic order that will endure and protect human rights not only in principle but in practice.

Let me briefly mention four areas where human rights concerns have been expressed with regard to Turkey. The first would be whether the return to democracy under the constitution will be complete. This is a matter I know some of the witnesses who will follow will raise as well. The combination of the election of General Evren as President with the referendum for the constitution itself was confusing in this respect, [5] and I would personally have preferred that it had been done differently, that is, separately. But there can be no doubt, and I have never heard anyone express a doubt, that General Evren would have won an election of the ordinary type by an enormous margin, and the constitution itself strikes me as quite democratic.

It has been criticized in Europe, and some of the witnesses today will criticize it, because it has a strong executive. But the present constitution is a reaction against the constitution of 1961, which resembled that of the French Fourth Republic and led to similar problems. Just as the French came to reject the Fourth Republic, the Turks have rejected the constitution of 1961, and clearly it did not work for them.

The French strengthened their executive in the constitution of the Fifth Republic and our own constitution certainly has been a great model of a strong executive. I would think too much criticism on that point is unjustified.

The second serious area of concern is torture. We take encouragement from the fact that the present government has publicly condemned torture and indicated it will not tolerate such actions by public officials. It is the first Turkish Government to admit there were cases of torture and to punish the people responsible for it.

[4] Source: Human Rights in Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 3–9.

[5] Temporary Article 1 of the Turkish Constitution, which the Turkish electorate approved by referendum on November 7, 1982, provided that the Chairman of the Turkish National Security Council, General Kenan Evren, become President of Turkey for a 7-year term. His term of office began on November 9, 1982, the day the new Constitution came into effect. (Keesing's Contemporary Archives, 1983, vol. XXIX p. 32089A)

In fact, several sentences were handed down in late March punishing officials for engaging in acts of torture. But unfortunately torture has not yet been fully eliminated in Turkey, and this fact mars Turkey's reputation as it does that of any country where this inhumane practice exists. We have urged and continue to urge the Government of Turkey to act again and again until torture is eliminated.

The third area is censorship. In this, as in restrictions on political activity by former politicians, the military government was responding to a sense that there should be a clean break between the previous period of political strife and polarization and the new period which comes ahead. We can understand this but I do not believe it justifies all of the particular cases where journalists have been charged. The present period is, of course, transitional for Turkey, and it is my hope that this limitation on press freedom will similarly be temporary. We will publicly and privately urge the Government of Turkey to restore full press freedom as Turkey returns to democracy, for a free press is indispensable in Turkey as elsewhere if the country is to remain free.

The fourth area is academic freedom. If academic freedom is to exist, universities must be free of political coercion either by partisan groups or by the Government. That condition did not exist before the military intervention in 1980.

In fact, I have noted that the report of the Congressional Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe states this fact as well. In their report they state that "schools and universities virtually ceased to function as they became the focal point of terrorist activities." [6] The universities were politicized, racked by violence and killing to a degree we have never seen in the United States.

Students could attend the classes of professors of one political opinion only at the risk of being beaten up by students who held an opposite political opinion. The Evren government has tried to change this situation by a comprehensive university reform whose goal is to insulate the universities from politics.

If this is successful it will create the necessary conditions for academic freedom. But one of the methods used has been the dismissal of about 40 professors. Such methods of depoliticizing the universities are distasteful to Americans. That they were necessary to achieve a nonpolitical campus in Turkey is the Government of Turkey's claim, and while I am dubious of the claim it is not one I can dismiss or I think we should dismiss, given the record of violence on Turkish campuses. We can all agree that these are extreme measures which no ordinary situation would justify and which must not be permitted to undercut the goal they seek to serve, a nonpolitical campus where true academic freedom can exist.

From what I have said, it is clear there are human rights problems in Turkey to which it is well worth paying attention. Yet it is also clear the human rights problem in turkey is simply not comparable to the problems existing in countries such as El Salvador, Guatemala, and Nicaragua, much less that in countries such as Vietnam, Syria, Afghanistan, or Iran.

Turkey is now returning to full democracy. The issue that faces us with regard to Turkey is not how to change a basically bad situation, but how to support the ongoing progress which will lead, when the transition to democracy is completed, to a society basically good for human rights.

There has in fact, I think, been enormous progress which I believe deserves our recognition and support. It seems to me that the policy of those who have a real concern about human rights in Turkey, whether inside or outside Western governments, ought to have three aspects.

First we must realize that as is true elsewhere in the world, the strongest force to improve human rights practices is democracy. Not all democracies, of course, have perfect human right records, and Turkey's was not perfect under previous democratic governments. But in almost all cases democratic governments have better human rights records than nondemocratic governments. In this area I think we can have a good deal of confidence.

Turkey is returning to democracy, with no question. Unlike many military regimes throughout the world, the military authorities in Turkey have never intended to remain in power. They set a relatively short timetable for full return to democracy, and they are adhering to that timetable. We do not know and cannot know what the future holds for Turkey in many respects, but we do know one important fact. It will be a democracy with all that implies for human rights.

I would like to add, however, that that does not mean that governments and private citizens should in any sense be unwilling to make their human rights concerns known to the Turkish Government. Our security stake in Turkey, of course, is enormous but that should not blind us to human rights problems. Turkey is so important for our security not in spite of but partly because of the fact that it is a Western country, democratic in its tradition, with Western-style human rights practices.

I believe it is not an act of disrespect for Turkey to make human rights concerns known because when we do so we show our belief that Turkey has the same standards we do. This should be a second aspect of an intelligent human rights posture with respect to Turkey.

The third is perhaps the most important. The observance of human rights in Turkey depends on the Turkish Republic's continued allegiance to the tradition of its great founder, Ataturk. It was Ataturk who took the decisive steps in orienting Turkey toward the West. Ever since, this orientation has been the source of the specific human rights safeguards that made Turkey generally like the rest of the West. The commitment is to free elections and an independent judiciary, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion.

Turkey is a country that has committed itself to the West without reservation. This makes Turkey not just another example of a country where we have bases, but an important and precious example. It is important because the Western orientation of Ataturk has been questioned by extremists of the right and left during recent years.

Ataturk had rejected the opportunity to remain a Caliphate and he rejected the example offered by Moscow when the Soviet Union was the only ally of the young Turkish Republic. In recent years the extreme leftists and religious fundamentalists in Turkey wished to reconsider both those choices. If they were reconsidered it would not only be disastrous for Western interests, but also for human rights in Turkey.

In the case of Turkey, circumstances and unwise policy among those outside who care about freedom could put the essential allegiance to the West in doubt. Many decades ago, Turks chose the West, but they have sometimes felt the West rejected their very choice of the West. Such a feeling can only powerfully reinforce the dangers to human rights within Turkey. If, in properly emphasizing human rights concerns, we isolated Turkey from the Western human rights tradition, the result would be a tragedy.

Instead, the United States has sought to protect human rights in Turkey by frequent dialog with the Government of Turkey, by seeking to protect Turkey's place as a valued Western ally and by keeping Turkey closer to the West rather than pushing it further away.

The task of political modernization is complex and even, given the pressures in a country such as Turkey, dangerous, and transition to stable democratic practice is everywhere a great challenge. Turkey is and has for many years been engaged in this task. Its Government is now deeply committed to our shared Western values. We are proud to offer our assistance and encouragement to the Government of Turkey in its efforts.

Mr. Chairman, [7] that concludes my prepared remarks, and Mr. Fairbanks and I would be happy to entertain and try to answer any questions you may have for us.

MR. YATRON. Thank you very much, Secretary Abrams, for your statement. Mr. Secretary, in the March 24 Congressional Record, my good friend, the ranking minority member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Congressman Broomfield of Michigan made a statement regarding the persecution of ethnic minorities and the Greek Orthodox Ecumenical Patriarchate by the Turkish Government.

In this statement, which will be included in the record, Congressman Broomfield asserts that, and I quote, "The Turkish Government's reported disdain for the human rights of its Greek citizens is appalling. That same Government's harassment of the Patriarchate, in an obvious attempt to shut it down, is unacceptable. When my colleagues in this Chamber talk about human rights violations and freedom of religion, let them look east to Turkey, an important ally which is annually receiving millions of dollars in American economic and military aid." [8]

Now, Congressman Broomfield's vast foreign policy experience in this area clearly gives considerable weight to his remarks. I would appreciate it if you would comment on Mr. Broomfield's observations, specifically as to how it pertains to religious persecution and the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Turkey.

MR. ABRAMS. I would essentially disagree with the view as you have indicated Congressman Broomfield gave it. It is contrary to my impression of the situation of minorities in Turkey. I do want to make the point that the view that the situation is better than that is not an idiosyncratic view that only the administration holds.

The Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe [CSCE] [9] did a staff report on Turkey. I think it is worth noting. It is the views of the staff and has not been voted on by the Commission but they looked into this question. Let me read a few lines of what they concluded.

The staff met with representatives of Greek, Turkish, and Armenian minorities in Istanbul, and on the whole had the impression that the rights and interests of these minorities are being respected by the Turkish authorities, and if anything, the situation might have improved slightly since the imposition of martial law. The Greek and Turkish representatives emphasized they felt more secure under martial law than they had before. [10]

The Greek representative stressed that the Greek community in Istanbul and the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate, contrary to the allegations made in the World Council of Churches' recent report of June 1982 had no concrete problems and—there is a lengthier section but my impression is there has been, in fact, a protection of the minorities in Turkey. I have spoken with some members of minorities who have said just that in private meetings where I think they would have spoken honestly to me.

I think one should say this, there has long been ethnic tension in Turkey as there has been in Greece and obviously Cyprus, and it would be a mistake to give the impression that there was not a significant amount of tension at times between the communities. But as to the question of whether the current regime, the martial law regime of General Evren has a notedly bad record on this, I would have to disagree on that point.

Is there anything you would like to add, Mr. Fairbanks?

MR. FAIRBANKS. No.

MR. YATRON. Mr. Secretary, would you comment on the Ecumenical Patriarchate? Are you aware that in the same statement Mr. Broomfield made, he said, "The present conditions under which the Patriarch exercises his duties and responsibilities are hard to envision. Here are a few reported examples. The Turks have suspended Patriarchal periodicals. The theological school has been closed." I will not read them all. There are many examples.

Are you aware of the fact that repairs and even painting or repairing bathrooms require a permit which the Turkish Government has not given them permission to make?

MR. ABRAMS. I was not aware of that particular claim. There has been some, what I would call petty harassment, on things like that. It was my impression that those questions were being worked out.

This is a recent statement by Congressman Broomfield, is that correct?

MR. YATRON. This appeared March 24, 1983.

MR. ABRAMS. That would indicate those have not been worked out if that is current information, but I was not aware those continued to be problems.

[Mr. Abrams subsequently submitted the following information:] [11]

"Our Consulate General has reported that the Greek community newspaper is freely published and circulated in Istanbul—a fact which suggests that charges regarding 'difficulties in publishing periodicals' is erroneous. The problem of 'getting repairs made to church property' is among those matters which Greek Orthodox Church officials in Istanbul themselves have characterized as irritating bureaucratic problems, not 'official harassment.' In light of the close contacts our Consulate General officers maintain with the Patriarchate in Istanbul, we feel certain that, if the Greek Orthodox Church in Turkey were experiencing harassment by the Government of Turkey, church officials here would not hesitate to report it to us."

MR. YATRON. There are others, but it is in the record. In my view, I feel this is a set policy of continual religious persecution and harassment.

When you first appeared before our subcommittee under my chairmanship, you agreed there was certainly a connection between Project Democracy and human rights. Now, in principle I believe Project Democracy is a very refreshing initiative, but I have some reservations about its application.

How would Project Democracy apply to a country like Turkey which has not had stable democratic rule?

MR. ABRAMS. I think that is a very good point, Mr. Chairman. There are some countries which have had no experience with democracy at all where it is difficult to know how one would even go about addressing the issue.

There are, however, a large number of countries such as Greece and Turkey which we address today which have had both democratic periods and nondemocratic periods and which have significant democratic institutions.

One of the things it would be trying to do is strengthen those institutions. For example, in the case of the legal system we would certainly want to try to help maintain the independence of the judiciary, perhaps by exchange programs, sending, in the case of Turkey, Turkish judges to the United States, American judges to Turkey to try to inculcate a strong sense of the independence of the judiciary.

Similarly, with the press, we would want members of the Turkish press to come here and take a look at the way the American press operates freely. In the case of the legislature, I think this is also important that we have, I would argue, the most powerful independent legislature in the world, and it would certainly do a lot of good if Turkish legislators were able to come here and see the committee system operate, the way in which members of the executive branch for better or worse are hauled up before congressional committees.

These are the kind of programs I think could be very helpful because you do have a good deal to work within the dozens of countries that have significant democratic institutions that are trying to obtain a stable and lasting democracy.

Transcript of a Department of State Press Conference, Ankara, April 25, 1983 (Extracts) [12]

"Turkey Is a Very Good and Loyal Ally"

ASSISTANT SECRETARY BURT. Let me begin by telling you why I thought it would be useful for me to say something on-the-record. In Washington, of course, our Embassies report back to us what is happening in various countries and normally we get reports of what the press is writing. I think that some of the reports, not all of them of course, have not really reflected the real state of affairs in Washington, especially on the question of the Reagan administration's commitment to securing a substantial increase for Turkey in security assistance. I know, there have been stories suggesting that the administration has somehow shifted its position on the 7 to 10 ratio. There have been other stories that have suggested that the administration has not been fully committed to seeking a full increase, that is the 755 million dollars within the fiscal year 1984 budget. There were even suggestions, I think, that there were officials absent at important congressional hearings where a good case could have been made for these increases. What I want to tell you here and now is that this administration is fully committed to making the best possible argument with the U.S. Congress for securing the full fiscal year 1984 security assistance request that we came forward with. I also want to remind you that the increase sought in security assistance for fiscal year 1984 for Turkey is the single largest increase of any country in the world, and I think that this is a fair reflection of this administration's priorities and commitments to helping the Turkish Government strengthen it's own strategic position in this part of the world. Frankly, I don't think that descriptions and articles have accurately described the time and trouble the American officials have taken to fulfill commitments we have made to the Turkish Government. I think that the Turkish Government understands that and I think that the Turkish people need to also understand that. I will be happy to answer your questions.

Q. There is a general idea that the administration has used Turkey for blackmailing Greece. How are you going to convince us that this is wrong?

A. I think a charge like that is totally preposterous. We don't use Turkey to blackmail Greece and we don't use Greece to blackmail Turkey. The security assistance requested for fiscal year 1984 did not come out of thin air. It reflects consultations that we have had underway with the Turkish Government for over 2 years. It reflects a careful planning process and it reflects the fact that we believe that the United States and Turkey share very important mutual interests and we are making the case for a substantial increase in aid for Turkey on the merits of the case, the need the Turkish military has on Turkey['s] geopolitical position, and the fact that we and the Turkish Government are working together to enhance the prospects for peace and stability in this part of the world. That's the real explanation, it's a complex explanation. It's not the easy explanation. It's been very easy to make these arguments, but it's not the truth.

Q. Which were the truths that the Reagan administration has used to lobby at the Congress for Turkey?

A. There is not one shred of truth in that charge. The story is based on a subcommittee hearing which had been called to discuss aid requests for Middle Eastern countries. There had already been a discussion for aid for Turkey. There had been an understanding between the chairman of that subcommittee and the U.S. State Department that the Turkish aid requested was not going to come up and was not going to be a subject. And, when Congressman Solarz raised the question of Turkish aid that was without the understanding of the subcommittee chairman, and without the understanding of the State Department. You can be sure that every time that we are aware that Turkish aid is going to be discussed in Congress we will have people there who can defend that request. Now, I have a number of responsibilities in my own personal job; I am responsible for the NATO alliance. I have to deal with Eastern Europe. I am responsible for relations with the Soviet Union. But, I have spent several hours every day personally, and with trips to Capitol Hill meeting with Senators and Congressmen. My colleagues in the Defense Department have also done the same and we have a team of people in the Reagan administration from several agencies who are working every day with a legislative plan to secure our fiscal year 1984 request.

Q. Do you mean to say that when this supplemental aid of 110 million dollars to Turkey was brought up it was not done by the committee chairman but it was done by Mr. Solarz?

A. It was done by Mr. Solarz and there was no prior warning whatsoever that he was going to raise it. It caught us totally by surprise. [13]

. . . . . .

[13] On April 19, 1983, the House Foreign Affairs Committee struck down the administration's request for the grant of $55 million in the Economic Support Fund and $65 million in the Foreign Military Sales program of loan guaranties for Turkey in the supplemental foreign assistance authorization bill for fiscal year 1983, because the administration did not make its case for an urgent supplemental with regard to these

Q. Can we get your opinion about the 7 to 10 ratio?

A. It's very simple. Our position has not changed. We don't accept or endorse the concept of 7 to 10 ratio. We don't accept or endorse any artificial ratios for making a security assistance decision. We think those decisions should be made on their own merits.

Q. But, the administration's request to increase the aid, the military aid to greece, is fitting the 7 to 10 ratio. How do you explain that?

A. I don't think in fact it is.

Q. Why not?

A. It really does not fit the 7 to 10 ratio.

Q. It's 500 million dollars this one and the other one is 715 million dollars. . . .[14]

A. Our request is 755 million, and in our request for Greece is 280 million. We will be prepared to add an additional amount for Greece up to 500 million dollars. If and when we succeed in achieving a successful base agreement. Our desire is not to base a security assistance request for Turkey on what Greece achieves or vice versa. Our desire is to accomplish a substantial increase this year in security assistance for Turkey, that is our primary goal.

Q. Do you believe that the Cyprus issue can be solved by intercommunal talks? What will be your stand in the United Nations?

A. We hope the intercommunal talks will result in progress on Cyprus. We see the intercommunal process as the best framework for making progress on the Cyprus problem. I can't anticipate what the U.S. position will be at the United Nations, because it's too early to speculate. But we believe and support the process of the intercommunal talks. In other words, we are opposed to "internationalizing" the Cyprus problem.

Q. How do you answer the congressional subcommittee's attitude? They are trying to link aid to Turkey to the solution of the Cyprus problem, and withdrawal of the Turkish troops from the island.[15]

A. We are opposed to any such linkage. That's our position.

Q. As the administration. . . .[16]

A. As an administration. I can only represent the administration. I would never take on my part to speak for the Congress. There are few people that brave.

. . . . . .

Q. There is a debate on buying some airplanes from the United States and it costs nearly 5 billion dollars and so Turkey expects some credit facilities from the United States. What is your point of view about this?

A. Our desire is to assist if we can in modernizing the Turkish Air Force. We hope we can assist. We think it's a legitimate requirement.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Assistant Secretary, according to some calculations, American, and I think official, Turkish Armed Forces need 18 billion dollars over 13 years to upgrade the material capability of the Turkish Armed Forces to minimum NATO standards?

A. Are you asking me if that is correct? I haven't seen those statistics. I think that the Turkish military does have very significant requirements, and I think it will be a very expensive program to meet those refunds, according to Representatives Lee H. Hamilton and Stephen J. Solarz. See Foreign Assistance Legislation for Fiscal Years 1984–85. Markup Before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), Part 9, pp. 54–59.

quirements and the United States wants to assist to the best of its ability.

Q. Under these circumstances congressional and other, what is your estimate? I mean, will that money be able to be raised?

A. As I have said before, we are confident that we can achieve a substantial increase for Turkey, and we hope to achieve it.

Q. What are the chances of the clause, if it sticks to the aid which ties the aid to withdrawal of foreign troops from Cyprus? What are the chances of this clause turning into a new embargo?

A. I am not going to speculate on what the Congress might do, but I can tell you that the Reagan administration will firmly, I want to underline "firmly", resist any move of that sort.

Q. May I ask why you are opposed to a 7 to 10 ratio?

A. Well, for any number of reasons. For one thing, it's a ratio on security assistance, not of what is spent by the two countries for security. As you know, Greece is in a better position to purchase military equipment commercially than Turkey is. But, more importantly, what we base our decisions on are the requirements and the responsibilities as signed within the alliance. No two countries have the same requirements and responsibilities and those requirements and responsibilities change over time in view of the threat and any kind of artificial ratio, whatever that ratio is, is not a logical way to decide what the security assistance needs of any one country are. We are opposed to artificial ratios in principle, not simply between Greece and Turkey, but, around the world, because we do not believe that, particularly in a time when the United States itself faces serious budgetary pressures, it makes sense to base decisions on a ratio. [17]

Q. What are you planning to do to break down this ratio if the administration is so much against this ratio?

A. What we are planning to do is to work as vigorously as we possibly can to achieve the request that we have sent to the Hill for Turkey, and also to work and hopefully achieve a successful agreement with Athens. We are carrying out that program independently. There is no relationship between the two and there shouldn't be.

Q. But, the extra aid for Greece is completely conditional on a successful bases agreement. . . . [18]

A. That's exactly right.

Q. What is the administration's notion on a balance of power in the Aegean between Turkey and Greece?

A. I think the best way to answer that is that for me it is strange to discuss the concept of a balance of power between Greece and Turkey, because they are both members of the same alliance. So, it is an artificial concept. What is important is to think about the balance of power between NATO and the Warsaw Pact. That's where the alliance faces a threat and we forget that there has been a systematic, unprovoked military buildup by the Soviet Union that threatens every country in the alliance. One of the most formidable aspects of that military buildup are SS-20 missiles which can strike Turkey in 15 minutes deployed east of the Urals. This is a serious threat, and only the alliance working together can solve it. We hope to solve it through a successful arms control negotiation in Geneva, but if we don't solve it, we will begin deployment at the end of the year of U.S. missiles. So that Western security can be protected against this unprovoked military buildup.

[17] Burt's remarks on the administration's opposition to the 7 to 10 ratio of U.S. defense assistance to Greece and Turkey reportedly led the Greek Government to downgrade and consequently Burt to cancel his planned 2-day visit to Athens scheduled to begin on April 25, 1983. (The Times (London), April 26, 1983, p. 6) At the Department of State Daily Press Briefing on April 26, 1983, Department of State Acting Spokesman Alan D. Romberg said that since Burt's "statements in no way departed from well-known U.S. positions, the reason for that [Greek] action is not really clear to us." (Transcript of the Department of State Daily Press Briefing, April 26, 1983, Office of Press Relations, Department of State)

Q. What is the ratio of Turkey drawing more danger because of making available to the United States the ten airfields to be modernized in Turkey, especially the ones in eastern Anatolia?

BURT. I question the basic assumption of your question that somehow U.S.-Turkish defense cooperation increases danger to Turkey. I think U.S.-Turkish security cooperation lessens the danger. I think that is why Turkey is a member of the NATO alliance. There is more security and cooperation than by a country standing alone. So, I reject the premise. We don't ask for security assistance for Turkey to achieve our demands. We see security benefits in a strong, stable, secure Turkey in and of itself. It's not for us to define Turkey's security role. That's up to Turkey. That's up to the Turkish Government and its leadership.

Q. Of the negotiations between The United States and Greece, Papandreou asked [for] a guarantee from the United States against Turkey. But, after he understood that he wouldn't be able to get a guarantee as a letter or anything he said, strengthening Greece in military ways would be a guarantee for Greece against Turkey. So, the administration has strengthened Greece. Does it mean a guarantee to Greece?

BURT. Of course, it does not. We do not guarantee one ally against another. A very simple position. Allies do not need guarantees.

Q. If this 7 to 10 ratio holds, let us assume Turkey decides that it will limit her responsibilities in the common defense and its contribution to the common defense with the same ratio. Would it be a very big surprise in Washington?

BURT. Well, again, you are asking me a hypothetical question. I think we would regret any such decision by Turkey, but that decision is Turkey's to make.

Q. Did you have a feeling that might happen while speaking with Turkish officials?

BURT. Absolutely not. No one made any such suggestion. I found full Turkish support for fulfilling Turkey's role in the alliance completely.

Q. How was the general feeling of the. . . .[19]

BURT. Let me say something. Turkey is a very good and loyal ally. Make no mistake about it. A very good and loyal ally. And it always has been a good and loyal ally; we understand that.

. . . . . .

Q. I think, the Carter administration also tried that [effort to improve relations with Turkey] very hard. They lifted the embargo finally.[20] But, they waited for troop withdrawals from Cyprus and it was done intermittently until somehow, somewhere they had to stop. So, now when there are new suggestions coming from the Congress, you must understand the Turkish sensibilities over that.

BURT. We do understand. That's one reason why I am here. This is one reason why we work so hard, and I spend so much time and other members of the administration spend so much time. We are actually trying to strengthen that relationship and to work on the Congress, and to make the best possible arguments which can be made. Why, it's in the U.S. interest to have a healthy robust relationship with Turkey. You don't have to convince me of that.

Q. Does the United States have any scheme or whatever to bring Turkey and Greece together?

BURT. I think it would be presumptuous of the United States to suggest that they can solve a very complex, complicated problem. We want to see a better relationship emerge. But, that is really in the final analysis up to the Governments of Ankara and Athens.

Q. Does the administration plan to propose a proposal for Cyprus?

[20] The embargo on U.S. supply of defense articles to Turkey which was imposed on February 5, 1975, was partially lifted on June 30, 1976, and completely lifted on September 26, 1978; see Committee on Foreign Affairs and Committee on Foreign Relations, Legislation on Foreign Relations Through 1983, Joint Committee Print (Washington, 1984), vol. BURT. There is no American initiative waiting in the wings. We think, I think I told your colleague to your right, that the intercommunal framework should be given a chance. We hope that the talks continue and that some progress will be made.

Statement by President Reagan, Rancho del Cielo, California, May 7, 1983 [21]

Support For Parliamentary Elections in Turkey

When the military took power in Turkey under conditions of near anarchy in 1980, they committed themselves to restoring democratic government as soon as possible. The United States welcomed the timetable they set for carrying out that promise, and we have expressed our support for each step along the way. I warmly welcome President Evren's recent announcement that parliamentary elections will be held on November 6, [22] thus completing the process of restoring democracy. I congratulate the Turkish people for this remarkable achievement and assure them of the continued support and friendship of the U.S. Government and people.

Opposition To Making Foreign Aid Contingent Upon Removal of Troops From Cyprus

. . . . . .

Q. Alan, do you have any comment on the House Foreign Affairs Committee vote on military aid to Turkey tied to the Cyprus question?

. . . . . .

A. The administration is strongly opposed to the House Foreign Affairs Committee vote to embargo assistance to either Turkey or Greece in FY–1987 if either country has more troops in Cyprus than allowed by the 1959 treaty. [24] Security assistance funding is provided to help these allies meet their NATO commitments and should not be used as leverage in other situations. We understand that the committee voted this morning for a revised amendment that would permit continued security assistance to Turkey for NATO-related purposes.[25] We find this a helpful development.

[23] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. Alan Romberg, Department of State Acting Spokesman, conducted the briefing which began at 12:18 p.m.

[24] Article I of Protocol No. 1 to the 1959 Treaty of Alliance, signed by representatives of Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey at Nicosia, August 16, 1960, allowed for 950 Greek and 650 Turkish troops at Tripartite Headquarters in Cyprus. (397 UNTS 291) The amendment offered by Representative Gus Yatron to the foreign assistance authorization bill, and agreed to by a vote of 14 to 13 of the House Foreign Affairs Committee on May 10, 1983, stated that after fiscal year 1986 no military assistance would be provided to Greece or Turkey if the military forces of that country exceeded those permitted by the 1959 Treaty of Alliance; for text of the amendment, see Foreign Assistance Legislation for Fiscal Years 1984–85: Markup Before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), Part 9, p. 242.

We also oppose the $715 million limit that the committee approved on a subcommittee's recommendation.[26] We had requested $525 million in guaranteed loan financing and $230 million of grant military funds for Turkey for FY 1984, a total of $755 million, and hope to see the original level restored.[27]

We note that both actions were taken in a very close—14 to 13—vote.

Terrorist Attacks Against Turkish Diplomats and Others

Yesterday's attack in Lisbon on the residence of the Turkish Ambassador to Portugal was only the latest in a series of brutal and increasingly indiscriminate terrorist attacks against Turkish diplomats and other innocent civilians. In yesterday's attack, for which the Revolutionary Armenian Army claims responsibility, the wife of a senior Turkish diplomat was killed and a young child was seriously wounded. Only 2 weeks earlier, a Turkish diplomat was murdered outside his home in Brussels, and one day later seven other individuals were killed as they waited to board a Turkish airliner in Paris. No real or imagined grievance could possibly justify these modern day horrors.

On behalf of the people and Government of the United States, I extend the deepest sympathy to the Turkish Government and to the families of the victims of this attack. But more than sympathy is required. This senseless violence must cease. To that end, I will be speaking to other heads of state in the days ahead regarding urgent and more effective cooperative measures to eliminate from the civilized community such barbaric and inhuman acts.

[25] The amendment offered by Representative Lee H. Hamilton to the foreign assistance bill, and agreed to by voice vote of the House Foreign Affairs Committee on May 11, 1983, stated that after fiscal year 1986 no military assistance, other than to enable Greece or Turkey to carry out their NATO obligations, would be provided to Greece or Turkey if the military forces of that country on Cyprus exceeded those permitted by the 1959 Treaty of Alliance; for the text of the Hamilton amendment, see ibid., pp. 297–298. The Hamilton amendment was included in H.R. 2992, 98th Congress, introduced by Representative Clement J. Zablocki, and reported favorably by the House Foreign Affairs Committee by a vote of 38 to 7 on May 12, 1983; for text of H.R. 2992, see ibid., pp. 505–611. For the text of the House Foreign Affairs Committee's report on H.R. 2992, see H. Rept. 98–192, May 17, 1983. No further action was taken on this legislation.

[26] The $715 million recommended by the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East and by the House Foreign Affairs Committee in military assistance for Turkey for fiscal year 1984 consisted of $230 million in grant military aid and $485 million in foreign military sales loan guarantees; see ibid., pp. 17 and 26.

[27] P.L. 98–151, approved November 14, 1983, further continuing appropriations for fiscal year 1984, left it up to the administration to make country allocations, excepting Egypt, Israel, and El Salvador, in Foreign Military Sales Credits and the Military Assistance Program up to the budget request level. (97 Stat. 966) Since the overall amount appropriated for these two programs was below the budget request, not every country would be able to receive the full amount requested; see H. Rept. 98–540, November 12, 1983, p. 15. The managers of the committee of conference on this legislation directed that "the traditional seven to ten ratio be adhered to in regard to military assistance programs for Greece and Turkey." (Ibid., p. 16) The administration's estimated allocations corresponded with the House Foreign Affairs Committee's recommendations mentioned above. Report by the Department of State, February 1984 (Extract) [31]

Country Report on Human Rights Practices in Turkey for 1983

In December 1983, a new civilian parliamentary government took office in Turkey. Before then, Turkey was ruled by the military government which took power at the time of the coup on September 12, 1980, ending a period of violence from both the extreme right and extreme left. Turkey is still under martial law, which at the time of the military takeover was extended to the entire nation.

During the course of 1983, a number of significant developments affected the human rights situation in Turkey. Among the most important were the advent of a civilian parliamentary government and the partial restoration of freedom of political expression. Ultimate power during most of 1983 had been held by the five-member National Security Council, composed of the Chief of the Turkish General Staff and the heads of the armed services.[32] The government was administered by a Prime Minister (a retired Admiral)[33] and a civilian Council of Ministers. In October 1981, the Council, under Head of State General Evren, established a civilian Consultative Assembly, whose function was to draft a new Constitution for the nation and to serve as a legislative body. In a national referendum in November 1982, 91 percent of the voters approved the Constitution and endorsed General Evren as President of the Republic for a 7-year term. He was the only candidate.

The Consultative Assembly, prior to going into permanent recess on October 15, 1983, drafted a new political parties law, a new elections law, new labor laws, and a new associations law. All of these were subject to review and revision by the National Security Council before they came into effect.

On December 9 [6], 1983, the military government stepped down after the November elections gave Turgut Özal's Motherland Party, which was not endorsed by the military government, a parliamentary majority. Özal's cabinet is made up entirely of civilian members of his party.

[30] Turgut Özal's Motherland Party won a majority of seats in the elections for the Turkish Grand National Assembly on November 6, 1983. President Evren asked Özal to form a government on December 7, and it took office on December 13, 1983.

For full text of the country report on Turkey, see ibid., pp. 1106–1122.

[32] The Turkish National Security Council consisted of President and National Security Council Chairman Kenan Evren and members, Chief of the General Staff General Nurettin Ersin, Air Force Commander General Tahsin Sahinkaya, Naval Forces Commander Admiral Nejat Tumer, and Gendarmerie Commander General Sedat Celasun.

Under the military government, abuses of human rights due to terrorist activity, and political and religious violence were substantially reduced. While nearly 33,000 acts of political and religious violence occurred between December 1978 and the September 1980 military takeover, in the three years since that time fewer than 7,500 violent acts have occurred, and the number has continued to drop substantially each year. The martial law authorities had—and still have under martial law which will remain in effect for at least the next few months—the right to censor the media, to limit political expression, including the right to assemble, and to restrict trade union activities. They also have the power to search and arrest without warrants and to try suspects in martial law courts.

The Council, in keeping with its timetable for ending of military rule which was announced two years ago, permitted the reestablishment of political parties and the holding of the election which brought into being both a new parliament and a new civilian government. The Turkish military and the political parties contesting the elections have commented that the transition to full democracy is not yet complete.

The range of political alternatives represented in the parties allowed to contest the elections was severely limited under rules which generally applied only to the 1983 election. Using its power to veto party founders and candidates, the military government limited the parties eligible to participate in the election to three. Several major parties were prevented from meeting the requirements for participation in the parliamentary elections, although they subsequently were qualified and will participate in the upcoming local elections.

As part of the process of legalizing parties and holding an election campaign, limits on freedom of political expression were relaxed in the spring of 1983. Although well-defined limits remain on what may or may not be discussed, politicians and the press have had considerably more leeway to discuss political issues and personalities than in the previous two and one half years of military rule. Those who overstepped the limits, however, continued to face arrest, and newspapers faced the threat of being shut down.

The Government of Turkey has acknowledged that there have been cases of torture of those arrested under martial law. Complaints of torture continued to be filed by prisoners in 1983. In 1983 a number of security officials were investigated, brought to trial, convicted and given stiff sentences for torturing prisoners. Since 1980 there has apparently been a decline in the number of complaints of torture and an increase in the number of convictions, although the available data are not sufficiently detailed to determine their precise significance.

Turkish military forces continue to be present in Northern Cyprus as a result of the 1974 Turkish military intervention there. Their role in the human rights situation there is addressed in the report relating to Cyprus. [34]

Remarks by President Reagan and Queen Elizabeth II, San Francisco, March 3, 1983 [1]

U.S.–U.K. Friendship, Freedom, and Unity

THE PRESIDENT. Your Majesty, Your Royal Highness, ladies and gentlemen. Your Majesty, I welcome you this evening on behalf of the American people, and in particular, on behalf of the people of my home State of California. (Applause) We're honored by your presence in our country and in this State.

The remarks were made during an exchange of toasts at the De Young Museum at 10:36 p.m. Queen Elizabeth II and Prince Philip, Duke of Edinburgh, were in the United States (California and Washington) on an official visit from February 26 to March 7, 1983.

It's fitting that this evening's banquet should be held in this place and in this city. The De Young Museum is one of America's great cultural landmarks. And thanks to Her Majesty's graciousness, we will soon have Leonardo da Vinci's horse drawings, some 50 of them, from the Royal Library of Windsor Castle that will be touring the United States. (Applause) From November 1985 through February of 1986 they will be on view in the California Palace of the Legion of Honor. And the tour was organized by the Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco, the National Gallery of Art of Washington, and the Art Institute of Chicago.

That particular tour and this cultural landmark that we're in tonight reflect the diversity of our people who have built a unique nation from many cultures on the firm foundations of democracy and law which, in large measure, we inherited from Britain. It represents a dedication we share with our British cousins: The peaceful furtherance of art and science for the enrichment and progress of all mankind.

It's also appropriate to recall that, in a special way, San Francisco, which has become home to so many different people, represents the culmination of our nations' great wartime alliance. Of course, the local links to great Great Britain go back much further. One of the first titled tourists to visit this area, Sir Francis Drake, arrived long before the city did. Not only was there no room at the inn, there was no inn. (Laughter) But its greatest hours came centuries later. In August of 1941, President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill set down in the Atlantic Charter their hope "to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want."

And almost 4 years later in this city, America, Britain and 44 other nations formed the United Nations Organization as a means of putting those great principles of the Atlantic Charter into practice.

Unhappily, subsequent events have continued to put our values and our ideals to the test. We have seen continued war, terrorism, and human oppression in too many quarters of the globe. We are challenged to restrain and reduce the destructive power of nuclear weapons. Yet, we must maintain our strength in the face of the enormous military buildup of our adversaries. And, nationally and internationally, we face the challenge of restimulating economic growth and development without rekindling inflation.

All this, we can do. We will find the strength to meet these dangers and face these challenges because it beats within the hearts of free societies and free men. We need only look about us for inspiration. This beautiful city and this great State testify to the power and the vision of free men inspired by the ideals and dedication to liberty of John Locke, Thomas Jefferson, John Stuart Mill, and Abraham Lincoln.

In the words of a great American and warm friend of Britain, Franklin Roosevelt: "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today. Let us move forward with strong and active faith."

And ladies and gentlemen, happily and conscious of the honor that is ours tonight, I ask you to join me in a toast to Her Majesty the Queen.

To the Queen.

(A toast is offered; applause)

THE QUEEN. Mr. President, thank you for the very kind things you have said tonight. It is only 9 months since we had the great pleasure of having you and Mrs. Reagan stay with us at Windsor. Now, we have had the memorable experience of visiting you in your home State of California and of seeing your ranch at Santa Barbara. I knew before we came that we have exported many of our traditions to the United States. But I had not realized before that weather was one of them. (Laughter, applause) But, Mr. President, if the climate has been cool, your welcome and that of the American people have been wonderfully warm. We are very grateful for your charming hospitality and for the generous reception we have had everywhere since our arrival in California last week.

The past few days have been a vivid and sometimes poignant reminder of the human drama and achievement which account for the greatness of America today. We have seen some magnificent technological achievements: the space shuttle which has begun to turn the adventure of space exploration into the equally adventurous but more tangible reality of scheduled space travel; Silicon Valley which has brought the world of yesterday's science fiction into today's home, office and classroom, and into Buckingham Palace, too. (Laughter)

This image of the United States at the forefront of technological invention is one of which you are rightly proud as we are proud of our continued inventiveness in an era of pressing competition. But the miracle of the space shuttle or of the silicon chip lies not in the wizardry of electronics, but in the genius and shared dedicated determination of men and women. That is what speaks loudest in California.

I think of the families who struggled against impossible odds leaving their dead in places whose names still bear witness to their desperation to make their way to the West Coast. In today's prosperity, their fortitude is often overlooked. But it is their character and courage which have permeated each succeeding generation.

I have seen that courage at work for myself this week as many Californian families have coped with the hardship brought by the storms and tornado which have hit this State so hard.

Prince Philip and I made a memorable visit to your country in 1976 to share with so many Americans in celebration of your bicentenary. Nineteen eighty-three marks another bicentenary—the signing of the Treaty of Paris, formally bringing the War of Independence to an end.

Two years before that, British troops had marched to surrender at Yorktown to the tune of "The World Turned Upside Down." So it must have seemed to men at that time. But what would our world, 200 years later, be like if theirs had not been turned upside down?

Since then, the hand of friendship has reached out from your shores and ours at critical periods in our history to ensure not just our own survival but the survival of freedom itself.

In 1939, my father was the first reigning British sovereign to visit America and he and President Roosevelt talked long and earnestly about the coming crisis. At the end of their visit, Mrs. Roosevelt wrote that "in time of danger," as she put it, "something deeper comes to the surface and the British and we stand firmly together with confidence in our common heritage and ideas."

By far the most important idea which we share is our belief in freedom, as you made clear in your speech at Westminster last year. [2] It is an idea whose power is such that some men will go to a great length to suppress it as others will to keep it alive, as our two countries have fought to keep it alive.

We are deeply grateful for the unstinting contribution of the United States to the maintenance of the Western alliance. For our part, no one who knows the British and their history could have any doubt about our steadfastness as an ally or our willingness to stand up in defense of the values which we all hold dear.

I say that not to strike a solemn note but to state a simple truth. We have had a visit which has been spectacular and has fulfilled a longstanding ambition on my part to visit California on the West Coast. What better time than when the President is a Californian. (Laughter)

We have enjoyed ourselves and greatly appreciate the warmth of your hospitality. What will remain afterwards is more significant, the cementing of a relationship. From time to time, friendships must be publicly reaffirmed. My visit has given me the opportunity to reaffirm the ideals which we share and the affection that exists between our peoples without which the formalities of alliance would be meaningless but from the certainty of which our two countries continue to draw strength.

Mr. President, I raise my glass to you and to Mrs. Reagan, to the friendship between our two countries, to the people of California and to the people of the United States.

(Toasts were exchanged; applause)

Statement by President Reagan, March 17, 1983 [3]

"We Cannot Remain Indifferent to the Tragedy That Confronts the People of Northern Ireland"

For those of us whose ancestors come from Ireland and for those of us who share the spirit of Irish humor, hard work, and spiritual faith, St. Patrick's Day is a time of grateful celebration and much happiness.

Today is a time to honor and celebrate the enormous contribution to American life made by Irish immigrants. As frontiersmen in the American colonies and citizen soldiers in Washington's army, they helped found our Republic. Their ingenuity and effort built our economy, added to our spiritual values, and enriched our literature. Their humor enriches life's happy moments and makes life's setbacks more bearable.

And yet our joy is tempered by the tragedy that divides neighbor from neighbor in Northern Ireland. We deeply regret that some would use this day to enlist support for more violence and conflict on that small island which is so much in our hearts today. We cannot remain indifferent to the tragedy that confronts the people of Northern Ireland and which affects the Republic of Ireland, Britain, and their friends in the United States. Those who advocate or engage in violence and terrorism should find no welcome in the United States.

We condemn all such acts and oppose the forces of discord in Northern Ireland, which obstruct the process of reconciliation so essential for peace. We ask all Americans to refrain from supporting, with financial or other aid, organizations involved directly or indirectly in perpetuating violence. And we urge that those Americans—and there are many—who wish to help, lend their support and contributions to legitimate groups and organizations which work to promote reconciliation and economic cooperation.

The United States Government continues to take specific actions to hasten an end to this violence and discord by:

—discouraging Americans from contributing to organizations engaged in violence;

—arresting and prosecuting those engaged in the illegal export of arms to those groups;

—confiscating weapons intended for terrorists.

Next to peace and reconciliation, Northern Ireland's greatest need is for jobs to bring hope and opportunity to all its people, especially the young. American companies which have invested in Northern Ireland already employ a significant percentage of its industrial work force, making a real contribution to its well-being. This administration will continue to encourage private investment in and the creation of more job opportunities in both Northern Ireland and the Republic.

We recognize that it is not for the United States to chart a course for the people of Northern Ireland, but we do have an obligation to urge our long-time friends in that part of the world to seek reconciliation between the two traditions in Northern Ireland and accommodation through democratic means. Durable, equitable solutions and peace cannot be imposed by outsiders, however well-meaning. Our role, accordingly, is to support efforts by the people and governments directly involved.

So, on St. Patrick's Day 1983, let us all celebrate our Irish heritage in fine style. But let us also remember those in Northern Ireland for which 1983 is one more year of terrorism and dim economic prospects—and let us rededicate ourselves to helping to bring these twin evils to an end.

Statements by President Reagan and British Prime Minister Thatcher, September 29, 1983 [4]

U.S.–U.K. Relations

THE PRESIDENT. I have had the pleasure of cordial and productive discussions with Prime Minister Thatcher on a wide range of mutual interests and concerns. Our conversations reflected the superb relations that exist between our two countries, and our determination to broaden our cooperation and consultation.

We reaffirm today our resolve to maintain a strong Western defense to protect freedom and maintain peace. We'll carry out our commitments to the alliance, moving forward in the modernization of NATO's conventional and nuclear deterrent. At the same time, I have pledged America's best efforts to reach acceptable agreements on arms reduction with the Soviet Union.

The Prime Minister informed me of what her Government is doing to prepare for the scheduled deployment of cruise missiles should we fail to reach an agreement with the Soviets. I expressed the thanks of the American people to the Prime Minister for Britain's strong unequivocal support on this vital issue.

We also discussed development in the Middle East, especially the situation in Lebanon, where both our countries are participating in a peacekeeping force. We agree that the solution to that tragic conflict can only come from the Lebanese themselves, free from all foreign interference. I have reviewed with the Prime Minister U.S. efforts to engage all Lebanese factions in a constructive dialogue toward the goal of withdrawing all foreign forces from their country and reestablishing the rule of peace and law.

Prime Minister Thatcher and I also discussed developments in this hemisphere. I explained our energetic efforts to end the violence that plagues Central America and to promote democracy and economic development in that region.

In our discussion of economic matters, we reaffirmed the course set out at the Williamsburg summit as the best blueprint to sustain economic recovery and counter protectionism. We agreed on the need for continued close consultations as a means of resolving any differences between us in matters of trade and commerce.

Prime Minister Thatcher, we're grateful for your visit, your friendship, especially as this month marks the 200th anniversary of the signing of the Treaty of Paris, which made us friends instead of countrymen. When you finish speaking here, we can go over and look at that Treaty of Paris.

PRIME MINISTER THATCHER. Thank you very much. Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, today's visit has been a very important one. I have had just about 2 hours of talks with the President on the many things which he has indicated, all of them which is extremely vital for the future of our peoples in our several countries.

I have also seen, early this morning, Secretary Regan, when we discussed economic matters and, in particular, the problems of unitary taxation. I saw, too, Mr. Volcker, because naturally, we are all concerned that the great international debt position should find a solution which enables trade to continue, and those countries to come out of their grievous debt problems.

The President and I started first, as he has indicated, on East–West relations. I think I can put our position like this. We both believe in defending our way of life, and we must do that to keep that way of life secure. But our purpose in having military strength is entirely defensive to defend our way of life. We would like to be able to have that security at a lower cost in expenditure and in men.

[4] Source: White House Press Release, September 29, 1983. Office of the Press Secretary to the President; printed also in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, October 3, 1983, pp. 1358-1359. The remarks were made by President Reagan and Prime Minister Thatcher at the Diplomatic Entrance of the White House upon the departure of the Prime Minister at 1:33 p.m. The Prime Minister arrived in the United States on September 28. On September 29, she met with President Reagan in the early morning and again during a working luncheon with British and American officials in the afternoon; the Prime Minister met with Vice President and Mrs. Bush. The following day, Prime Minister Thatcher departed from the United States.

In order to achieve that lower cost, we have seriously and continuously to negotiate with the Soviet Union to try to get a balance in men, materials, weapons, and in nuclear strength. If we can achieve that, we can keep our security at a lower expenditure.

It takes two to negotiate, and the President has constantly put forward detailed proposals to the Soviet Union. Such is the anxiety of the West genuinely to negotiate disarmament reductions. He has put forward the latest proposals. Mr. Andropov has replied. [5] I hope now that the proposals will be seriously discussed by the Soviet Union at the negotiating table. If they are not successful in reaching zero option, the cruise and Pershing missiles will be deployed by the end of this year. Our nerve is being tested; we must not falter now. That should not be the end of the negotiations. I hope, and it is my earnest belief, that they should continue so that although we were not able to negotiate zero option, we should be able to negotiate the deployment of a lesser number of weapons than the full total, provided, again, the Soviets will genuinely negotiate on balance.

We have also discussed, as the President indicated, the Middle East, and we're very conscious that although all eyes are focused on the Lebanon, the fundamental problem of the Middle East, a secure Israel and a legitimate deal for the Palestinian people, has still to be resolved.

I have pointed out to the President, we support his Central American policy, and particularly, the most excellent strategic view he gave of it during his very famous speech in April, [6] and we are constantly pointing out that of the aid which the United States gives to Central America, 75 cents out of every dollar goes to civil aid, and that is a record to be proud of.

We've also had a word about Belize, and I, naturally, as you would understand, have made my views known about arms to Argentina. I discussed with Secretary Regan this morning and again at lunch the wider issues affecting the economy and the importance of trying to secure lower interest rates so that we can get a full recovery in the world which would be to the benefit of the United States, and also to the peoples of the underdeveloped countries.

If I may sum up, altogether this has been another chapter in the close discussion, consultation and similar beliefs in shared ideals between the United States and Britain. Against that background, it's not surprising that we find common views and we pursue them with common purpose in the wider world.

Thank you very much.

Transcript of an Interview With the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), Montebello, Canada, October 28, 1983 (Extract) [7]

U.S.–U.K. Relations and the Grenada Invasion

. . . . . .

Q. There is criticism coming from Europe of our actions in Grenada, particularly from England, where our missiles are going to be deployed. There seems to be concern about who is going to have the fingers on the new missiles that will be deployed, is it a trigger-happy President of the United States? What's your reaction to that criticism?

A. Well, that criticism was made a long time ago and the British and we have both answered it, that there is a perfectly acceptable, workable agreement that we have with England, with respect to the release of nuclear weapons. I believe that argument was pretty well laid to rest.

Weinberger was in Montebello to represent the United States in the NATO Defense Ministers October 27–28 meeting.

Q. Many are suggesting that with Prime Minister Thatcher ahead of time suggesting we not invade Grenada or take part in this action in some way, that we did not accept this advice from the British Prime Minister when this was one of their colonies in years past. Why did we not accept her advice in this case, Mr. Weinberger?

A. Well, the main problem was that we had two things as the President mentioned last night. We had a thousand American citizens and there were a number of other nationalities there whose safety we had every reason, I think, to fear for. We also had an urgent invitation, or an urgent plea really, from all the neighboring nations that regard themselves as sort of one island chain. We felt that there was no way that we could ignore either that urgent request for help in what was clearly a very major threatening situation for them and what was clearly a major threatening situation for our own citizens and those of many others. We thought we really had no choice at all but we understood that from a distance other nations would think that this was something that was rather strong action. I've found here, only in private conversations, and I certainly wouldn't want to quote anybody, very clear understanding from among the Defense Ministers and a lot of private support.

Proclamation by President Reagan, January 20, 1983 [1]

Tricentennial Anniversary Year of German Settlement in America

On October 6, 1683, a group of 13 Mennonite families, coming from the city of Krefeld, now in the Federal Republic of Germany, founded Germantown, Pennsylvania, today a suburb of Philadelphia. Since then, more than 7 million German immigrants have entered the United States and made extraordinary human, economic, political, social, and cultural contributions to the growth and success of our great country.

Today there are more than 60 million Americans of German descent, a number about equal to the total population of the Federal Republic of Germany. More Americans claim German ancestry than any other nationality.

During my address to the Bundestag in Bonn in June of last year, [2] I spoke of the importance which the United States attaches to the Tricentennial year of 1983 commemorating German settlement in America. Despite the legacy of 2 world wars which found us on opposing sides, West Germany and the United States have forged an exceptionally close relationship during the past 3 decades. The success of the Marshall Plan, the Berlin Airlift, and the ensuing NATO partnership have led to a recognition of our common democratic ideals and joint interest in Western economic and political strength.

[2] For text of Reagan's June 9, 1982, address, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, p. 481.

Throughout 1983 there will be numerous activities and observances to celebrate the Tricentennial. President Karl Carstens has accepted my invitation to attend the culminating event in Philadelphia next October. [3]

The Congress, by Senate Joint Resolution 260, [4] has designated 1983 as the "Tricentennial Anniversary Year of German Settlement in America" and has authorized and requested the President to issue a proclamation in observance of that year. By the same Resolution, the Congress established the Presidential commission for the German-American Tricentennial to plan, encourage, develop and coordinate the commemoration of this historic event.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, RONALD REAGAN, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the year commencing on January 1, 1983, as the Tricentennial Anniversary Year of German Settlement in America, and urge all Americans to observe the year with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twentieth day of January, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and seventh.

Editorial Note

West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher made an official visit to Washington, January 25–26, 1983, at Secretary of State George Shultz's invitation. Genscher, who was acting also in his capacity as Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the European Community, met with President Reagan at the White House on January 26. Also attending the meeting were Vice President George Bush; Secretary Shultz; William P. Clark, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs; Arthur F. Burns, Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany; and Peter Hermes, Ambassador from the Federal Republic of Germany to the United States.

In response to questions from reporters at the January 27 Department of State Daily Press Briefing, Department of State Spokesman John Hughes made the following statement regarding Genscher's visit:

"We welcome a number of the points that he made. He said that the American proposal to eliminate all Soviet and American medium-range missiles would provide the best solution for Europe, for West Germany, and for the West as a whole. He said, 'It must be clear that the date of the schedule for deployment would be unchanged, and no doubt should be raised as to the viability of that date.' He said, 'This makes it clear that everyone should know that the West is fully determined to negotiate seriously and work for results.' We welcome those statements by Mr. Genscher." Remarks by Vice President Bush, Bonn, January 31, 1983 [5]

"Our Strength Lies in Unity"

Thank you very much Chancellor Kohl.

Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. I'm delighted to be here in Bonn. As I said at the beginning of my journey, the purpose of my trip was to meet and consult with our allies and friends in Europe regarding the major issues of the day and particularly our joint efforts to reduce the level of nuclear weapons, not only in Europe, but throughout the world. Our meeting this morning was warm, friendly, candid—the way meetings are between friends.

Bonn was the first stop Bush made as part of a visit to seven West European countries from January 30 to February 10, 1983.

The relationship between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany is based on shared values—our belief in democratic institutions, faith in human rights. This year marks the German-American Tricentennial. And, I am glad to say I have accepted Chancellor Kohl's kind invitation to come to Krefeld June 25 as another symbol of our on-going relations.

The relationship between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany is essential if we are to maintain peace and security as we have for nearly four decades. Our discussions focused on East-West relations and the negotiations now taking place in Geneva regarding intermediate-range nuclear weapons. I also told Chancellor Kohl of President Reagan's willingness to explore serious Soviet proposals. The President is personally committed to negotiating nuclear arms reductions. He is also insistent on equality and verifiability—a position shared by our friends here.

During our discussions we also agreed to stick to the two-track decision adopted by NATO in 1979. [6] There is no doubt between us that our strength lies in unity. And our strength, common purpose, and mutual cooperation has been the greatest deterrent to war and has preserved the peace in Europe for the longest period of time in nearly a century.

This afternoon we will leave Bonn and travel to Berlin. I just want to take this time to thank the leaders of this great country and the people of this wonderful city for all their kindness and hospitality.

[6] Reference is to a decision made at the NATO Foreign Ministers meeting in Brussels in December 1979. The first track called for deployment of long-range theater nuclear forces in Europe. The second track was the determination to pursue simultaneously arms reduction negotiations with the Soviet Union. Remarks by President Reagan, February 16, 1983 (Extract) [7]

West German Elections and the Issue of Missile Deployment

Q. Mr. President, as you know, there's an election approaching in West Germany, [8] and the latest polls appear to give the opposition a prospect at least of winning those elections in March. My question to you is, what do you think the consequences would be for the Western alliance if a new German Government took office and declined to deploy the Pershing missiles?

THE PRESIDENT. I think it would be a terrible setback to the cause of peace and disarmament. So far I've had no indication that that would be a possibility. Herr Vogel [9] has been here in this country. He indicated support of what it is that we're proposing in the arms reduction talks and he seemed to indicate his knowledge of how important our continued plan to deploy—remember, at their request—those missiles would be in securing this reduction in armaments.

So, we're not going to inject ourselves into anyone else's internal affairs or elections at all. But I believe that the Vice President's trip there found great support all over Europe of what it is we're doing, and in Germany, even, from the fact that there is, they're preparing for an election.

Q. Do you think the deployment question will not turn on the West German elections, then?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't. I don't really believe that. When I said it would be terrible, I did not mean that to infer as that someone else might win an election. I meant that it would be terrible if any of our allies withdrew from their present position of support for this.

Transcript of the Department of State Daily Press Briefing, March 7, 1983 (Extract) [10]

U.S. Reaction to West German Elections

. . . . . .

Q. John, do you have any State Department reaction to the West German elections? [11]

A. Yes. The United States looks forward to continued good relations with all major parties and to continued close ties with Chancellor Kohl and his government.

Q. How about the election of the Greens to a few seats?

A. No. Wouldn't have anything on that, John. I think that's an internal German question.

Q. Specifically, do you have any comment on the pre-election statements by the Soviets?

A. I don't think we really would have any comment on that. I think, as a matter of fact, most leaders of the various German parties have had some remarks to make from time to time about German meddling, or what they have seen as German meddling in the elections—

Q. Is that what you're talking about—Soviet?

A. Yes. Soviet. Did I misspeak? Sorry.

Q. Yes.

A. Soviet meddling. And I think we would leave that assessment to them.

Q. How about both candidates before the election—on the eve of the election said that they expected the Reagan administration to put forward a new compromise plan on intermediate-range nuclear missiles?

Do you have anything that would indicate that's in the works?

A. No. I think the President's position on the U.S. position in Geneva has been reiterated and made very clear, and we could go back to that language and produce it for you, but it would be what he has said on occasions before. No change in that of which I'm aware.

Q. There's no consideration of putting forward a new proposal in Geneva?

A. The President makes arms control policy of the United States, and he's made it. Should he want to change it, I'm sure that he would make a statement, but I'm not aware of any change.

Address by the Ambassador in the Federal Republic of Germany (Burns), Hamburg, March 14, 1983 [12]

The Human Side of German-American Relations

As the Ambassador of the United States in the Federal Republic of Germany, I have often spoken about the political, economic, and security relationships between our two countries. This evening I would like to address a more fundamental theme—the human relationship between your country and mine.

We are commemorating this year the 300th anniversary of the arrival in North America of the first permanent immigrants from Germany. The 13 Mennonite and Quaker families who in 1683 settled in Germantown, now a part of the city of Philadelphia, came in search of freedom—the freedom to pursue their religious beliefs and the freedom to seek economic betterment for themselves and their children. They found both. I daresay that a great majority of the forebears of the approximately 68 million Americans who today claim German ancestry came in search of these same objectives—personal freedom and economic opportunity.

Across the centuries, America has been identified with these basic human strivings. Our Declaration of Independence and our Constitution eloquently express these ideals, and they have served in all parts of the world as a beacon for people seeking a new life for themselves—a life that would enable them to speak or write freely, to worship God as they saw fit, and to pursue economic opportunities without being encumbered by rigid customs or authoritarian rule.

The human significance of the centuries-old stream of immigration to America—at first from Western Europe; later from eastern and southern Europe; still later from Latin America, Asia, and other parts of the world—can hardly be exaggerated. Americans may justly note with pride that their country has remained a land of hope and welcome for uprooted people—that it accepts even at present many more immigrants than does the rest of the world. Most of them still come in search of personal freedom and economic opportunity for themselves and their children.

The United States, in turn, has continued to benefit from the increasing flow of immigrants to its shores. If they caused social problems at times, they also ultimately enriched our industrial, political, and cultural life. My country could not have developed the way it did, nor become the society that it is today, without the moral courage and the intellectual and technical skills that were continually being brought to us from the Old World and particularly from your country.

The names of many of the German immigrants to America are well known on both sides of the Atlantic; and if I mention some tonight, they serve only as examples of those who have energized American life and culture. There is—as the first of these—Franz Daniel Pastorius, the founder of Germantown, a prophetic figure who projected a clear vision of the kind of country that the United States was to become. In advocating the separation of church and state, tolerance of religious and ethnic diversity, and the abolition of slavery, he was well ahead of his time. Another was William Rittenhouse, a minister and papermaker from Muehlheim on the Ruhr, whose great grandson, David Rittenhouse, served as the first director of the U.S. mint and achieved lasting fame as a mathematician, astronomer, and inventor. Thomas Jefferson was moved to say of him: "He has not, indeed, made a world, but he has intimately approached nearer its maker than any man who has lived." There was the printer, journalist, and publisher, Christopher Sauer, who was the first to print the Bible in a European language in America. A more famous immigrant was John Peter Zenger, who is still known in the United States as the "patron saint" of freedom of the press. And there was Hans Nikolaus Eisenhauer, an immigrant from Eiterbach, in what is now southern Hesse, who arrived in America in the middle of the 18th century, achieved neither wealth nor fame, but became the ancestor of Dwight David Eisenhower—the 34th President of the United States.

[12] Source: Department of State Bulletin, June 1983, pp. 32–36. Burns spoke before the Overseas Club in Hamburg, West Germany.

And, if I may continue, there were also the heroes of the Revolutionary War—Johann de Kalb and Friedrich Wilhelm von Steuben; the political thinkers and reformers—Friedrich Hecker, Carl Schurz, John Altgeld, and Robert Wagner; the bridge builder—John Augustus Roebling; the organ builder—Henry Steinway; the businessmen—John Jacob Astor and Levi Strauss; the artists—Emanuel Leutze and Albert Bierstadt; the political cartoonist—Thomas Nast; the musicians and composers—Leopold Damrosch, Arnold Schoenberg, Bruno Walter, Kurt Weill; the linquist—Maximilian Berlitz; the banker and philanthropist—Paul Moritz Warburg; the theologian—Paul Tillich; the architects—Ludwig Mies van der Rohe and Walter Gropius; the scientist—Albert Einstein; the writers—Thomas Mann and Hannah Arendt; and—to round out this illustrative list—your friend and mine, Henry Kissinger. Where would America be, or for that matter where would the world be, without the momentous contributions of these German immigrants!

These people, their children, and their children's children—the 68 million Americans who claim German antecedents—forged the chain that linked our two societies. These links had nothing to do with political treaties, security arrangements, or trade agreements. Indeed, they survived severe strains in the political relationship between our countries—even two terrible wars. Perhaps the best example of the strength and durability of these human ties is the speed and commitment with which the people of my country devoted themselves to assisting the German people after World War II.

It was primarily the interaction between our two peoples that brought democracy and physical reconstruction to the Federal Republic and established the partnership between our two societies that exists today. To be sure, the Marshall Plan was a critical instrument in rebuilding West Germany's shattered economy. The North Atlantic Treaty provided the essential guarantee of security against aggression. Other actions—such as the Berlin airlift—further showed the resolve of the United States to share in the protection of the young democracy that had risen from the ashes of World War II.

But the driving force of all these salutary political developments was the human network created by the millions of Americans of German descent, by the numerous German refugees who reached our shores in the 1930's, by the hundreds of thousands of German prisoners of war who lived for years in the United States, by the tens of thousands of Americans and Germans who cooperated in rebuilding the democratic society which the Federal Republic is today, and by the legion of Fulbright scholars and exchange students. It was their interaction that formed the foundation of the partnership between our two countries—a partnership that has proved strong enough to withstand all sorts of temporary economic irritations and political differences.

These Americans and Germans, who lived and worked together, came to understand and appreciate one another. They knew or soon learned that they were bound together by shared values and convictions—by respect for human rights, by faith in democracy, by devotion to the rule of law. And they transmitted these insights to those of their countrymen who had no direct involvement with people of the other nation. But by the late 1960's and early 1970's this creative generation of Germans and Americans gradually moved out of positions of leadership and influence. The network of human relationships that had so closely linked our societies thus became looser. The generation taking their places had no similar formative experiences, and as a result it had a less personal commitment to the German-American relationship.

In recent years the tight net of shared values between our two peoples has been sagging, in part, because we are now less intimately involved with each other. At the same time, other developments began to cloud the optimistic mood, especially of young people, in our countries. Among these was the diminished luster of the noble dream of a united Europe, the persisting hunger and despair in many of the less developed parts of the world, the Vietnam war in which the United States had unfortunately become entangled, the civil rights turmoil in my country, the enormous soviet military buildup during the 1970's in the face of a proclaimed detente, the political adventures of the Soviets in Asia and Africa and their invasion of Afghanistan, the suppression of the newly achieved freedom of speech and assembly in Poland, the rampant inflation and rising unemployment in the Western world, and—not least important—the growing feeling in the Federal Republic that its Wirtschaftswunder had come to an end.

All these factors, while not directly involving the German-American relationship, have cast their shadow upon it. It is an inescapable fact that the relationship between our two peoples has become less close. The educational system, which could have partially replaced the loss of direct personal experience between Germans and Americans, has failed us. The new generation has not been well served by the slight attention of our schools to the teaching of history, ethics, and the principles of our Western civilization.

Human understanding is always imperfect. That is man's lot on Earth. We know this from our daily lives. Partents do not always understand their children or children their parents. So it is also between husbands and wives, between employers and their workers, between landlords and tenants, between bankers and borrowers, between professors and students. But, if misunderstandings exist within our families, schools, and workshops, they have much greater opportunity to arise—and even flourish—among nations, since differences of history and language consipre with limited direct contacts between peoples to breed misunderstanding and at times, unfortunately even mistrust. Foreign service is no longer an entirely new career for me; I am now well into the second year of my ambassadorship to your country. But I must confess that I still continue to be astounded by the strange opinions that highly placed Europeans now and then express about the United States and, I should add, vice versa. Is there any wonder, then, why many of the young people in your country and mine have so little understanding of one another's society?

I have spent many hours with young people in your country, as I previously did in mine. I admire their intelligence, their idealism, their horror of armaments, and their sympathy for the downtrodden. But I am also appalled by the ignorance that so many of them exhibit of the history even of their own country, to say nothing about their ignorance of the United States. And I am especially troubled by their apparent lack of appreciation of what it means to live in a democracy.

It is a puzzling and saddening feature of our times that many of our young people, perhaps even more so in your country than mine, seem unable to differentiate between the moral and political order of the West and the oppressive totalitarianism of the Soviet bloc. After all, the values of Western democracies are not abstract or elusive concepts. The liberty of the individual to speak, write, worship, and assemble with others; the equality of all individuals under the law; the protection of every citizen against arbitrary acts of government; the freedom to choose among economic, social, and cultural alternatives—these basic values of Western democracies are practical realities that every intelligent person should be able to grasp. They certainly are thoroughly understood and appreciated by those who live under Communist rule and are not able to enjoy them.

The reason that many young people in Europe and America take basic Western values for granted must be that they have never been without them. They do not seem to realize that their right to demonstrate for a nuclear freeze, their freedom to press publicly for unilateral disarmament, their right to march against what they consider to be wrong American policies in Central America—that these privileges are theirs under a democratic system that they themselves must help protect against those who would take them away, as they have been taken away from both the young and old in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Afghanistan, and many other places. Young people of average intelligence ought to be able to see the difference between the impulses animating America and those governing the Soviet Union. They ought to be able to recognize that the invited presence of American troops in Europe has the express purpose of helping to protect the values of our Western civilization, whereas the Soviet armies that have willfully occupied Eastern Europe for 35 years are there to ensure the suppression of the freedoms for which their citizens yearn to this day.

The reality and the attraction of our Western values, it appears to me, should be clear to anyone contemplating the lives of the unhappy people under Soviet domination who, whenever possible, have taken to voting with their feet because they cannot vote any other way. There are millions of individuals who have escaped from East Germany, Poland, Vietnam, Kampuchea, Afghanistan, Cuba, and other Communist countries. But is anyone aware of a flood—or even of a trickle—of refugees migrating to any of these countries?

The misguided views of young people—and even of some who are not so young—are often attributed to the persistence and power of Soviet propaganda. I hear this repeatedly from my business friends. That explanation, however, is an escape from realities. The Soviets, to be sure, use every opportunity to defame our Western societies and to disguise the truth about their own. But their ability to do so with success derives fundamentally from the fact that both parents and teachers in our countries have failed to impart to children a sufficiently sound moral and historical education, so that they can appreciate the democratic institutions that they have been fortunate enough to inherit.

To be sure, the democratic systems that prevail in Western Europe and in the United States have their shortcomings and abuses. But what is noteworthy about a democracy is its capacity for improvement and renewal. Open criticism, evolution of institutions, and orderly change in the laws governing society are inherent elements of the democratic system. The Soviet system, in contrast, stifles through terror and repression any attempt of its citizens to change it significantly.

The young people of Western Europe must realize that if they wish to preserve their liberties, if they wish to enjoy the basic rights of a democratic society, they must feel part of that system, and they, therefore, must be prepared—if it ever becomes necessary—even to fight for it. As parents, teachers, and politicians, we have the responsibility on both sides of the Atlantic to make sure that the democratic values that bind us in the North Atlantic alliance are understood and appreciated by those who follow in our footsteps.

How can we do that? I come from a background of teaching, and I naturally value the benefits of a good education. It is clear to me that we must do a far better job of educating our young people in ethics, history, languages, and political science. This requires, among other things, that we be more alert as parents and teachers to the inadequacies of our formal educational apparatus, particularly the Gymnasia in your country and the high schools in mine. The textbooks used in both German and American schools are often obsolete, and for that reason alone tend to convey serious misinformation about our respective countries. Teachers of history and political science have a special obligation to be objective and up-to-date. They can be aided in fulfilling this responsibility by an educational system that encourages and rewards those teachers who diligently continue their own education.

I also have a background in international finance. It is for me a familiar territory of relative order and predictability. International politics and diplomacy, on the other hand, are a new discipline for me. I find it a universe inordinately filled with gossip, emotion, and even suspicion—a world in which perception of facts often obscures the facts themselves. This, I readily admit, is the situation in my country as it is in yours. And I recognize that an ambassador must do what he can to clear out this underbrush of emotion and faulty perception that at times disturbs the relationship between his government and the government to which he is accredited.

The achievement, however, of true understanding between any two governments depends fundamentally on the kind of relationship that exists between their peoples, rather than on foreign ministers or ambassadors. Governments in democratic countries are inevitably influenced by, and to a considerable degree they even echo, the thinking of their citizens. It is, therefore, highly important that improvements in our respective educational systems be supplemented by a vastly greater network of personal contacts between the peoples of our two countries. Bringing about better understanding of our respective institutions of work and play, of life in our homes and communities, and of the aspirations and fears of our peoples should be our mutual goal. I know of no other way of reestablishing the camaraderie and understanding that existed between Americans and Germans after World War II—a camaraderie that forged the partnership between our governments in furthering peace and protecting freedom.

A dramatic expansion is now needed of programs under which Americans can study, teach, or work for some time in your country, while Germans become correspondingly involved in my country. To accomplish this, both our countries will have to devote larger resources—in manpower and in private and public financing—to human contacts and exchanges. I am told that the U.S. Government now spends about $115 million per year on its human exchanges with other nations and that only a small part of that sum is devoted to West Germany. Private spending on exchange activities is much larger, but I am convinced that neither private nor public financing of this vital effort is nearly large enough. I would hope that 5 years from now the American Ambassador will be able to report to you that the moneys devoted by his country to exchange programs with other nations, and particularly with the Federal Republic of Germany, have increased at least tenfold. That is how essential I consider these exchanges to the freedom, security, and prosperity of the Western World.

Let me now turn more specifically to the exchange activities between our two counties that I have in mind. At present, various academic exchanges under private auspices are being supplemented by an academic exchange program conducted jointly by the Governments of the United States and the Federal Republic. This program had its origin many years ago when an American of vision, Senator J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, became concerned about an intellectual gap and proceeded to deal with it by sponsoring an educational exchange program between the United States and other countries. Its purpose was cogently described by the Senator when he wrote some years later:

"Perhaps the greatest power of educational exchange is the power to convert nations into peoples and to translate ideologies into human aspirations. I do not think educational exchange is certain to produce affection between peoples, nor indeed is that one of its essential purposes; it is quite enough if it contributes to the feeling of a common humanity, to an emotional awareness that other countries are populated not by doctrines that we fear but by individual people—people with the same capacity for pleasure and pain, for cruelty and kindness as the people we were brought up with in our own countries."

Since its inception, the Fulbright exchange program has enabled about 130,000 Americans and citizens of other countries to study, teach, or do research abroad, and thereby improve understanding between and among peoples of different countries. The highly successful American-German educational exchange program is a good example. At the outset it was entirely financed by the United States, but in time the German Government became so convinced of its utility that it now contributes nearly three-fourths of the total annual cost. This enlightened program deserves increased support from my government as well, and I am pleased to report that this view is widely shared in Washington today.

There is also a vital need for a greatly expanded youth exchange program. Looking to the quality of the future leadership of our societies, it is obviously important to foster sensible dialogue among young people at an early state of their intellectual development. Attitudes in both our societies are often formed before youngsters reach the university level or embark on working careers. In view of that, it would be especially useful to provide larger opportunities for teenagers—say, those between 16 and 19—to spend some time in the partner country. I am thinking of stays that would be of sufficient duration to enable youngsters to go to school, live in a private home, and participate in the community life of the other land. A young person who has spent a school year or so in the partner country will have a real opportunity to learn to understand its society. That experience and knowledge will stay with him or her over a lifetime. I would hardly expect all young persons to become enamored of their partner country, but their doubts or criticisms will at least have been disciplined by some firsthand knowledge.

President Reagan recently announced an international youth initiative that focuses on this particular need with the vision and commitment that characterized Senator Fulbright's proposal back in 1946.[13] The parliaments of both our countries—your Bundestag and the American Congress—have lost no time in endorsing the principle of expanding youth exchanges, and both our governments are already involved in translating their parliamentary resolutions into practice. For instance, a plan is being developed under which every Member of the Bundestag and every Member of the American Congress will have the opportunity to nominate a teenager from his or her electoral district to spend a school year in the partner country. This project, incidentally, would encourage our elected political leaders to become personally involved in exchange activities, and it would thus establish procedures that should benefit our two democracies in the next generation. Not only that, it has been observed time and again that exchange youngsters reinforce the bonds of friendship they had formed with their host families through their own parents, other relatives, and fellow students. We need precisely such a matrix of human contacts to rebuild the warm spirit of partnership that existed between our two peoples during the late 1940's and 1950's.

Still another exchange activity that can yield rich dividends of understanding would involve young Germans and Americans who have already embarked on their life's work in business or farming, as journalists or churchmen, as teachers or government officials or trade unionists. They, too, will eventually have a role, perhaps even a major role of leadership, in our respective societies; and some of them should have the opportunity to improve their perspective on life by working for a time in another country. In response to a wise suggestion by the German Government, I am glad to report that we in the United States have begun to explore ways of cooperating with your country by including working youth in the enlarged exchange activity between our peoples that is now being designed—an activity that should involve our homes, schools, universities, churches, trades, and professions. It is only by strengthening the human relationships between our peoples that we can sustain our shared values.

In concluding this discourse, allow me now to summarize my message to you. Effective political, economic, and security interaction between the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany rests on a foundation of human relationships between the people of your country and mine. Our citizens share a set of values that center on personal liberty, freedom of choice, and the rule of law—values that they have developed over a period of three centuries. These values must be understood and accepted by our citizenry if our political, economic, and security ties are to be preserved. In order to understand and appreciate these values, our citizens must understand each other and each other's societies. To accomplish this we need to improve our schools and increase exchanges among our young people. Our two countries are fully capable of providing the resources to increase youth exchanges manifold, thereby avoiding doing too little too late. We owe this to ourselves, and we owe this to those who will follow in our footsteps.

President Reagan recently remarked that the best way—in fact, the only way—to international peace "is through understanding among nations and peoples." I daresay that much the same is true of the preservation of our Western civilization.

Remarks by President Reagan and the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany (Kohl), April 15, 1983 [14]

Meeting With Chancellor Helmut Kohl

THE PRESIDENT. It was my pleasure today to host a luncheon and extensive meetings with Chancellor Kohl and other representatives of his government. Our discussions touched on a number of bilateral issues, as well as those general problems confronting our two powerful democratic nations.

As befits one who has just won an impressive election victory, Chancellor Kohl was very positive about the opportunities ahead. I share his optimism and look forward to continuing our close relationship.

The Chancellor and I have many things in common, not the least of which is a deep faith in the strength of Western values. We were able to approach our discussions with a shared appreciation for these values and with an understanding of the many traditions and common interests that link our two countries. The special ties between the German and American people will be expressed this year in the celebration of the tricentennial of German emigration to North America. And I'm especially pleased that President Carstens will be making this event—or marking it, I should say, with a state visit to our country in the fall.

[14] Source: White House Press Release, April 15, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, April 18, 1983, pp. 548–550. President Reagan and Chancellor Kohl spoke to reporters in the East Room of the White House beginning at 1:27 p.m. The President and the Chancellor had met that morning in the Oval Office and then held a working luncheon, attended by U.S. and German officials, in the residence. Kohl's meeting with President Reagan was part of an official working visit he made to Washington, April 14–15, 1983, at the President's invitation. Kohl, who was also acting in his capacity as President of the European Council, was accompanied by West German Vice Chancellor and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher.

During our discussion today we focused on issues likely to emerge during the Williamsburg Summit. And the Chancellor and I agree that we should seek a free and open exchange of views at Williamsburg with our primary goal being the closest possible cooperation in tackling the problems facing the world economy. Both of us welcome the signs of economic upturn in our countries and will work to assure that recovery is strong and lasting.

We agree that it is vital that we vigorously seek a resolution of the trade problems between the United States and Europe and that protectionism be avoided. And we're happy with the steps we've made toward a common understanding concerning East-West economic relations.

Another subject of discussion today was the arms reduction negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union. I reiterated the U.S. determination to achieve success in the START and INF talks in Geneva, and the Chancellor confirmed his strong endorsement of our negotiating strategy.

As leaders of our respective countries, we call on the Soviet Union to respond seriously to our proposals, proposals which, if given a chance, will strengthen peace and make all mankind a little safer.

We remain united in our commitment to continue on both tracks of the NATO decision of December 12th, 1979, including deployment of new weapons if continued Soviet intransigence makes this unavoidable.

I'm pleased again to have with us Chancellor Kohl.

CHANCELLOR KOHL. First of all, I'd like to thank you, Mr. President, for your invitation and the kindness and hospitality extended to us.

Our talk, in which Foreign Minister Genscher, our closest advisors, participated gave the President and myself an opportunity to continue our intensive and friendly dialog which we began when I became Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany last October. And I would like to take this opportunity once again here in public to express the gratitude for the very intensive and friendly consultations that have taken place since that time between our two governments.

We had a good, cordial, and open conversation among friends, about which I am highly pleased. This exchange has shown that beyond our personal understanding, German-American partnership rests on the broad basis of shared values and interests.

We discussed in depth and in great earnest the essential aspects of our joint peace and disarmament policy. In the course of this year, important issues are pending. We are profoundly interested in finding solutions to the issues at hand, if possible, in agreement with the East.

And this includes the Geneva negotiations on U.S. and Soviet intermediate-range missiles. We are agreed that the recent Western proposal offers the basis for flexible and dynamic negotiations.

Given goodwill on both sides, it will be possible soon to achieve a balanced result. It is our belief that we have not heard yet the last word from the Soviet Union.

We discussed in detail the CSCE follow-up meeting in Madrid. We continue to strive for an early and substantial result, which would include an agreement on a conference on disarmament in Europe and make important gains in the area of human rights.

We also discussed the Vienna negotiations about mutual and balanced force reductions. We had extensive discussions about the whole field of East-West relations. And we are agreed that personal contacts with the leaders of the Soviet Union continue to be important.

We want to carry on our common efforts to arrive at constructive relations between East and West through dialogue and cooperation wherever the Soviet Union makes this possible. We agreed on the need for continued efforts towards a common approach on East-West economic relations.

Another important subject we discussed was the preparation of the Economic Summit meeting to be held in Williamsburg at the end of May. In this context we exchanged views about the economic developments in our two countries and about measures to promote economic recovery.

The Summit meeting will provide us with an opportunity to intensify the emerging recovery of the international economy through close coordination. In this way we will be able, immediately prior to the continuation of the North-South dialog of the UNCTAD Conference in Belgrade, to make a contribution towards solving the economic and social problems of the developing countries. Thus, we want to promote genuine independence and genuine non-alignment.

I came to Washington also in my capacity as President in the Office of the European Community. The President and I are agreed that the European Community and the United States together bear a great share of responsibility for the international economy.

We are aware that the future development of relations between the United States and the European Community must, and will, live up to this responsibility.

I am leaving Washington firmly convinced that the quality of our relations will also include—should determine—our policy of safeguarding peace and in particular our common efforts to achieve progress in the Geneva negotiations.

I am leaving Washington with a certain feeling that I have been as a guest among friends.

Thank you very much.

Remarks by Vice President Bush, Os, Norway, June 26, 1983 (Extract) [15]

Anti-U.S. Demonstrations in West Germany

. . . . . .

Q. You encountered some angry anti-nuclear demonstrators in West Germany yesterday. [16] What are your comments about it?

A. Well, it was an embarrassment to our hosts: the Lord Mayor of Krefeld, the Chancellor and President of Germany. They felt that the demonstrators—the wild ones—not those that were coming really to say something about peace—but the violent ones, the renegades, the vulgar, filthy ones, who were yelling and shouting obscenities—were an embarrassment to Germany. It wasn't an embarrassment to me particularly, and nobody is going to change policies based on throwing things or abuse and physical violence. Those kinds of demonstrations are counterproductive. We understand when people care in their hearts and want to say something in protest. Our country is built on dissent, built on protest, but not on violence and ugliness and rudeness. I have been through this kind of thing before. But for the hosts, my heart went out to the people of Krefeld who wanted to celebrate 300 years of amity between Germany and the United States. So that part wasn't pleasant. But it did not obscure the significance of the day in our view. I had very productive talks with the Chancellor and with the President of the Federal Republic and with the Lord Mayor. My heart just ached for the hosts who had planned this for a long time and then were embarrassed by the demonstrators—some of whom they said came in from Holland, and were throwing things and yelling abuse. People don't like that. Most people don't like that.

The Vice President was in Norway as part of an official working visit to Northern Europe which began on June 23 and ended on July 7, 1983, taking Bush to England, West Germany, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Iceland, and Ireland.

[16] Bush represented the United States at ceremonies held in Krefeld, West Germany, on June 25, 1983, to commemorate the 300th anniversary of the arrival of the first German immigrants to America. After the ceremony demonstrators, protesting both NATO plans to deploy missiles in western Europe and U.S. policies in Latin America, threw rocks, bottles, and balloons filled with paint at Bush's motorcade. No one in Bush's party was injured. According to the New York Times, West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl stated that his country would "not bend to terror in the streets." A separate, peaceful demonstration was also held in Krefeld on June 25. Its leaders denounced the violent demonstrations against the United States. See New York Times, June 26, 1983, p. A1.

Chancellor Kohl's Visit With Yuri Andropov

Thank you. I wasn't present at Hans-Dietrich Genscher's press readout, but I've gotten some reports. Based on those reports, I think his statement would go pretty much for us as well.

I think that we were very pleased by the opportunity to be debriefed on Chancellor Kohl's visit to Moscow. We had very good sessions both here in the State Department, I think. We had a lengthy meeting this morning with Secretary Shultz, then a lunch, and after lunch, went over to the White House where the Foreign Minister met with the President and a smaller meeting in the situation room with Judge Clark.

I guess the first point we'd make is that this is just another example of the very close consultation underway on security and East-West issues that we carry out with the alliance—and specifically, in this case with the Federal Republic of Germany.

We were very pleased by the very precise and clear position that Chancellor Kohl took in Moscow, his emphasis on Germany's role within the alliance, his position as a leading member of the EC [European Community] and its alliance with the United States. We support the overall concept elaborated by the Chancellor in Bonn, the East-West relations, that is firmness on the one hand and a readiness for dialogue on the other.

We, of course, fully support the message on INF [intermediate-range nuclear forces] delivered by the Chancellor, that is that we will continue to seek an agreement in Geneva, that there is no doubt in the determination of the alliance as a whole, or in Washington or in Bonn, that in the absence of an agreement that the deployments will begin on schedule.

In addition to the INF message, we were told today by the Foreign Minister about the Chancellor's discussion of humanitarian issues during his visit to Moscow, human rights cases, as well as his discussion of the Madrid conference, where we share with Bonn the desire for a speedy conclusion of the Madrid talks.

The Foreign Minister did tell us that the United States came under heavy criticism during the visit to Moscow on its negotiating posture in Geneva, but that the Chancellor rejected this criticism saying that that criticism was tantamount to criticism of Bonn, because our negotiating positions had been worked out in such close consultation. These were not U.S. negotiating positions, in other words; they were alliance negotiating positions.

We also share with the Chancellor the desirability of contacts with the Soviet Union, and we share the view that a summit could be productive, if it is carefully prepared and has a good possibility of producing concrete results.

Remarks by President Reagan and President of the Federal Republic of Germany Carstens, October 4, 1983 [18]

Visit of President Carstens

THE PRESIDENT. Mr. President and Mrs. Carstens, Mr. Minister and Mrs. Genscher, honored guests, I'm delighted to welcome you and your party to Washington and to the United States.

During my inspiring visit to Bonn in June 1982, [19] we agreed that you would come to this country for an official visit as part of our joint celebration of German-American friendship.

This year has special significance. We celebrate the 300th anniversary of the first German immigration to America. Those first families, or settlers, I should say, were 13 families from the Rhineland. They were followed by millions of their countrymen, men, women, and children who became a strong thread running through the fabric of America.

German Americans have meant so much to the development of this nation. And today German-American friendship is vital to the security and freedom of both our peoples.

Nineteen eighty-three is a landmark year for our two countries and for the NATO alliance as a whole. We, and the rest of our allies, must continue to have the courage and mutual trust to do what is necessary to maintain peace and security in Europe.

We decided in December 1979 that if no agreement with the Soviet Union could be reached, maintaining a balance of force in Europe would require the modernization of NATO's deterrent forces.

So far, the Soviet Union has not been willing to negotiate a fair and verifiable arms reduction agreement with us. Let there be no mistake, an agreement would be far better for all concerned. We seek the elimination of these weapons and we will continue our unflagging efforts to reach an acceptable agreement, but if the Soviet intransigence continues, we must begin deployment and ensure NATO's deterrent.

We're confident that the alliance will meet this challenge and that the strength of the German-American partnership will be a major factor enabling NATO to do so.

For our part, we remain convinced that a strong NATO alliance remains the key to European peace. And German-American cooperation and trust are the linchpin of that alliance.

In meeting today and in your visit to many parts of the United States, I believe that you will see that the reservoir of good will our people hold for the Federal Republic of Germany runs just as deep as ever.

By resolution to both our Congress and the German Bundestag and by my proclamation of last January, [20] the year 1983 is the tricentennial year of German settlement in America. Commemoration of this momentous event in the life of our two nations has been and will be vigorous on both sides of the Atlantic.

The cities on your itinerary are poised to welcome you. The people of America are waiting to share the high points of their celebrations with you. Your presence here marking this anniversary touches us deeply. We are proud to say and I hope I can correctly, "wir heissen Sie willkommen."

We greet you. We welcome you. We cherish your friendship, and may God bless you and Mrs. Carstens. (Applause)

PRESIDENT CARSTENS. Mr. President, thank you very much for your warm words of welcome and thank you for your invitation to visit this country together with the Vice Chancellor and Foreign Minister, Mr. Genscher.

I'm looking forward to my talks with you, Mr. President, with the Vice President, with the Secretary of State, with members of Congress. And I'm looking forward to meeting thousands of American citizens while traveling through this country.

The purpose of my visit is to strengthen the ties of friendship between the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States of America.

We commemorate the arrival of the first German settlers in Philadelphia 300 years ago. And you, Mr. President, proclaimed that day as a day which we all should celebrate.

We also commemorate the contribution which millions of German immigrants made to the building of the American nation.

But I further want to express the gratitude of us Germans towards the American people for what they did after two World Wars. And I have only to recall millions of CARE parcels which were sent from America to Germans when we were in great need. I have only to recall the Marshall Plan, which saved our economy after World War II. And I have only to recall the Berlin Airlift of 1948–49, which saved the freedom of Berlin.

Today, we are partners in the North Atlantic alliance, the most efficient alliance of modern times because it has preserved peace and freedom for its members over a period for more than 30 years.

Under the terms of this alliance, 250,000 American soldiers serve in Germany. We greet them as allies, partners, and friends. And in saving this, I speak in the name of the vast majority of the citizens of the Federal Republic of Germany.

But we are not only linked by our alliance, we also have—and I think that is as important—common values underlying our system of government. And by that I mean democracy, personal freedom, human dignity, and rule of law.

Looking to the future, I think we must give our peoples the opportunity to understand each other even better. And particularly we must give this opportunity to the young generation.

While I am here, I shall, together with members of the German Parliament—and I'm happy to say that Mrs. Renger the Vice President of the Parliament is here—I shall work for the implementation of different exchange programs under which more than 10,000 young Americans will go to Germany and young Germans will go to America. This is, I think, the best way for nations to become friends because they will realize that we, the Germans, and you, the Americans, have much more in common than most of them have been aware of.

I am happy to be back in America, a country to which I owe personally a great deal, namely part of my legal education at one of your finest universities.

Thank you very much. (Applause)

U.S. Consultations in Bonn

. . . . . .

I'd like to express my appreciation to my host in this brief visit to Germany, my friend Hans-Dietrich Genscher, and also to Chancellor Kohl, for the time and excellent meeting that we had last night; and then today we had a series of meetings with other leaders of Germany. It's been a very short time, very full, very worthwhile from my standpoint. I must say also that the United States, as in the case of Germany, remains firmly committed to both tracks of the dual-track decision. We are very impressed with the way the German people have handled the deployment issue, and we are as committed as they to continue on and to maintain our own willingness to continue negotiations about these matters at any and all times. Thank you.

U.S.-Egyptian Military Exercises in the Mediterranean

. . . . . .

[Senior Administration Official.] The current deployment of U.S. Air Force AWACS aircraft is in the context of combined U.S. and Egyptian air training. These exercises have been conducted in the past—most recently, in December 1982, as I recall. They will certainly be repeated in the future.

Our fleet units in the Mediterranean are deployed at normal, peacetime readiness levels and dispositions. They are, as always, prepared to conduct or support contingencies as necessary.

In specific reference to the speculation on aircraft carrier movements in the Mediterranean—the President in his role as Commander-in-Chief does not move each individual ship here or there at any time. This is surely the case today and in the past few days and weeks with the Nimitz. It has not been ordered by the President to any particular location in response to any particular event.

Now, I will say one more thing and go to your questions. And that is what I mentioned earlier about being, perhaps, overly sensitized to how exercises happen and why they happen. The United States conducts exercises for the purpose of training for improving readiness with our own forces as well as combined forces of other countries.

Now, it, also, does for another reason. Occasionally, the United States will conduct an exercise if there is tension in the area in order to relieve that tension, to demonstrate resolve to our friends, and as well as to improve the readiness of our own units and their capabilities.

Let me give you a couple of examples. I think many of you here covered, in 1970, the Jordanian situation in August–September as I recall. For those who did not, if you look back, you will find that we had roughly twice the level of Marine forces in the Mediterranean at the time. But if you check, you will find that was indeed coincidental—that the Marine forces were effecting a relief of one battalion for the other battalion.

I am not trying to blow smoke at you. Surely, if we had not had them there, I expect we would have sent them. But the point is, to draw conclusions that the United States—by sending those two battalions to the Mediterranean—was reacting to intelligence in Jordan or anywhere else would simply not be true.

The same thing happened, coincidentally—to be quite honest, in 1973. You will recall in the October War, if you look back, you will find that we had roughly twice the normal level of Marine forces in the Eastern Mediterranean. And indeed, you will find that that was the consequence of the normal expiration of one battalion's assignment and the next battalion having just come in.

Now again, if they had not been there, we probably would have sent them. But the point is that every time that there is the deployment of a U.S. unit to a given place on the globe—to assume that it is associated with a crisis, a reaction to intelligence, an event of some proportion, is simply just not right.

[1] Source: White House Press Release, February 17, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing was conducted on background by a senior administration official in the White House Briefing Room, beginning at 1:05 p.m.

Q. Well, tell us the case here then.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Now, the situation with regard to the carrier, for example—the Nimitz is assigned a broad area of the Mediterranean for operations. And the orders that task it for conducting normal-life operations in that area have not changed. The area in which it operates and it is assigned to do business have not changed—is conducting those normal operations today.

Now, let me tell you something else about exercise planning. It is not uncommon to develop either ourselves or in concert with friends an exercise concept. And you develop it and you put it on the shelf and at some point you may conduct it by schedule. At some point you may conduct that operation by consulting and going ahead to conduct it at other than a scheduled time.

The situation with regard to the Nimitz, though, is that for a long time the Nimitz and its battle group have been assigned to conduct normal operations in a portion of the Eastern Mediterranean. Those orders have not changed. The Nimitz has not been ordered to any particular location in response to any particular event.

Let me give you another documentation, if you don't choose to believe that. Last weekend at some point the Nimitz filed publicly a notice to airmen and mariners of the intention to conduct flight operations in international waters, international air space, and I ask you, frankly, if the United States were concerned about the possibility of any government taking any particular action, if we would have cast our response or our contingent planning for that publicly? I rather doubt it. And, indeed, that's what we did. The Nimitz was doing that in the context of its standing orders to conduct operations in this area that it's been assigned for some time. It completed it and it moved on still within this broad ocean or broad Mediterranean area.

Q. —the problem with what you have outlined is that responsible individuals in this government have told reporters that, in fact, the Nimitz battle group was ordered to go where it went for a few days and the AWACS were sent to Egypt because of the fear that Qaddafi was massing units on the Sudanese border and was going to attempt to destabliize Sudan. And when you stand up and tell us what you just said, it flies in the face of these other officials and what they've said.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I would invite whatever officials that you source to come and say that because it is simply untrue. . . . And I am referring specifically to the newscast last evening which said, in so many words, that in response to the massing of Libyan forces or something to that effect, that the President had ordered the movement of U.S. units to include the battle gorup. And that is untrue.

. . . . . .

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me take both points. Those are reasonable questions. First of all, as to whether the President was aware and/or ordered something. The President was aware that the Nimitz was conducting normal fleet operations in its assigned area as I've said earlier. The President doesn't order that movement. The Nimitz has been operating for some time in this same Mediterranean area under the same orders. Now, it does that with the authority to conduct operations, exercises, other movements that are approved before it ever leaves the United States. But as you can imagine, you can't on that basis say that on—when it's leaving port in December that on February whatever it is, 16th, you're going to conduct operations off Libya. It doesn't work that way. So, it has the latitude to operate in that broad Eastern Mediterranean area. The President didn't order it. The President was aware it was conducting normal operations.

Q. How about the AWACS? Does that also apply? How long—when were they sent, how long will they be there, are there Egyptians on these AWACS, and what was the purpose? And are you saying that none of these so-called normal operations had anything to do with the possible crisis in the area?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me say this. I thought that I said—if I didn't, I intended to say—that when we schedule an exercise—and I refer specifically to the AWACS, and let's talk about that—that we prepare the concept and the plan and the arrangements and it goes on the shelf and occasionally we come out and we run the exercise. Now, at other than scheduled times we'll consult periodically with friends in the area, whether they're in Asia or anywhere else. And if there is some interest in having an exercise, whether purely for training or for reasons of heightened tension or anything like that, then we'll conduct another exercise. Now—

Q. Is that what you did here? You're speaking professorially. Can you be specific about this instance?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes, I will. Now, as we've said—and I think as the President has said—Libya has a habit, that is unrelieved for a matter of years, of intimidating its neighbors. This applies to Chad, to Niger, to Tunisia, to Sudan, to Egypt for that matter. Now, it goes in not terribly predictable fashion. Sometimes it's worse and sometimes it's not so intense. At any rate, the United States and the Government of Egypt [are] conducting jointly today an AWACS joint exercise. It's happened before, it will happen again.

Now, I'm not going to tell you—and I don't intend to mislead you—that this is entirely unrelated to and without interest in whatever Libya may do. I would hope that the American taxpayer expects that we use their money prudently, and these exercises, as I have said, always have the potential for serving a joint benefit. Yes, they improve readiness. Yes, they may deter. But I go back to the premise of the broadcast last night—and any other premise you want to make—that is, that it was responsive to the massing of Libyan forces. And that's just not the case.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Veliotes) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, March 2, 1983 (Extract) [2]

Foreign Assistance for the Middle East, Southwest Asia, and North Africa

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee, I welcome this opportunity to appear before the Committee in support of the Administration's Fiscal Year 1984 Foreign Assistance request for the Near East and South Asia.

Secretary Schultz and Under Secretary Schneider, in recent testimony before Congressional Committees, have presented the overall policy guiding our foreign assistance programs for the region. [3]

They stated that our security and economic assistance programs are designed to maximize the benefits to the national interests of the United States, by supporting a variety of foreign policy strategic and developmental objectives which are vital to our own peace, security and well-being.

The Administration's proposals reflect the realities of our foreign policy and national security objectives in this region, which for the past quarter century has threatened to place the United States in potentially serious world confrontation. In this context:

We are actively pursuing a just and lasting Middle East peace. Our policy flows from the President's initiative of last September [4] which is based on U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 [5] and 338 [6] and the Camp David Framework. [7] Our immediate goal is the resumption of negotiations which will include a Jordanian delegation, hopefully with representative Palestinian participation. Those negotiations should result, first, in the establishment of a transitional regime on the West Bank and Gaza, and then in an agreement on the final status of those territories.

We are vigorously pursuing negotiations for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. Our objective is to restore Lebanese sovereignty and insure Israeli security. A peaceful Lebanon, free from all foreign forces and with a stable central government, will make a major contribution to Israeli security.

We are working with friendly countries to safeguard our vital interests in Southwest Asia.

We continue to emphasize our support, publicly and privately, for a peaceful, early resolution of the devastating war between Iraq and Iran on a basis which preserves the independence and territorial integrity of both countries. Continuation of the war endangers the peace and security of all nations in the Gulf region, and in our view serves neither the interests of Iraq or Iran, nor does it serve any U.S. interest, or those of our allies.

We are searching for the return of peace for the suffering people of Afghanistan, which must be achieved in the context of the withdrawal of Soviet military forces, the restoration of Afghanistan's independence and non-aligned status, the right of the Afghan people to form a government of their own choosing, and creation of conditions which will permit the three million Afghan refugees to return to their homes with honor.

In our efforts to advance the Middle East peace process and to promote the resolution of conflicts elsewhere in the region, we recognize that the necessary spirit of accommodation can grow more easily if friendly states feel secure and confident of U.S. support.

Important steps have been taken to bolster the confidence of key countries in our commitment to their security. In a time of budget stringencies, we have, with considerable sacrifice, increased the national resources for our own military, to develop their capability to deter threats to the region.

We must provide the resources commensurate with the need to strengthen the economies and defense capabilities of key countries in this vital area of the world, if we are to advance major U.S. national interests.

The levels and terms of our proposed assistance have been carefully developed within the constraints of our budget stringencies and the President's economic program, and are the amounts needed to meet the essential requirements of the countries of this region.

Our fiscal year 1984 foreign assistance request for the Near East and South Asia will fund six major programs: $3,625 million Foreign Military Sales Guarantees (FMS); and $1,095 million in grant Military Assistance Programs (MAP).

Including forgiven FMS credits for Israel and Egypt; $11.22 million in International Military Education and Training (IMET); $1.817 million in Economic Support Funds (ESF); $269.8 million in Development Assistance (DA); and $588 million in Public Law 480. [8]

It is important to note here that the fiscal year 1983 Continuing Resolution fell substantially below the level of our request for the region, particularly regarding programs for Southwest Asian countires. The amount received is inadequate to meet our minimum security requirements in the area. Therefore, we are requesting a fiscal year 1983 supplemental of $251 million for Lebanon and $205.5 million to make up shortfalls in the 1983 program for other Near East and South Asian countries.

Our highest priority continues to be furthering the Middle East peace Process to bring a just and lasting end to the turmoil that has engulfed and threatened this area for so many decades. As events of the past year demonstrated, there are no quick and easy solutions for peace in the region, and resort to armed conflict remains an ever present danger. However, the tragic conflict in Lebanon may provide us with new opportunities to expand the peace process, as stated in the President's Middle East peace initiative last September.

Israel and Egypt remain our principal partners in the quest for peace, and these two nations are the largest recipients of our proposed foreign assistance for fiscal year 1984. This assistance is aimed at ensuring their security and economic well-being as they continue to take risks in pursuing the peace process begun at Camp David. Other states critical to the peace process such as Jordan and Lebanon require our continued support if they are to attain the necessary political and economic confidence to join the peace process. Our program also seeks to encourage economic and social cooperation in the region.

In support of this critical peace effort we are requesting: $3,130 million in FMS, of which $1,000 million is forgiven; $1,570 million in ESF; $4.75 million IMET; $260.8 million in Public Law 480 funds; and $6 million in Development Assistance.

Israel.—Support for Israel's security and economic well-being has been a fundamental tenet of American foreign policy for the past 34 years. As we implement and expand the process of peace, Israel requires tangible evidence that the U.S. commitment to this process in no way reduces our commitment to Israel's continued security.

We must ensure that Israel maintains its technological edge in military capability in the region. At the same time we recognize that a strong economy is an essential foundation to Israel's security. Hence, the proposed $2,485 million fiscal year 1984 military and economic assistance package for Israel continues to be our largest bilateral aid program.

The $1,700 million FMS request for Israel includes $550 million forgiven credits. As further assurance for Israel's security, we have increased the FMS level by $300 million for fiscal years 1983 and 1984.

The proposed $785 million Israeli ESF program is to be all grant. This program provides funds on a cash transfer basis to support Israel's balance of payments. Thus, Israel can import essential civilian goods and services without overly heavy reliance on high cost commercial borrowing or drawing down foreign exchange reserves. The terms of our assistance were set after careful analysis of Israel's security and economic requirements.

Egypt.—Egypt remains the key to much of what we hope to accomplish in the Middle East. Our sustained support reflects our continued full partnership with Egypt in pursuit of peace in the region. The Mubarak government supports President Reagan's September 1, 1982 peace initiative, as well as our efforts to resolve the crises in Lebanon, and has called for PLO recognition of Israel. Egypt also shares our commitment to security and stability in the critically important Southwest Asia region in the face of encroachments by the Soviets and their surrogates.

The requested fiscal year 1984 FMS funding for Egypt of $1,300 million includes $450 million in forgiven credits. This is a strong affirmation of our long-term military supply relationship with Egypt. FMS for fiscal year 1984 will be devoted to progress payments on purchases made through 1983, follow-on support, and some start-up costs for programs initiated in 1984.

Equal attention must be paid to maintaining the growth of Egypt's economy and sustained expansion of key sectors of the country's infrastructure. Economic aid will include $250 million in Public Law 480 Title I and grant ESF of $750 million. The ESF program consists of up to $300 million in Commodity Import Program support and roughly $450 million in project and sector assistance. Emphasis will be on increasing agricultural and industrial productivity and rehabilitation and expansion of water and sewer systems in Egypt's major cities.

Lebanon.—Lebanon deserves our special consideration. I shall not dwell on the destruction in that country as the result of last year's conflict. We are all aware of those sad events. It is critically important for us now to demonstrate, in a concrete way, the United States' commitment to Lebanon's reconstruction and restoration as a sovereign and independent nation. Reconstruction of infrastructure is urgent and requires immediate ESF funding to help get projects underway before the fiscal year 1984 appropriations cycle can be completed.

For these reasons we have requested a supplemental for fiscal year 1983 of $150 million ESF, $100 million FMS Guarantees and $1 million IMET. The ESF level requested in the supplemental will be obligated throughout the remainder of fiscal year 1983 and in fiscal year 1984. We expect that the FMS and IMET will be obligated during fiscal year 1983. Therefore, no ESF is being requested for Lebanon for fiscal year 1984; only FMS of $15 million and $750 thousand in IMET funds.

The security needs of that war-torn country require our urgent attention. By assisting the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) to increase its capability, we are helping the central government reassert and extend its authority throughout the country. An increase in the effectiveness of the LAF in maintaining internal security will permit the eventual withdrawal of the Multinational Forces (MNF).

The FMS program will be supported by the slightly increased IMET program which will improve overall training of the LAF. Equipment and training needs of the LAF, while urgent, are paced by the availability of military manpower. FMS and IMET funds sought in the Supplemental are matched to the ability of the LAF to absorb them. Lower FMS and IMET levels are sought in fiscal year 1984 because the major LAF buildup should have been achieved by then.

ESF funds will be used primarily to rehabilitate and reconstruct basic infrastructure, such as potable water systems, telecommunications, and public health services, as well as for helping American institutions of higher learning in Beirut maintain their valuable, long-standing presence in the Middle East.

Jordan.—The proposed fiscal year 1984 security assistance program for Jordan consists of $115 million FMS guarantees and $20 million ESF.

Our assistance is important to Jordan's security and economic well-being, which is essential if that country is to gain sufficient confidence to enter the peace process at this critical juncture. Jordan plays a role in bolstering Gulf security and helped the Habib mission in Lebanon by receiving PLO fighters from Lebanon. Our strong support is crucial to Jordan's ability to continue to take steps of this kind in support of our shared objectives of furthering the peace process and enhancing regional security.

Jordan has an urgent requirement for more modern armament in the face of the vast Soviet resupply of hostile Syria, especially for air defense. FMS financing assists Jordan to acquire those items most critical to its legitimate self-defense needs.

ESF funds will aid the development of water and waste water systems, health programs, agricultural programs, and Jordan Valley irrigation projects, as well as provide development training. IMET funds enhance the professional capability of Jordan's armed forces and assure that Jordan can continue its training and advisory assistance role in the region.

Under the supplemental request for fiscal year 1983, Jordan would receive an additional $35 million in FMS, for a total of $75 million FMS Guarantees.

Middle East Regional.—The regional program request for fiscal year 1984 consists of $6 million in Development Assistance, $15 million in grant ESF and $1.9 million for Public Law 480 Title II.

The ESF furthers the Middle East Peace Process by addressing objectives that cannot be met through conventional bilateral programs. Much of the program is focused on efforts to develop mutual understanding through collaborative research projects between Israel and Egypt and to sustain our development efforts in the West Bank and Gaza, areas of importance to the peace process. Development assistance provides continuation of a scholarship program at the American University in Beirut and the development of Near East assistance projects.

Under the fiscal year 1983 supplemental request, this program would receive an additional $2.5 million in ESF, for a total of $15 million.

The Southwest Asian/Persian Gulf region, a critical source of energy to the free world, is simultaneously threatened by the Soviets through Afghanistan and radical forces from within. Our program is directed at supporting our efforts to bolster the security of countries both in the region, and en route, which are crucial for U.S. access to and presence in the region in times of crisis. Almost all of the countries, from Pakistan in the East, to Oman and Yemen, and to Tunisia and Morocco in the West, face serious economic problems and potential subversion or regional threats from Soviet proxies. All are important, not only to our strategy for the security of Southwest Asia, but, potentially to the prospects for peace in the Middle East as well. Many also face severe economic problems which must be addressed if they are to remain stable. Through our assistance, we must provide tangible evidence of the concern we share about the threat to the security of this region.

For those Near East and South Asian countries that are part of this crucial region we are requesting: $495 million in FMS guarantees; $95 million in MAP; $47 million in DA; $247 million in ESF; $106.3 million in Public Law 480; and $5.8 million in IMET funds.

Pakistan.—The security and stability of Pakistan is a key element in maintaining stability within South and Southwest Asia. Our renewed security relationship with Pakistan derives from that country's position as a frontline state facing Soviet aggression in Afghanistan. In addition to the direct threat this aggression poses to Pakistan's security, it has created the largest single refugee problem in the world with over 2.8 million Afghan refugees flooding into Pakistan over the past 3 years. Pakistan has been extremely generous and forthcoming in granting long-term first asylum to these refugees and providing a major share of the resources to care for them.

We are proposing for Pakistan $225 million in ESF ($75 million in loans and $150 million as grant), $300 million in FMS guarantees, $50 million in Public Law 480, and $800,000 in IMET for fiscal year 1984. These amounts reflect the continuing implementation of our 1981 agreement to provide Pakistan with $3.2 billion in economic and military assistance over a 6-year period, subject, of course, to Congressional appropriation. This agreement was reached after extensive consultations with the Congress.

Our economic assistance to Pakistan is designed to: strengthen that country's capacity to sustain self-generating internal development over the near and longer term; meet the country's short- and medium-term foreign exchange needs through quick disbursing activities; and encourage and support economic adjustments that will help restore long-term stability to Pakistan's balance of payments. Where feasible, we are using program resources to develop economic alternatives to opium production and to induce the Government of Pakistan to tighten enforcement of the ban on poppy cultivation. Our development projects focus on agriculture, rural development, energy, private sector development, water management, population and health, and programs for the underdeveloped areas of Baluchistan and the Northwest Frontier Province.

The FMS and IMET components are designed to assist Pakistan to achieve a minimum level of military modernization necessary to meet its legitimate defense requirements, specifically those arising from the changed strategic situation in the region resulting from the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The modernization of Pakistan's armed forces to be supported by FMS financing will be relatively modest, consisting primarily of replacement of obsolete equipment.

The economic and military components of our security assistance program—by promoting economic growth and stability and helping to meet minimum defense requirements—combine to strengthen Pakistan in its stand against Soviet expansionism in the region. We believe that strengthening Pakistan's conventional military capacity will enhance its security and may help remove the underlying incentive for the acquisition of a nuclear weapons capability.

Under the supplemental fiscal year 1983 request, Pakistan would receive an additional $75 million in FMS Guarantees, for a total of $275 million FMS. The Administration believes every effort must be made to provide the $75 million and thus bring FMS up to proposed levels for fiscal year 1983. Based on our 1981 understanding, the Pakistanis have made obligations to U.S. defense contractors which for fiscal year 1983 alone exceed $550 million. If targeted levels are not reached, the Pakistanis will be hard pressed to meet their obligations. Moreover, we are at an early, sensitive stage of our renewed relationship with Pakistan. A significant shortfall at this time would severely complicate efforts to build a credible relationship with the Government of Pakistan which is essential to accomplishing our strategic objectives.

Morocco.—For Morocco we propose $19 million in Development Assistance, $34.5 million in Public Law 480, $7 million in ESF, $30 million in MAP, $60 million in FMS credits and $1.7 million in IMET. This continuing level of support reflects the serious economic difficulties that Morocco faces, as well as our support for that country's military modernization program.

Strategically located, Morocco has a long record of cooperation with the United States. The Government has consistently taken moderate pro-Western positions on issues of mutual concern and its moderation also extends to its internal policies. Our relations with Morocco have been strengthened over the past year, with several exchanges of high level visits and the agreement by Morocco to provide transit access.

The Development Assistance program contains a significant allocation for expanded efforts in rainfed agriculture, as well as programs for family planning, nutrition and resource development. After agreement with King Hassan in May 1982, we are proposing the beginning of an ESF program for Morocco in fiscal year 1984. To augment the Development Assistance program, $7 million ESF is being requested.

As a key country in North Africa, it is in our interest to see Morocco maintain a suitable level of military preparedness. The FMS credits will help finance completion of more sophisticated defense systems, including air surveillance equipment, anti-armor weapons, and will purchase spare parts and services for previously supplied U.S. equipment. IMET funding will provide increased training opportunities for Moroccan military personnel directly related to the ongoing modernization program of the Moroccan armed forces.

Tunisia.—Tunisia, a friend of the United States and a force for moderation in the Arab world, is vulnerable to Qadhafi's adventures and looks to us for tangible support against Libya and other radical influences in the region. For this moderate, strategic country, we are requesting $90 million in FMS, $50 million in MAP, $1.7 million in IMET and a total of $11.1 million in Public Law 480.

Although we do not intend to obligate any new Development Assistance funds or ESF to Tunisia, programs funded earlier will continue to operate for several years. We will also support Tunisian development through a Public Law 480 program aimed at improving the stagnant agricultural sector.

The security assistance, substantially the same level requested last year, will permit funding of a minimal needed defense capability in the form of F–5 interceptor aircraft, M–60 tanks, Chaparral missiles, and perhaps lesser equipment. IMET funds will provide accompanying technical and professional training for members of the Tunisian military. The $50 million MAP in fiscal year 1984 will enable the Tunisian Government to make essential improvements in its military without adversely affecting the country's economic development.

Under the fiscal year 1983 supplemental request, Tunisia would receive an additional $43 million in FMS and $30 million in MAP, for a total of $105 million in FMS Guarantees and $35 million in MAP.

Omán.—For Oman, we are requesting $45 million in FMS guarantees, $100 thousand in IMET, and $15 million in ESF.

By providing modest military and economic assistance, we demonstrate that we are prepared to support the very real security needs of this strategic country which shares a common border with Soviet-backed South Yemen, and which has granted the U.S. access to military facilities.

Our military facilities in Oman are crucial to any effort to halt aggression in the Gulf area. Our FMS program provides funds to assist the modernization of Oman's armed forces so that they would have the means to help defend these facilities.

In an effort to broaden our relationship with Oman beyond its security aspects, the United States-Oman Joint Commission was established in 1980 in conjunction with the facilities access agreement. We provide $5 million a year in ESF grants to fund the operation of the Joint Commission, feasibility and design studies, technical assistance and training. A $10 million ESF loan program has thus far concentrated on water resources and is programmed in fiscal 1984 for school construction.

Under the fiscal year 1983 supplemental request, Oman would receive an additional $10 million in FMS, for a total of $40 million FMS Guarantees.

Yemen.—For the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR) we propose $28 million in Development Assistance, $15 million in MAP, $1.5 million in IMET and $3 million Public Law 480 Title I.

The YAR concluded a ceasefire with Marxist-led guerrillas last summer, but the threat of outside military aggression persists. In addition, Yemen, one of the poorest nations in the region, experienced a destructive earthquake in December, and is facing a reduction in remittance from Yemen's workers in the oil producing gulf states. It requires substantial assistance to cope with its economic problems.

Development Assistance will continue a series of programs designed to meet basic human needs. MAP assistance is required because the YAR is increasingly reluctant to utilize funds which would add to its medium-term debt burden.

Under the fiscal year 1983 supplemental request, Yemen would receive an additional $6 million in FMS credits, for a total of $10 million FMS, and $4 million in MAP, for a total of $5 million MAP.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Veliotes) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, June 2, 1983 (Extracts)[9]

Middle East Policy Update

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee: I am grateful for this opportunity to discuss with you recent events in the Middle East and policies the United States is pursuing.

As I and my predecessors have said to this subcommittee many times, peace, security and well-being for the nations of the Middle East are critical to a broad range of American interests. That is why we continue to place such high priority on a comprehensive and balanced policy to protect these interests, which include:

Meeting responsibilities we bear, because of our role in the world and our deep ties to the Middle East, to work for the settlement of conflicts there which stand in the way of progress and endanger international security, especially the Arab-Israeli dispute and the struggle for a fully sovereign Lebanon;

Assuring the security and contributing to the welfare of friendly nations in the region;

Prevention of wider Soviet influence in this strategic region;

Supporting major U.S. economic interests, including access to oil and markets for U.S. goods and services, and assisting in meeting the economic development needs of the region; and Cooperating with the more well-endowed states of the area to maintain a healthy international financial and economic order.

For Veliotes' additional remarks relating to Lebanon, see document 360.

In support of these broad interests, the policies of highest priority which we are currently working to advance are:

A just and lasting solution to the long-standing and bitter Arab-Israeli conflict through negotiations, as proposed by President Reagan in his peace initiative of September 1, 1982;

The restoration of a peaceful, independent, and fully sovereign Lebanon through full implementation of the Agreement between Lebanon and Israel of May 17, 1983, [10] and the withdrawal of all foreign forces;

Economic and military assistance to friendly nations of the region to enable them to defend themselves and deter threats from the Soviet Union and its proxies, as well as arrangements for strategic cooperation for access in times of threat.

We also continue to support a peaceful settlement of the tragic and costly war between Iran and Iraq.

The pursuit of these policies contributes to the fundamental goal of U.S. foreign policy: the promotion of U.S. national interests by working to create an international environment in which free and independent nations of the world, including those of the Middle East, can realize their rightful aspirations and the blessings of peace and progress.

I would like to discuss the situation in Lebanon, the peace process and a few other matters in greater detail.

. . . . . .

The focus of attention and diplomatic activity recently has been Lebanon. But the most fundamental and challenging issue in the Middle East remains the search for peace between Israel and the Arab States, including security and recognition for Israel, and realization of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. I want to emphasize that although we have been intensely involved in the Lebanon question recently, we are determined to move forward in pursuit of President Reagan's peace initiative of September 1, 1982, which addresses the need for a just and lasting resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The President's initiative reflects a long tradition of U.S. leadership in the quest for peace in the Middle East. We have experienced many setbacks and frustrations over the years. But progress has been made, in part because of our determination and leadership.

We were instrumental in 1967 in the adoption of UN Security Council Resolution 242, and subsequently Resolution 338, which laid down the concept of a simple trade off: Israel would give up territory occupied in 1967 in return for peace, recognition and guaranteed international boundaries, and Israel and her Arab neighbors would negotiate to this end. These resolutions remain the basis of U.S. policy in the Middle East today.

At Camp David in 1978, we brought Israel and Egypt together in negotiations that led to the historic peace treaty between those two former enemies. [11] That treaty, based on principles of Resolutions 242 and 338 was a triumph of diplomacy over thirty years of war and hostility. These principles must be applied as well in achieving peace between Israel and Jordan and Israel and Syria.

President Reagan's peace initiative, which is based on Resolutions 242 and 338 and the Camp David accords is an effort to reinvigorate the peace process. It offers incentives for other parties—most immediately Jordan and the Palestinians—to join the peace process. It represents a delicate balance of two principles essential for Middle East peace. It recognizes both Israel's right to exist behind safe and secure borders and the legitimate rights and just requirements of the Palestinians. In our view, these principles are best achieved by self-government for the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza in association with Jordan.

We are encouraged that the President's initiative has received wide bipartisan acclaim in the United States and we are gratified by the support of our European friends, which we greatly value. We are also encouraged by support for the President's proposals we have received from moderate Arab leaders. In this connection, the communique of the Arab Foreign Ministers at Fez last fall [12] indicated that the moderate Arab States now recognize that the question is not whether to make peace with Israel, but how best to do so.

In Israel, despite the Government's rejection of the President's initiative, there is a longing for peace. Our proposal has sparked a lively dialogue and widespread new interest in realistic, compromise solutions to the Palestinian dilemma and Israel's security. These are positive signs.

We are keenly aware, on the other hand, of the obstacles that have thus far stood in the way of negotiations under the President's initiative. We understand and share King Hussein's frustrations with the lack to date of Arab support for Jordan's early entry into the peace process. King Hussein continues to support President Reagan's September 1 initiative, and he wants very much to join in the peace process based on the President's proposals. Other moderate Arabs have also told us they want time to help restore momentum to our efforts, and they want us to continue to support King Hussein. The door is still open. We stand ready to consult further with these Arab leaders. Our peace initiative remains on the table and will not be withdrawn. We will continue to work to move the process forward.

Mr. Chairman, when I last met with the Committee we were unable to address the Iran-Iraq issue because of lack of time. That devastating war is another conflict that endangers the peace and stability of the Middle East and Persian Gulf. I wish to reaffirm U.S. support for a prompt, just and peaceful resolution of this terrible war, whose cost in human and economic terms is vast and tragic. Recently, a major oil spill in the Gulf from wells damaged in the war has created a very serious threat to the marine and coastal environment as well.

We will continue to support a negotiated settlement of this war in accordance with the principles of international law, including support for the territorial integrity of both combatants and nonintervention in the internal affairs of another State. As in the past, we remain neutral in this conflict, and stress the importance of independence and security for all States in the Gulf region.

At the moment, it is difficult to assess the prospects for a negotiated end to the Iran-Iraq war, although there has been considerable activity in this area recently. A delegation from the Gulf Cooperation Council composed of the Foreign Ministers of Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates, visited both Tehran and Baghdad in early May. They reported to the Gulf Cooperation Council in mid-May and are awaiting a further indication of intent by Iran before making a second visit to Tehran and Baghdad. The Prime Minister of Algeria visited Tehran in May and, according to official Iranian statements, discussed the war with senior Iranian officials. Also, a team from the United Nations has been inspecting war damage to civilian areas in both Iran and Iraq at the invitation of both countries. Such contacts are encouraging, and we hope they will help open the way to negotiations for a peaceful settlement, but we have no basis for predicting that this will happen soon.

Let me say in conclusion, that this is a period of change and opportunity in the Middle East. The Lebanon-Israel agreement, the President's September 1 initiative and signs of a growing recognition in the region that continued armed conflict is futile for all, offer hope that peace is possible. As the President's peace initiative demonstrates, the United States remains committed to playing a central role in the search for peace and security in the Middle East. We are uniquely suited to this role because of our profound interests in the region and our strong ties to both Israel and the Arab States. We do not minimize the formidable barriers that still lie in the way, but we are determined to continue our efforts, working with our friends in the region, to surmount these obstacles.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Pelletreau) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, September 26, 1983 [13]

Principal Middle East Policies

Mr. Chairman, Members of the subcommittee: I appreciate this opportunity to testify before you today on recent developments in the Middle East and to describe our current policies. Before we begin our discussion, I would like to make some brief introductory remarks.

American diplomacy in the Middle East continues to be dedicated to the resolution of conflicts which threaten both regional and international peace and security and endanger critical U.S. political, security and economic interests.

Those conflicts, which we discussed at our last meeting in early August [14]—the crisis in Lebanon, the Arab-Israeli dispute, the war between Iran and Iraq and Libya's aggression in Chad—are far from being resolved.

Let me turn first to Lebanon. The cease-fire announced September 25 gives hope that the turmoil and violence in that long-suffering country may soon be brought to an end and replaced by a genuine process of national dialog and reconciliation. Lebanon is important to us, not only because of our friendship for the Lebanese and our humanitarian concern for their plight, but because events in Lebanon, lying as it does between Israel and Syria, affect the peace and stability of the entire area. That is why we are so deeply involved there.

I would like to restate the principles governing our policy in Lebanon:

—The withdrawal of all external forces;

—A sovereign Lebanon under a stable central government, dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its territory; and —Security of Israel's northern border.

One hardly need be reminded that in recent weeks, the path toward these goals has become even more tortuous. Widespread fighting erupted in the Shuf and Alayh regions following the redeployment of Israeli forces south of the Awwali River. Factional fighting between PSP and Phalange militias was exacerbated and expanded by the introduction of Palestinian fighters into the fray and by the initiation of attacks on the forces of the central government. Syrian forces not only have been supplying the PSP and Palestinian combatants but also continue to occupy eastern and northern Lebanon, representing an obstacle to the full withdrawal of Israeli forces from the south, as foreseen under the May 17 Agreement. Until yesterday's agreement Lebanese confessional leaders had failed to respond to President Gemayel's invitation to enter into a national dialog that could lead to internal reconciliation. And Syria had compounded its unhelpful role by encouraging such intransigence and fueling the continuation of internal turbulence in Lebanon. We hope that yesterday's agreement marks a new beginning among all parties involved, and that this morning's cease-fire will evolve into the basis for a permanent peace.

Our basic policies have not changed in the face of these challenges. We believe our goals in Lebanon are just and attainable, and we are determined to persevere.

We have intensified our diplomatic efforts, through the mission of Ambassadors McFarlane and Fairbanks, in support of the Government of Lebanon's efforts toward national reconciliation and the withdrawal of all foreign forces. The first step has now been achieved—a negotiated cease-fire, as a prelude to a political accommodation among the factions, withdrawal of foreign forces and the reestablishment of Lebanese Government authority. The framework of such a cease-fire was urgently discussed over the past two weeks and has now been agreed to by all the parties. Political dialog and reconciliation must now be urgently addressed.

Our Marines, as part of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, have been a stabilizing influence in this process. The Marines are there to provide a supporting presence requested by the Lebanese Government. Their job has been to help the Government and the Lebanese Armed Forces restore Lebanese authority and sovereignty over the Beirut area and to end the violence there. They have performed this mission magnificently. We grieve the loss of the four Marines who have given their lives, but we can also be proud of the Marines and the contribution they are making to Lebanon.

The mission of the Marines has not changed, in spite of the recent escalation of violence. I want to emphasize, as other U.S. spokesmen have, that our Marines do not have a combat role. The rules of engagement remain that they will defend themselves if military action from any quarter interferes with their mission. We believe there is no concerted effort to target the Marines or other MNF contingents. But they are in an area where there is violence, and they must therefore be able to defend themselves. I can assure you that they will. We have no intention of increasing the number of Marines ashore, expanding their area of operation or changing their role. On the other hand, we will provide sufficient military power offshore to bolster the Marines' own means of self-defense.

We are pleased that an agreement has been reached among the bipartisan leadership of the Congress to introduce and seek to enact a resolution authorizing the continued presence and mission of the U.S. peacekeeping forces in Lebanon. While the President has indicated that he has substantial reservations about parts of the resolution, he has also indicated that he would be willing to sign the proposed resolution while expressing his reservations, if it is passed in the form that was presented to him. As the President stated, we are pleased that this proposed resolution not only supports our policies in Lebanon but now enables us to advance U.S. peacekeeping interests on the solid bipartisan basis that has been the traditional hallmark of American foreign policy.

In the current debate over the U.S. role in Lebanon, it is worth reemphasizing that we are engaged in a truly international effort there. Our Marines are part of a multinational force in which French, Italian, and British troops are also performing valiantly and suffering casualties, on behalf of peace in Lebanon. Ambassador McFarlane's good offices are part of a larger diplomatic effort among many nations. Saudi Arabia, for example, which has unique access to many of the Lebanese parties, has played a consistent and helpful diplomatic role and has been particularly helpful in engineering the current cease-fire. Egypt and Jordan and our European allies have also been supportive in a number of ways. The United States is not "going it alone" in Lebanon.

There are other positive elements which also deserve attention as we view the current crisis in Lebanon.

President Gemayel is making an earnest and urgent effort to restore national unity. His statement with his Council of Ministers on August 31 calling on the leaders of Lebanon's confessional communities to join him in a dialog aimed at a new national approach to political reconciliation was an important initiative which has been genuinely advanced and maintained and which has our full support.

The worthy performance of the Lebanese Armed Forces in supporting the Government's efforts to restore order and reassert its authority is another encouraging development. The professionalism, unity and courage of this small army, which draws its members from all of Lebanon's religious communities, is a demonstration of what can be achieved on a broader scale in Lebanon. U.S. training and the assistance we have provided the Lebanese Armed Forces have been a sound investment. In less than one year, an army that previously had been relegated to the barracks has recruited, trained, and fought. Competent leadership has emerged, and soldiers drawn from all of Lebanon's many confessions have stood side-by-side in combat.

Notwithstanding these positive elements, the problems which face the Government of Lebanon are formidable.

The hesitancy of some Lebanese leaders to accept President Gemayel's call for negotiations leading to a cease-fire and political talks has been discouraging. We understand the legacy of mistrust and division which lies behind this stubbornness. But Lebanon's communities have lived together in peace before. They can do so again.

The process of national reconciliation can advance, however, only if Lebanon's colossus to the east agrees. Syria's refusal thus far even to discuss terms under which it would withdraw its forces has caused Israel to delay withdrawal of its own forces.

Syria has said in the past that it would withdraw its forces when the Government of Lebanon says they are no longer needed. On September 1 the Lebanese Government said this, loudly and clearly, by formally requesting the departure of Syrian troops. We hope Syria will heed this request.

The United States recognizes that Syria has legitimate security interests in Lebanon, but we do not recognize its right to destabilize its neighbor or to occupy it permanently. We are continuing our dialogue with Syria in the hope that this will ultimately lead to negotiations between Lebanon and Syria and the withdrawal of all foreign forces, Syrian, PLO, and Israeli, from Lebanon.

Although Lebanon has preoccupied our diplomacy in the Middle East in recent months, our most fundamental goal remains a broader peace based on Resolution 242 and the Camp David framework. In an address on August 27,[18] President Reagan strongly reaffirmed the U.S. commitment to the peace initiative he first announced on September 1, 1982. This initiative, he said, is "definitely alive and available to those parties willing to sit down together and talk peace" and the positions set forth in that initiative remain "the only realistic basis for a solution that has thus far been presented." The President's initiative embraces our firm commitment to the security of Israel and of all the states of the region as well as a fair and practical resolution of the Palestinian problem through negotiations.

Unfortunately, neither Israel nor its Arab neighbors have yet decided to grasp the opportunities afforded by the President's initiative. Israel's continued settlement activities, which we oppose, undermine Arab confidence in the willingness of Israel to trade territory for a negotiated peace. Moreover, division and mistrust among Palestinians and the refusal of the PLO and some Arab States to recognize Israel's right to exist are serious barriers to reinvigorating the peace process. The United States stands ready to assist in this process, and will be in a position to act effectively when both Israel and its Arab neighbors grasp the opportunity for peace the President has offered.

The recent resignation of former Prime Minister Begin and the transition in Israel to a new government will not affect our fundamentally sound relationship with Israel, our steadfast commitment to its security, or our hopes that Israel will join its neighbors in seeking peace.

We will also continue to emphasize the importance of close and friendly relations with Jordan. King Hussein still believes that the President's September 1 initiative is the only practical avenue to peace, and Jordan remains willing to enter into negotiations with Israel if it can obtain adequate Arab support. Furthermore, Jordan shares with us an interest in the stability of the area and has actively aided other moderate countries in their defense. We must ensure that U.S. policy, including our economic and security assistance programs, continue to support Jordan.

Egypt also has an important role in the peace process launched at Camp David, and our relationship remains one of full partnership. We value the support President Mubarak's government has given to the President's peace initiative as well as Egypt's support for the government of President Gemayel in Lebanon. We will continue to place a high priority on close cooperation with Egypt and to support Egypt's efforts to advance its economic development and maintain its security. President Mubarak is aware of the need for economic reform and has stimulated new thinking on economic policy. We wish to support the reform process, and deobreob authority is an important test for us. A strong Egyptian economy will yield us commercial benefits such as the recent $300 million sale of Boeing 767 aircraft.

I am pleased to report that U.S. and Egyptian forces recently completed an extremely successful joint training exercise—Bright Star '83—which demonstrated the ability of Egyptian and American forces to work together in ways that would be useful in responding to threats to our mutual interests in the region.

At our last meeting, I mentioned our growing concern with another conflict in an area adjoining the Middle East, Libya's armed aggression in Chad. Libya still occupies a large portion of northern Chad, but the French decision to send troops and combat aircraft has clearly had a deterrent effect on Qadhafi's willingness to move further south. The United States has been assisting with defense articles and services to the Chadian Government under the Foreign Assistance Act. The Libyan presence hinders efforts toward reconcilation among the factions in Chad, and is also a menace to the neighboring states. Our policy is to obtain Libya's withdrawal, a resolution of this conflict by peaceful means and to preserve Chad's territorial integrity. We strongly support the efforts of France and multinational efforts by the OAU and the United Nations to achieve Libyan withdrawal and stability in Chad.

The war between Iran and Iraq continues to take a heavy toll in lives and treasure, and it also presents a continuing threat to U.S. and Western interests. The prospects for a negotiated settlement have not improved. The longer this war of attrition lasts, the greater the risk will be that either Iran or Iraq will risk some desperate military escalation in the Gulf that would widen the war. We would regard as especially serious any threat by either party to interfere with free navigation or act in a way that would restrict oil exports from the Gulf.

I wish to reemphasize, as we have made clear to both Iran and Iraq, that the unrestricted flow of oil from the Gulf is vital to the entire international community. Our commitment to freedom of commerce and navigation in the international waters of the Gulf is firm. Even if Iran and Iraq cannot come to grips with the basic issues that divide them and to make peace, we expect them to respect this principle.

One bright spot amid the warfare has been the measured improvement in our dialog with Iraq. Iraqi Under Secretary Kittani's recent visit to Washington included calls on this committee and other members of Congress and staffers, as well as discussions with senior administration officials. Ambassador Kittani also devoted much of his time to interviews with the media and private American groups interested in foreign affairs. His visit was an eloquent statement of the value Iraq and the United States place upon coming to understand each other more accurately than has been possible in the past. We are narrowing the differences that remain in our approaches to several issues, and there are important common interests that provide bases for increased cooperation. Of these, the most significant is the strong desire which the United States shares with all the peoples of the region for an immediate end to the Iran–Iraq War, so that both Iranians and Iraqis can get back to the development of their countries without outside interference.

Mr. Chairman, I have only touched on the major conflicts in the Middle East which concern us most, without mentioning many other important political, economic, and strategic issues that affect American interests in that region. We intend to persist in our efforts to help solve these conflicts, working with other friendly nations in the process, and to pursue our other interests with patience and firmness. Our major interests in that region will continue to demand a sustained U.S. effort, notwithstanding the many difficulties we face. We are making that effort.

Proposed Participants in the Peace Process

[1] Source: Department of State files. The briefing was conducted on background by a senior Department of State official, beginning at 6 p.m., and was held for members of the Egyptian press during the visit of President Mubarak. Regarding his discussions with President Reagan, see document 311.

Q. King Hussein was here a month ago.[2] I think it was declared that he is due to come next month to Washington in order to reach another time. I want to ask, have you reached something concrete with him during his last visit?

A. King Hussein was here. Whether he comes back again in a month remains to be seen. But at any rate, we had several days of very intense and worthwhile meetings with King Hussein.

King Hussein, I believe, basically supports the President's initiative. And like President Reagan, like President Mubarak, like, I think, Prime Minister Begin, he wants peace. He is willing to work for it.

The process of constructing the right atmosphere and the right conditions to enter these negotiations is something that we talked with him about in great detail; how to enter, what the conditions should be, what to expect, what will the steadfastness of America—he's very interest[ed] in, of course—and we discussed all these things a lot. I see and know that he is talking with his peers and advisors, the Palestinian groups and so forth about it.

We hope that before long he will feel that he is in a position to make a positive decision. Of course, that remains for him to decide. Clearly, he's welcome back in Washington at any time, but you don't have to come to Washington to decide things. Lots of times people like to do that. We're glad to have them. We all have to remember that the action is in the Middle East. That's where it is; not here. But we are very interested and we're ready to do whatever we can to move this process along.

Q. As you have stated, President Mubarak is in support of the President's initiative; also King Hussein. On the other hand, Begin is categorically against.

How do you see the basis of negotiations with one of the main parties refusing to negotiate?

A. Prime Minister Begin is in favor of the Camp David Accords[3] and the Camp David process. We feel that the President's proposals[4] fall squarely within those Accords. So he is certainly willing to come and take part in the process.

I think one should expect in any negotiation that when people start, there are differences of opinion around the table. If there weren't, there wouldn't have to be a negotiation. We don't say that everybody who comes to the table has to have the same opinion. We feel that people should come to the table dedicated to the idea that we're going to find peace, and we'll have to talk and understand each other and develop compromises, and so on.

I see no evidence whatever that Prime Minister Begin isn't ready to come and do that.

Q. What kind of conditions are put on the Palestinian delegation within the Jordanian delegation?

A. Of course, it's up to King Hussein—

Q. Can the PLO nominate the members of its delegation?

A. We believe that to have a member of the PLO in the delegation would be what in our country we would call a "non-starter." It's just not the case that Israel will sit down, and that's a fact. At the same time, I think there have to be Palestinians in this negotiation because there is going to be, in any negotiation, compromises made; somebody takes a little, gives a little. That's the nature of negotiations.

A great deal of what the negotiation is about are the rights of the Palestinians. The Palestinians are not going to accept a result in which they had no participation. You wouldn't; nobody would. They have to be represented there. Everyone agrees on that, and the Camp David Accords explicitly say that.

So that leaves you the question of who are these Palestinians who could be there. As far as we can see, I think there is a presumptive case for people who are on the West Bank or Gaza, but not necessary just that. I think they have to be people who are legitimate in the eyes of the Palestinians as their representatives.

[3] For text of the two Camp David Accords, signed on September 17, 1978, see American Foreign Policy: Basic Documents, 1977–1980, pp. 653–657.

There are quite a number of people who have standing and who aren't the PLO, and who have that status. You can't expect to have Palestinians be regarded as legitimate if they've been picked by the Israelis. You wouldn't accept somebody as your representative that the person you were bargaining with selected. So we have to have people who are legitimate in the eyes of the Palestinians.

That is always a question: How do you select such people? I think one of the geniuses of the Camp David Accords, as I see it anyway, is the provision for a transitional regime with a self-governing authority. And a self-governing authority governs by virtue of the people who are going to be governed, that is, the people on the West Bank and Gaza, who are going to be covered, select them. So that is a process in which you identify people through a legitimizing process.

It seems to me the problem of picking Palestinians, while it has its thorny aspects, is a problem possible of solution.

Q. In other words, Mr. Secretary, the mayors, to define what you have said now?

A. You could interpret it that way. I don't want to try to put something down like that and seem to be too specific because I think this is the sort of thing that King Hussein and his advisors and those who are going to instruct this, they have to decide that.

I just reiterate again, you can't dictate to people who is going to be on their negotiating team and feel that that team will have legitimacy. Maybe you can say, as a party, I won't sit down with somebody; but you can't say who they have to come with.

Q. Is it true that the American administration has excluded what you can call the league of villages, this body which the Israelis have done (phonetic) on the West Bank, the league of villages?

A. The "village leaguers"?

Q. Yes.

A. I would only just refer you to what I said earlier: I think they have to be Palestinians, and they have to be individuals who have standing and legitimacy in the eyes of the Palestinians whom they are going to represent. That's the characteristic that they have to have.

Q. Let me put another question, . . . When are you going to drop your commitment not to open a direct dialog with the PLO?

A. The conditions have been stated and restated very clearly by the President and others, namely that when the PLO, which has in its founding document a commitment to the eradication of the State of Israel, in some manner drops that, or contradicts it, and says that it agrees that Israel is a state with a right to exist and gives that measure of recognition and accepts the idea of Resolutions 242 [5] and 338 [6] as a basis for peace, when they do that, unequivocally and unambiguously, then the United States will be willing to talk with them.

Q. What about if the Palestinians or the PLO do that and there will be no reaction from the Israelis, are you going to take this step?

A. We can speak for the United States, and the President has spoken about this. He has said that, and said that flatly. And when various leaders of the Arab world have been here, he has said it to them privately. He has said it to them publicly after their private meeting, and has been asked by them, and he has told them, "You can go back and you can say this." So we have had the same message to everybody; the message has been given in direct, private discussions and in public statements. It's the same comment exactly.

U.S. Commitment to Israel and the Peace Process

. . . . . .

Let me now turn to a third item that I wanted to discuss with you, the Middle East. America's commitment to Israel remains strong and enduring. And, again, I ask you to focus on deeds. Since the foundation of the State of Israel, the United States has stood by her and helped her pursue security, peace and economic growth. Our friendship is based on historic moral and strategic ties, as well as our shared dedication to democracy. We've had disagreements, as would be expected between friends, even between good friends. Our friendship continues, however, and there should be no doubt that America's commitment to Israel's security remains as it always has been.

Over the last year, our diplomats and Marines have been engaged in a campaign for peace and security in the Middle East. As I said last September, we believe that the events of the past year have created new opportunities for peace that must not be lost. The current political fluidity and general desire to break the cycle of terror and war present a special chance to bring peace to this long-troubled region. It's vital to the United States, to Israel and to all those who yearn for an end to the killing that we not let these current opportunities pass by. The proposals I made to build an enduring peace are strongly rooted in the history of the region and are designed to promote negotiations that will achieve a solution acceptable to all the parties. They are based on an historic U.S. commitment to Israeli's security. They reaffirm the Camp David Accords which deem that peace must bring security to Israel and provide for the legitimate rights of the Palestinians.

Our proposals are founded on the Camp David process and U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which produced the region's first meaningful peace treaty, ending the state of war between Egypt and Israel. [8]

Israel and Arab leaders must take the necessary risks for peace to take root and bloom if we are to succeed. It is riskier to do nothing, to let this time pass with no tangible sign of progress.

We share with Israel three goals in Lebanon: A speedy withdrawal of all foreign forces, a strong central government for Lebanon with jurisdiction over all its territory, and full and effective guarantees that Southern Lebanon will no longer be used as a staging ground for terrorist attacks against Israel.

To achieve these goals will require negotiating flexibility by all of the parties.

With respect to the broader peace process, again, great courage and some risk will be required on both sides. Israel must be prepared to engage in serious negotiations over the future of the West Bank and Gaza. As I've stated previously, the most significant action demonstrating Israel's good faith would be a settlements freeze. On the other hand, King Hussein should step forward, ready to negotiate peace directly with Israel.

Each of these steps is independent but related. And for all three, the time to act is now. The fight against antisemitism, the struggle for Soviet Jewry and the search for peace and security in the Middle East require courage, sacrifice and tenacity from all parties.

There are ample excuses for those who do not share our goals or dedication; but if history is the guide, those who see opportunities for peace and pursue them, who see injustice and condemn it, who fight for liberty will in the end prevail.

We're making the future in which our children will live. Only the courage to act will insure that it is a more peaceful, secure and free world.

America knows God's blessings. Our cup truly runneth over. We seek only to share the blessings of liberty, peace and prosperity.

Testimony by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Veliotes) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 2, 1983 (Extracts) [9]

Saudi Arabian, Jordanian, and Palestinian Roles in the Peace Process

. . . . . .

MR. LEVINE. . . . Allusions were made to the wisdom or lack of wisdom of the AWACS sale in colloquies we had. One of the arguments so forcefully asserted during the AWACS sale debate when the issue was presented to the Congress was that, if the AWACS were sold to the Saudis, they would be much more forthcoming with regard to the issues in the Middle East, and particularly with regard to the Camp David peace framework.

In light of those arguments, how do you assess the role of the Saudis in helping to encourage King Hussein to join the peace process?

MR. VELIOTES. That argument was one of many in support of the sale, because the basic argumentation for the sale was that this would increase our prospects for security cooperation with the Saudis. This is an interesting question because I think the Saudis have taken a public role in favor of peace with Israel that has been surprising. People may use euphemisms, but the public enunciation of the Fahd plan, [10] obviously it wasn't our plan, and it had elements in it that people rejected, but the premise of it was peace between the Arabs and Israel. And the Saudi persistence in having that adopted by the Fez conference [11]—in I believe it was October—I think was a very positive step.

Again, it is not the American plan but it does talk about peace with Israel. We believe that the Saudis—I will say it is clear, it is not a question of belief, that the Saudis were very helpful in defusing the problem in West Beirut, and have incurred some very heavy obligations as a result, particularly being blamed at least in part for the subsequent massacres in the camps. [12] And the Saudis have remained committed in Lebanon. In their own way they share the goals of the Government of Lebanon that we share, and we can expect them to continue to play a positive role.

With respect to the peace process, obviously they support the Fahd plan, and I should say the Fez declarations, and that is their public posture. There is no doubt, however, that privately the Saudis have been encouraging with respect to the need for the Jordanians and the Palestinians to come to the table.

[12] On September 17 and 18, 1982, approximately 800 Palestinian civilians were massacred in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps south of Beirut. For a U.S. statement on the massacre, see ibid., p. 860.

For information regarding the Final Report of the Israeli Commission of Inquiry into the Events at the Refugee Camps in Beirut, 1983, see footnote 21 to document 340.

The basic Saudi concern, I should say basic concern, certainly shared by the Saudis, is that the broader the support that King Hussein could have, the better for everyone and the less vulnerable are those who would support him. So they have been focusing their efforts on the Jordanian-Palestinian dialog. Of course, we all hope that this comes to fruition in the very near future.

. . . . . .

MR. DYMALLY. Mr. Secretary, the King of Jordan and the chairman of the PLO have been meeting. Could you give us some insight as to what kind of discussions are being held and what the ultimate objectives of those discussions are?

MR. VELIOTES. Yes. The discussions have been going on now at a senior level, I can't remember the exact number of months; they have certainly accelerated since September 1 with the President's peace initiative. The purpose of these new discussions, I say the new round of discussions at the senior level, have been directly related to the President's peace initiative in two categories, two contexts:

One, the nature of an ultimate association of the West Bank and Gaza with Jordan; and, two, the nature of the Palestinians who would join a Jordanian delegation to join the peace talks.

Now, we believe that on any scale of priorities, and we have made this clear, that the emphasis must be put on what is time urgent, time sensitive, and that is the nature of the delegation. How do you allow King Hussein to join the peace process.

And I would like to say a few comments on this, because it gives me an opportunity to clarify the record, just in case there are misunderstandings or confusions in the minds not of this committee, but in the minds of interested parties on this point.

Our position on the nature of that delegation is based on some very pragmatic considerations.

First, it must be recognized by everyone that if your aim is to get to a peace negotiation in the foreseeable future, then the PLO cannot be at the table because the Israelis won't come.

Second, the Camp David accords which the Secretary describes as appreciating the genius of the drafters with each rereading—and I would agree with this—calls for Jordan to take part in the negotiations together with Egypt and Israel, and that the delegations of either Egypt or Jordan may include Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza, or other Palestinians as mutually agreed.

Clearly there is the formula for representative Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza to join the Jordanian delegation, and let's move on. This is the key issue.

MR. DYMALLY. That would exclude a card-carrying member of the PLO?

MR. VELIOTES. Well, it would exclude—yes, of course, but it is very difficult. That is a definition that is very difficult to arrive at. A member of the PLO is usually someone who, one, says he is, and is identifiable with being in organizations that are clearly identified as PLO, but it is in our view, yes, clearly the people who are elected by the people of the West Bank and Gaza, those who are clearly identified as their representatives in their eyes, who should participate.

Now, this is very important, because there shouldn't be any confusion on these two issues: One, what are the priorities, and the priorities are to come up with a formula which is practical and doable in the near future for Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza to join the Jordanian delegation. And with that formula King Hussein could then announce his willingness to join the negotiations.

The other issues, which I am not saying are not important, the issues of what is the nature of an ultimate association, these are all fine but they are not really time sensitive. Everyone has time for continuing those discussions.

. . . . . .

MR. SMITH. King Hussein has publicly pronounced that there were two communications delivered to him from the President with reference to certain questions of preconditions which he may have opposed or which were being given to them, and I think to some degree he has let more of the cat out of the bag than you were willing to come forward with today.

Do you foresee that even what has been given so far may not be sufficient? It seems to me that he is in an extremely tenuous position. We have not been able to convince him in the 3 years since Camp David to come forward.

We have now imposed an additional burden on him. Why do we consistently believe he is going to come forward no matter what assurances we give him if in all this length of time it has not happened, and in fact does that not stall the Lebanese peace talks in and of themselves?

MR. VELIOTES. I would hope not. On the Lebanese issue I was quite surprised. Mr. Levine, I believe, talked about the problems of linkage. Both of you did. I was quite surprised to see a statement by the Israeli Defense Minister linking the two in the negative sense that you have described.

I mentioned that we were not the only people to talk about policies. I was Ambassador to Jordan. I delivered my credentials the day after Camp David, so let me talk about the atmosphere there at that time. It was very negative from a variety of points of view. There was no chance that King Hussein was going to join or support. The King's attitudes after the President's September 1 initiative are totally different, and I should say the King was supported by a large, probably majority, vast majority of the elements of his own people in not joining Camp David at that time.

I think it was a mistake. I am sorry the King and the Palestinians didn't join, because I think we would have had this problem pretty much behind us by that time. This won't surprise anyone. I bored them with this when I was there, but I think it was a mistake.

And to the extent that we have had a failure in the negotiations, I think the Palestinians, Jordanians, and the Arabs share this lack of success, and we also told them that. But now you have got a new situation, a lot of circumstances have changed. There are differing attitudes, very dramatically different attitudes after the President's initiative, both in Jordan and in the occupied territory.

I think this is terribly important. Again and again major representatives of the Gazans and the West Bankers are stating publicly what they have said privately: We can't miss this opportunity, we can't let it slip, let's get in. This message is being heard in Amman.

It is being heard by the PLO and by the others, and these are the people most immediately concerned. It is a pretty good hunk of people.

Now the King's personal attitudes have changed, and the attitudes of his people have changed, of both communities, the East Jordanian and the Palestinian community. The attitudes of the West Bankers and the Gazans have changed, so I think you do have differing circumstances which could account for optimism that this time we will be able to actually pull it off. I can't absolutely predict this, but I assure you this is what we are working for.

MR. SMITH. Do you have some idea of a date?

MR. VELIOTES. I wouldn't predict the date. I can just tell you that the King himself has publicly used the date of March 1. I am not quite sure what that means, but that happens to be 2 weeks after the scheduled Palestinian National Council meetings. Perhaps it is based on the assumption that the PLO will sort itself out in a positive manner by then. I hope they will. Again, I have to be cautious in predictions.

U.S. Views on Jordan As a Palestinian Homeland

. . . . . .

[13] Source: Department of State Press Release 62A, February 28, 1983. The Secretary made his remarks during a question-and-answer session following his address to the Southern Center for International Studies, at 1 p.m. For text of his address on that occasion, see document 72.

[Q.]. . . "Mr. Shultz, today's New York Times reports on page 1 that Moshe Arens is reported to be saying that Jordan is the Palestinian homeland. [14] Would you comment on that, please?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There are many Palestinians living in Jordan. The point is, however, that there are also many Palestinians living on the West Bank and Gaza; there are also many Palestinians who are homeless and refugees in other countries, notably Lebanon. And it must be true that one of the principal reasons why we have so much difficulty with peace in the Middle East is that we haven't been able to find the answer to the legitimate rights and aspirations of the Palestinian people. We have to address ourselves to that issue; and the President's September 1st Fresh Start Proposal, fully consistent with the Camp David Accords which have tremendous ingenuity and creativity in them; his September first proposal aspires to do that. So without in any way commenting on whatever the context was of that comment, I don't think you can pass off the Palestinian issue with a statement about the Palestinians and Jordan. The problem is deeper and bigger than that.

The Settlements Issue

. . . . . .

Q. Would you care to comment on the column of Evans and Novak today? [16]

A. On what aspect?

Q. Well, the Israeli officials soliciting and trying to sell land on the West Bank to American Jews, in direct opposition to President Reagan's proposals.

A. Our position is that, who is buying the land on the West Bank is not the primary issue. We have, on a number of occasions, stated publicly that the continuation of settlement activity is a major obstacle in the way of broadened negotiations. Let me recall for you the President's own words in his September 1 speech when he said, "The immediate adoption of a settlement freeze by Israel more than any other action, could create the confidence needed for wider participation in these talks. Further settlement activity is in no way necessary for the security of Israel, and only diminishes the confidence of the Arabs that a final outcome can be freely and fairly negotiated." That's the end of the President's quotation.

Our feeling is that direct negotiations, based on U.N. Security Council Resolution 242, which is the basis of the Camp David Accords, have been the goal to which all of our efforts have been addressed since the President announced his Fresh Start on September 1.

If Jordan publicly announces its willingness to enter such negotiations, we are determined to do our best to assure that the results of those negotiations are not prejudiced from the outset by activities of any party which reduce the prospects of a negotiated peace.

Q. Including settlements? Activities including settlements?

A. Yes.

Q. What would you contemplate doing?

A. I don't think we're going to spell it out; I think we're going to leave you with these words and our intention. I think it would not be appropriate at this time to indicate how we will go about that.

U.S. Reaction to Events in Jordan

Q. Mr. President, what hopes now for peace in the Middle East since King Hussein says he will not take part on behalf of the PLO?

THE PRESIDENT. Let me just say a few words about that. Some radical elements of the PLO have introduced some changes in the proposals that have been made and the policy that we've been trying to follow with regard to Middle East peace. Those changes are unacceptable to King Hussein; they are unacceptable to King Fahd; they are unacceptable to me. And I have been in touch with King Fahd and King Hussein and am going to be in touch with other Arab leaders about this.

We feel that the changes that were suggested would impede the efforts that we've been making toward negotiated peace in the Middle East—peace for Israel, peace for all of the countries there. And as I say, we are in agreement. I won't take any of your questions now, because I still have other Arab leaders that I'm going to be in touch with regarding this.

. . . . . .

Q. Are you still hopeful that somehow King Hussein will join the talks—[inaudible].

THE PRESIDENT. Oh, we're all very hopeful, because as I say, we're all in agreement about these other proposals that have been made. And I have their assurance that they want to proceed with what we've been doing. We've made great progress so far, and King Hussein has made great progress.

Q. When did you talk to him, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. Today.

Q. Aren't you disappointed by the statement that came out today, though?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, yes, of course. It is, as I say, it's an impediment in our search for peace. And that is our goal—peace for the Middle East, peace for Israel, peace for the Arab nations in that troubled area.

Q. Who were the radical elements—

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I can't—as I said, that's why I can't take any questions, because I can't deal in specifics while I still have other heads of state that I want to communicate with.

Q. What about the assassination of the moderate PLO leader today? [18]

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think that's always a tragedy—something of that kind. And it's indicative of the kind of violence we're trying to eradicate.

U.S. Determination To Continue the Peace Process

ROBERT SCHIEFFER. Well, Mr. Secretary, the questions are obvious: what's next? Do you start over? Is the Reagan Peace Plan dead? Where do you go from here?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I think the key point to remember is that the President is determined to see this peace process through. We knew all along that it's a tough, difficult, long painstaking process. In his discussions yesterday with Arab leaders, he found that just as he rejected changes made by the PLO in the plan that had been worked out with King Hussein, so did King Hussein, so did King Fahd; and he remains determined and we'll continue to work on this.

MR. SCHIEFFER. Well, were you convinced last week that they were very close to an agreement, that the King was very close to coming into these talks?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. They were very close and they had the basis for doing that and I think it remains today very important that we continue to strive for peace. That's the thing that is needed in the Middle East as elsewhere in the world.

MR. SCHIEFFER. Well, what happened? Where was the hang-up?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. What happened was Mr. Arafat took what he and King Hussein had agreed on to a meeting of others in the PLO and they put in some changes that are unacceptable to King Hussein and to the President, to King Fahd and others and would I'm sure be an unacceptable basis for entering the peace talks with Israel. Israel wouldn't sit down under those circumstances and I don't blame them.

MR. SCHIEFFER. Can you tell us what the changes were?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Basically it was back to the notion that the PLO had to be at the bargaining table and we were back to the independent Palestinian state and those things that people have talked about. But I think it is necessary to have Palestinian representation in the peace talks but not official members of the PLO.

. . . . . .

MR. SCHIEFFER. Mr. Secretary, how do you say to Prime Minister Begin now that the Arab world is ready to accept Israel's right to exist when King Hussein won't come to the bargaining table?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. King Hussein accepts Israel's right to exist. There isn't any doubt about that. And King Hussein wants to enter the peace process but under the right conditions. And the right conditions are that there be support and recognition that he is genuinely able to negotiate for the Palestinians on the West Bank and elsewhere. And that's what he needs and I think in the end he's going to get it.

Perspective on the Peace Process

Events over the weekend have demonstrated once again that, as Secretary of State Shultz said this morning, obtaining peace in the Middle East is a "tough, difficult . . . painstaking process." [21]

As you know, King Hussein of Jordan and Yasser Arafat arrived at an understanding on the King's entry into the peace process. Radical elements within the PLO then imposed amendments that were not acceptable to King Hussein, not acceptable to Fahd of Saudi Arabia, and not acceptable to us. King Hussein rejected those amendments because they provided no basis for Jordanian or Israeli entry into the negotiations. But King Hussein did not reject the President's September 1 peace initiative. He remains committed to the search for peace in the Middle East. That is what he told President Reagan in their phone conversation yesterday. The King asked us to proceed with that initiative. We intend to do precisely that.

The search for peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors has been one of the foremost preoccupations of American foreign policy since World War II. From the debates over the partition of Palestine, [22] through the tenuous early years of Israel's existence, to the first glimmerings of peace nearly a decade ago, the Middle East conflict has absorbed the energies of eight United States Presidents and ten Secretaries of State.

The reasons for this continuous involvement in a problem halfway around the world are both moral and strategic.

—We Americans have a moral commitment to the security and well-being of the State of Israel.

—We have a parallel concern for our relations with our many friends in the Arab world.

—We need to preserve free access for the West to the strategic resources, markets and waterways of the Persian Gulf.

—We need to ensure that unchecked local conflicts do not spread to surrounding areas and lead to a dangerous confrontation between the superpowers.

Resolution of the Arab–Israel conflict will by no means guarantee our interests in the region or establish an era of tranquility and stability. The sources of conflict transcend the Arab–Israel problem. The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the Iran–Iraq war are testimony to this fact. Nevertheless, the Arab-Israel problem pits our friends against one another. Both sides look to the United States as the sole external power capable of helping them find an equitable solution.

After 35 years, peace still eludes the peoples of the Middle East. They have endured five major wars and numerous smaller conflicts. The wounds of the last conflict are still evident in Lebanon. With the exception of Egypt and Lebanon, the Arab States still have not come forward to negotiate their differences with Israel. Israel still must devote a higher percentage of its resources to defending its existence than any other country on Earth. And radicals in the PLO still retreat into the path of rejection and underscore this with violent acts: witness the weekend assassination of a PLO moderate in Portugal.

And yet the Middle East of today is vastly different from that of 1948 or 1967—or even of June 1982. Many fissures remain to be bridged. But Israel and its neighbors, thanks to unflagging American dedication, are closer to reconciliation today than at any time in Israel's history.

For the first two decades of Israel's existence, it was hemmed in on all sides. Its very existence was rejected by all its Arab neighbors. It had nothing with which to bargain for peace. Then the Six-Day War was forced on Israel by the imminent threat of unprovoked aggression. That war left Israel in occupation of Arab territory on three of its borders. It left the Arabs with a new reality to face. Seizing upon this new reality, the United Nations Security Council hammered out the formula of "territory for peace" enshrined in Resolution 242. That principle remains the basis for all our peacemaking efforts.

The euphoria of victory on one side, and the shame of defeat on the other, left a legacy of bitterness. That legacy produced not peace treaties but the three

Arab "noes" of Khartoum: no negotiation, no recognition, no peace with Israel. [23]

It was not until the fourth Arab-Israeli conflict in 1973 that the futility of war as a solution to the Middle East problem finally began to sink in. In Israel, the surprise attack and narrow brush with disaster demonstrated to many that in the absence of negotiated peace treaties, military superiority is no guarantee of peace and security. For Egypt, the lesson was that while Israel could be wounded, it could not be overcome by military force. Grievances would have to be resolved by negotiations. There followed a series of disengagement agreements, [24] President Sadat's historic trip to Jerusalem, [25] the Camp David Accords, and finally the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty.

Camp David offered a new approach to the Arab-Israeli problem. It combined resolution of bilateral problems between Egypt and Israel with a binding commitment to negotiate a comprehensive settlement. The first stage of the process has worked better than some expected. As long as Israel remains in conflict with the other Arab States, some tension between Egypt and Israel is inevitable. But the recent passage of the Egyptian-Israeli treaty's fourth anniversary almost without notice is a tribute to the extent to which peaceful relations are now taken for granted.

The second phase of the Camp David process—negotiations to establish transitional arrangements in the West Bank and Gaza prior to full peace—has not fared so well. The problems involved—legal, political, military and emotional—are more complex than the bilateral issues worked out between Egypt and Israel. But even these problems could have been well on their way to resolution had the Palestinians taken up the challenge of seeking a peaceful resolution of the conflict. We should remember that the failure to realize the early promise of Resolution 242 led ultimately to the 1973 war. Similarly, the inability to show substantial progress on the Palestinian problem since 1979 was a contributing factor to the buildup of tensions in Lebanon and the outbreak of war there last June.

The analogy is not an altogether unhappy one, however. The 1973 war led to a negotiating process that culminated in President Sadat's eloquent call from the rostrum of Israel's Knesset: "The October War should be the last war." In short order there were face-to-face negotiations, peace, and normalization of relations between Egypt and Israel. Likewise, the war in Lebanon has resulted in face-to-face negotiations between Israel and Lebanon. Those negotiations must lead ultimately to permanent peace along their frontier, and can lend momentum to the search for a broader peace.

The Lebanon war and its aftermath have highlighted again the unique and indispensable role of the United States as the catalyst for peace in the Middle East. Only the United States has enough of the trust of all sides, the moral authority and the material resources necessary to mediate successfully between Israelis and Arabs.

America's success in negotiating an end to the active hostilities in Lebanon last summer provided the context for President Reagan's historic peace initiative last September. The stage for this initiative was initially set at Camp David. But the Camp David agreement, as its formal title clearly states, is only a "framework for peace," not a blueprint. It set out the basic principles and guidelines along which a future solution to the Palestinian problem could be built. But uncertainty as to where the United States stood on the basic issues in the negotiations greatly impeded our efforts to broaden the negotiations to Jordanian and Palestinian representatives as envisaged at Camp David. Without their participation and endorsement, no agreement about the West Bank and Gaza, transitional or final, could have any moral or practical authority. It was to reduce that ambiguity and encourage wider support for the peace process that the September 1 initiative was launched.

The President's initiative is balanced and fair. It rejects the extreme positions of both parties. It is designed to bring about a just and lasting peace that will both recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and, at the same time, assure the security of Israel. Those goals are not incompatible. Indeed, neither can be truly achieved in the absence of the other.

Let me review the seven essential points of the President's September 1st initiative.

First. "We base our approach squarely on the principle that the Arab-Israeli conflict should be resolved through negotiations involving an exchange of territory for peace. This exchange is enshrined in U.N. Security Council Resolution 242 . . . ";

Second. "The United States will not approve any proposal . . . that threatens the security of Israel. America's commitment to the security of Israel is ironclad";

Third. "The United States will not support the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, and we will not support annexation or permanent control by Israel";

Fourth. "There must be a period of time during which the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza will have full autonomy over their own affairs. . . . The purpose of the 5-year period . . . is the peaceful transition and orderly transfer of authority from Israel to the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza";

Fifth. "The United States will not support the use of any additional land for the purpose of settlements during the transition period. . . . Further settlement activity is in no way necessary for the security of Israel. . . . ";

Sixth. "Self-government by the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza in association with Jordan offers the best chance for a durable, just and lasting peace"; and Seventh. "Jerusalem must remain undivided, but its final status should be decided through negotiations" in the context of an overall Middle East settlement.

It is important to keep in mind that this initiative is not a "plan" to be imposed on the parties. Rather, the President has put forward a balanced set of positions that the United States is prepared to support in the course of negotiations. Let me underscore at this point something we have been making clear in all of our consultations. Because our positions are balanced, because they are fair, because they can point the way to a just solution, the President is committed to them as they are. They will not be changed. Those who seek a different solution must seek it at the negotiating table.

At the same time, we have pointed out to all parties that we cannot guarantee the outcome of the negotiating process on any specific issues. The negotiations, if they are to be successful, must be free to move in productive directions that cannot be foreseen in advance. Indeed, as the President said on September 1, once negotiations are joined we will support positions that seem to us fair and reasonable compromises and likely to promote a sound agreement. Both Israel and the Arab States thus have a major opportunity to shape the outcome of these negotiations, but the opportunity must be used creatively and soon.

We will not be sidetracked by the events of this weekend. We should not underestimate the importance of what has been achieved. A year ago significant elements in the Middle East still harbored the illusion that the Arab-Israeli dispute could be resolved by military means. Today Arab leaders are talking about how—not whether—to make peace with Israel.

We have witnessed in recent weeks the most intensive debate in Arab councils in 35 years as some Arab leaders seek a way out of the self-defeating cycle of violence which has brought so much misery to their peoples. We have lent our encouragement and vouchsafed our support for courageous decisions by Arab leaders.

King Hussein has already taken the lead in recognizing the opportunity afforded by the President's initiative for revitalizing the peace process. The radicals have given one answer. But the President's initiative is still alive and on the table. We will not permit radical elements to exercise a veto over the peace process. Rather, we will encourage the Palestinians to recognize that this is a unique moment which must be seized before it is lost.

The Arab debate is not over. The opportunity still exists for reason and realism to prevail. It is only at the negotiating table that a solution to the Palestinian problem in all its aspects can be found. And in our view, the best means for accomplishing that goal is President Reagan's initiative, based as it is on U.N. Security Council Resolution 242, which in turn is the bedrock foundation of the Camp David Framework.

We are living today in one of the truly critical moments in the history of the Middle East. A conflict which remained frozen for almost two decades has been yielding—slowly, painfully, but steadily over the last 15 years—to the forces of reason and realism. After five wars, the Arab world faces a challenge it has repeatedly evaded: to achieve Palestinian rights through negotiations now that those rights are clearly unattainable through violence. This opportunity may not come again.

The moment to decide is now. In the absence of a courageous Arab decision to join the peace process now, expansion of Israeli settlements on the West Bank could in the not-too-distant future render any such decision virtually irrelevant.

Arab governments still have an opportunity today to put the Arab–Israel conflict behind them. Only in this way will they be positioned to face the multiple threats in the region which challenge their very survival. Only a forthright commitment by Jordan and representatives of the Palestinians to face-to-face negotiations can achieve this end.

If the Arabs decide wisely and soon, then it will be Israel's turn to face a historic challenge. It can choose the semblance of security that comes with control over an increasingly embittered Palestinian population. Or, it can choose the real security that can only come with peace. I have little doubt that, when faced for the first time with a genuine choice between territory and peace, the people of Israel will choose peace.

Next Steps in the Peace Process

JIM ANDERSON, UPI. Good afternoon, Mr. Secretary. In the Middle East, where does the United States go from here and, specifically, are you personally prepared to play a more direct role in the wider peace process?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The United States has been playing a very strong and direct role. The President's initiative of September 1 was and remains an historic opportunity for peace in the region. Those proposals remain on the table. Of course, we will continue to support them. They deserve support, and they'll get it not only from us but from others in the area.

Q. Will you be doing anything to engender such support, personally?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think that the main point is that the proposals are responsive to the needs of the region. There is no question about the fact that the events of last weekend were a disappointment and are a disappointment, particularly so since it seemed that King Hussein had managed, after a great deal of work and effort and patience on his part, to create conditions under which he could enter the peace process. Then word was received out of the meeting of the PLO in Kuwait that conditions were put forward that were unacceptable to King Hussein.

We agree with King Hussein in rejecting those proposals. At the same time, everybody has to take a look at the situation and say, what is the alternative. Almost as if by punctuation, we had the murder of a moderate Palestinian in Portugal over the weekend. What is the message? That was a murder of a Palestinian, apparently by Palestinians, but it certainly doesn't do anything for the Palestinian people.

I think if there is genuine concern about the legitimate aspirations of these people, then there ought to be some thought given to their needs. This is what the President's plan does.

I might point out that directly in the Camp David Accords, it speaks of the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian people and calls upon King Hussein and representatives of the Palestinians to come and talk with Israel about peace. This is the right course of action; it remains the right course of action.

The approach of violence, which seems to have been the approach for many years now and which has had the effect of devastating Lebanon and causing untold losses of lives and injuries, that's bankrupt.

I think it's about time everyone took stock and said that the road to peace, and road to well-being for human beings is the road of negotiation. The prospect for negotiation is best through the use of the President's proposals which fall squarely within the framework of Resolution 242 and the Camp David Accords.

Q. Is it realistic to expect that King Hussein could enter peace talks without PLO approval, and are we encouraging them to do that?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. King Hussein has to take his own counsel, and I think that it is most beneficial when King Hussein enters the peace process, if he does, that he do so with support from his brothers in the Arab world because that will have the effect of making any settlement that might be reached much more meaningful. Of course, I think we also have to remember that when you're talking about the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and the people who live there predominantely, they're Palestinians. So you're negotiating for Palestinians.

I think it's the case in any kind of a negotiation, people are not going to accept something that they don't have a part in so they want to be represented. So I'm sure that in any such negotiation King Hussein will want company.

Q. Mr. Secretary, are you not, in fact, now appealing to more moderate Palestinians to come forward and join King Hussein and enter the negotiations despite what any radical element within the PLO may feel?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We've always tried to appeal to the good sense of moderates, and continue to do that.

Q. Mr. Secretary, Phil Habib is now sitting in on the tripartite talks. Will you now consider another move, namely, a trip to the Middle East yourself to get things moving?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't have any current plan to go to the Middle East. Certainly, whenever the President decides that it might be useful, I'm ready to go, but there's no current plan to go there.

Q. After reading the statement of King Hussein, what other information do you have that would contradict the very final statement that Jordan will not join the peace process by consent or renew it with any other party?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't have any additional information, and I'm not asserting here that King Hussein is about to join the peace process or anything of that kind. I didn't make that comment. In response to a question about would he come in by himself, I tried to make clear that it seemed to me he would want to be accompanied by Palestinians if he were to decide to do that at some point.

Q. Mr. Secretary, has the PLO done itself damage by its negative response?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I certainly think so.

Q. How so?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It has clearly been the party that has, at least temporarily, frustrated what is a most promising opportunity for peace with justice and security in the Middle East. It seems to me it must become more and more apparent that such a frustration, accompanied as it was by this violent act, all too typical, does not provide any answer for the aspirations of the human beings called Palestinians who are living there and trying to make their way in the world.

Q. A number of Arabs, including some moderate ones have claimed, in the wake of the King's decision, that the United States had shown no ability to influence the Israelis, either in Lebanon or on the question of settlements in the occupied terrorities.

Do you think it would be fruitful now to increase American pressure on Israel on either of those fronts?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No. I think that, as from the beginning, the key to peace is that itself. That is the incentive that has to drive people.

As far as Lebanon is concerned, in getting a settlement in Lebanon, I think that a great deal of headway has been made. For there to be a genuine settlement, it has to be something that the Israelis and the Lebanese feel are in their interests, and the questions are difficult ones.

We are all impatient. I know some of my colleagues in Israel that I've talked to are impatient. Everybody would like to get this negotiation completed. On the other hand, you're talking about matters of great importance and difficulty, so you want to get them right.

I think the pressure of the desire to work something out is very important there, and I don't think the way to go about it is with additional arm-twisting of one kind or another.

Q. Mr. Secretary, as you know, there is a school of thought that says that a lot of the moderate Arab States, in a diplomatic sense anyway, are being held hostage by radical elements in the PLO, and that even the United States in its efforts is, to an extent, also hostage to these same radical elements.

Is there, in your current calculations, some way of getting out of this presumed "trap?"

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It is a "trap"—if it is a "trap"—that was created by the decision of the Arab League to place on the PLO the mantle of negotiator for the Palestinian people. It's that decision, basically, that King Hussein refers to when he looks for support in his efforts to enter the peace process.

That stands there. On the other hand, I wonder if it isn't going to become apparent to people that when you seem to give such power to a radical group, you've made a mistake. At any rate, from our standpoint, we will continue to advocate the peace process; we will continue to stress the importance of the security needs of Israel; we will continue to stress the fact that if there is to be peace, it must be achieved by members of the Arab community with representation for Palestinians sitting down with Israel, with Egypt, and with ourselves in the peace process, and working it out. We will continue to emphasize that for this to be successful, it has to meet the legitimate needs of the Palestinian people.

I think that's good, high ground to stand on. That's where we're going to stand, and we're going to invite others to come and join us there.

Q. Mr. Secretary, is that the same thing as urging moderate Arabs, then, to look back once again to the Rabat decision of 1974, urge them to reconsider the validity of that?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, they'll have to compose themselves and see how they want to proceed. It's up to them to decide how they wish to do that.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, could I take you back to the Middle East, please? You say that the President's proposals are on the table. Can you in any way be forthcoming—

SECRETARY SHULTZ. They're on top of the hill. That's where they are. On the high ground. They're on the high ground.

Q. Can you in any way be forthcoming in a specific way as to what is being done to pump some life into the President's plan? For example, any thought of an invitation to Hussein to Washington? A resumption of Camp David type of get-together?

And, finally, when you talked earlier about the Rabat decision to empower the PLO to be the sole mandate for the Palestinians as being a mistake, is there in that a suggestion that you think it would further the cause of peace if that power were stripped from the PLO?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think what is needed is for it to be exercised constructively. There's a saying around here, "Use it or lose it." I think that if people have the ability to do something or other, then they ought to measure up to those responsibilities, and they aren't doing so. That's the main point.

As far as actions are concerned, it's always fun to travel. Maybe not so much fun as to have conferences. But it isn't necessarily so that action of that kind necessarily brings progress; sometimes it does and sometimes it doesn't. I don't think that we ought to equate constructive efforts with visible moves of some kind. In fact, it may be that the best thing we can do right now is to keep quiet for awhile.

Q. Mr. Secretary, is there any evidence the PLO is considering military action?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There are elements of the PLO that claim credit, if that's the right word for it, for the murder of the Palestinian in Portugal. So whether what has been decided is a decision to go the route of violence rather than the route of peace and negotiation, I don't know. But if that is the decision, I think it is a bad decision, a bankrupt decision, a return to something that has only led to tragedy.

Q. Mr. Secretary, could you describe for us the position of Saudi Arabia at this time? The Spokesman said yesterday that King Fahd was willing to cooperate in furthering the ends of the Reagan proposal.

Do the Saudi Arabians support the Reagan proposal now?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The Saudi Arabians have been in touch with us closely throughout this whole process and have been basically supportive. As the President said when he spoke on the subject on Sunday, the Saudi Arabians were as emphatic to him in their rejection of these changes as King Hussein was and as we felt ourselves.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, the President said today that the Palestinian leadership should take bold and courageous action to try to get this plan moving again.

All signs from the Middle East, not only now but in recent years, have been that with the exception of Sadat, nobody is going to take any bold and courageous action for the Palestinians on the West Bank.

If nothing happens, what will happen?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. They have not had a happy lot, the Palestinians on the West Bank. There are many who profess to feel deeply about that fact and want to see that lot improved, and there are ways to do it. I think the principal operative way that is available is through the President's plan—which I've said is perfectly consistent with 242 and the Camp David Accords. There it is. It's a method through which the lot of the Palestinians can be improved. If you're interested in that, then there's a way. We think that perhaps people will in the end come around to that.

King Hussein and the Peace Process

Q. First on the September 1 peace plan, is it dead as people keep writing and saying outside of government?

A. I don't think so. It seems to me that the desire, the need for peace is not dead. It's very much alive. There's a yearning for it. Every event that happens only emphasizes its importance, and, if that's your premise, then somewhere along the line you have to find your way to the parties in the region sitting down together and talking about it. That's the essence of the President's plan, the essence of the Camp David accords.

Within that framework you have to find your way to secure arrangements for Israel and some manner of recognizing the legitimate needs and aspirations of the Palestinian people. The President's plan does those things, and I think, therefore, that it must carry on. We expect to keep working on it.

[27] Source: Department of State Bulletin, June 1983, pp. 62–64. Secretary Shultz was interviewed by Meg Greenfield, editor of the editorial page of the Washington Post. The transcript of the interview was first published in the Washington Post, April 24, 1983, p. C8. Omitted is the portion of the interview on Lebanon.

Q. How do you get King Hussein to join in the talks, after he has said he can't?

A. Obviously, it isn't easy, and there are plenty of problems. However, I think that we'll continue to work at all aspects of the problems. It does seem to me that there's a certain shock that has taken hold, as I read the cables from the various Arab capitals, in which people are saying to themselves, "Are we really going to pass this up? Maybe we can't afford to do that." I think it's well for them to talk among themselves and see if they aren't missing the boat.

Q. Do you think that Hussein would have made the statement he made if the Israelis and Lebanese had been able to work out a plan, an agreement, for the evacuation of Israeli troops? Do you think Lebanon is one of the principal problems for Hussein?

A. It's hard to say. It's something that's really impossible to make a categorical statement about. But I do have the distinct feeling that King Hussein was ready to enter the peace process with the right kind of Palestinian delegation, and that at one point—the weekend before last I guess it was—he had the kind of arrangement with Mr. Arafat that would have permitted him to do that—permitted him in the sense that he wouldn't have been undercut by Palestinians or his fellow Arabs.

If that's the case, then he was ready to go under the conditions that existed then, but the PLO wouldn't accept that agreement, and that's what brought about these statements.

Q. What agreement do you mean, between the—

A. It can't be called an agreement because it didn't finally hold, but, as I understand it, King Hussein and Mr. Arafat worked out an understanding of conditions that were acceptable to King Hussein and seemed to be reasonable, whereby King Hussein would enter the peace process or make a statement that he was ready to do that, and that he would have a Palestinian delegation that consisted of legitimate Palestinian people who could claim to be genuinely representative, but who were not members of the PLO.

Q. It was reported in the Wall Street Journal—Karen House's article [28]—that President Reagan had assured the King that he wouldn't press him to join the talks until the Israelis had agreed to freeze the settlements. Is that the case, and is that still part of the problem, if it is?

A. I don't think it was part of the problem of the King's announcement, because in the President's September 1 speech, he said that it was his view that there should be a freeze on settlement activity. We have consistently continued to emphasize the importance of that because, after all, you're talking about a negotiation dealing with an area, and, if the area is being changed while you are in the process of negotiating or considering negotiating, it's tough to make that negotiation as meaningful as it otherwise might be.

The President has always had that position. What he said to King Hussein was that he would continue to advocate that position, but if the King announces his readiness to enter the peace process, then we would press harder on the settlement activity. We'd have something to press with, so to speak, when you say to the Israelis, "Why don't you slow down or freeze the settlement activity so that we can have another Arab leader at the bargaining table?" They say, "Well, show me one."

If we were able to have this commitment, then it might be more reasonable to talk about this matter, and more effective. The King was told that we wouldn't press him to enter negotiations until something had been obtained. He might have decided to enter and make that his first point of discussion.

King Hussein was assured basically that the President would continue to maintain the position in the September 1 initiative, and we have told everybody that continuously—every Arab government that has tried to change the President's position, and, for that matter, Israeli questions about it. The President has maintained a steadfast position there, and fundamentally that's what he assured King Hussein he would do.

[28] Karen E. House, "Hussein's Decision," Wall Street Journal, April 14, 1983, pp. 1 and 16; and April 15, 1983, pp. 1 and 19.

But I think there is a distinction here between a situation where there is no expressed willingness on the part of King Hussein or other Arab leaders to enter the peace process while there is still settlement activity, and a different situation where King Hussein says, "I'm ready to sit down and negotiate about these, and I've committed myself to do that, but before I actually sit down, I think there ought to be some action on this." Those are two different situations.

What the President said was, "If you enter the negotiation, say you're ready to enter the negotiation, I will not press you to actually sit down at the bargaining table unless we can find some form of freeze."

Of course, King Hussein might decide to sit down anyway and say, "The first thing I want to talk about is a settlement freeze." But we haven't gotten to that point.

Q. Is there anything that you expect you could get from the Israelis that King Hussein could in turn use to get the PLO back into this action in terms of either Lebanon or settlements?

A. I think the PLO people have to make up their own minds, and I don't think that we should be worrying about thinking of additional things to induce them to change their behavior. The President has put a very forthcoming and imaginative program on the table which, when read with the full Camp David accords, the processes and commitments in them, give, I should think, a great sense of hope to Palestinian people, particularly those living in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. So that's enough.

I think that particularly people who aspire to lead a group like Palestinian people in the Middle East, and to represent the interests of those people as human beings, have to come forward at some stage of the game and influence their thinking.

Q. I believe you said at some point in your press conference that the PLO had forfeited its mandate to speak for the Palestinians. Who would be the Palestinians who could come forward in their place? Would they be West Bank Palestinians? How could that be brought about?

A. I've forgotten precisely what the words were that I used. I don't think I said "forfeited," but I did say if they are given leadership of a group and there's an opportunity for something constructive and they don't do it, it certainly calls into question whether or not they should continue to have that leadership.

I think that that's true. I used the words, "Use it or lose it." What other form of Palestinian representation there may be remains to be seen, but there are all sorts of possibilities.

Q. To bring in possibly West Bank officials or some other Palestinians, how would this be done or in what forum?

A. I have some ideas, but I think that it's critical to find the ideas that the Arabs will be comfortable with. Right now I think it's up to them to find those ideas and to find a way into this peace process.

. . . . . .

Q. On the settlements, and the idea of the freeze on the settlements, there doesn't seem to be any progress from our point of view, does there, toward that?

A. I can't see any, no.

Q. What can we do to encourage progress, or what leverage do we have?

A. I continue to feel that the great leverage involved is the leverage of potential peace. I felt that all along, and I felt that for years as I visited around in the area. It was that magical possibility that turned people on so much when President Sadat made his bold move.

I think that is the basic ingredient and at the same time it's hard to exercise that ingredient until there is a visible willingness on the part of the Arab world personified by somebody, some country, to say I am ready to sit down and discuss peace with Israel.

King Hussein wants to do that. He has told us that, and he said so publicly. But he needs to have support in the Arab world to do so and to do so effectively.

Q. How do you account for Mr. Arafat's apparent change of mind, the collapse of the arrangement between him and the King?

A. I read all sorts of things about the PLO, but I don't have an answer for that question. I could speculate about it, but it wouldn't be particularly useful.

The basic fact is that there was a very reasonable proposition in front of him that could and eventually will result in a better life for Palestinians. Somehow in the processes of the organization called the PLO, they were not able to affirm that proposition. It's too bad. Why, exactly, I don't know.

Q. Do you read the bombing of the Embassy in Beirut as having had any impact on the larger policies in the area, in terms of this settlement?

A. If anything, it makes us more determined. I suppose it raises the consciousness of everybody about the genuine security concerns that you must have in that area, although I think the bombing of an embassy or a building somewhere is something that could happen anywhere in the world. We've had lots of bomb scares around buildings in San Francisco. Actual bombs go off in lots of buildings in this country. It's a tragic affair, and it highlights these concerns. When you talk about the President, I think it makes him even more determined to press on and try to bring about a more peaceful environment.

I do think that there will be a genuinely more peaceful environment in Lebanon when the foreign forces leave because there are elements in the forces in the Syrian sector, PLO and Iranian elements, that are actively disrupting. When they leave the country, there will be a better control over the situation.

Q. Is it your analysis or understanding that the Iranian group that claimed responsibility for this was, in fact, the one who did it?

A. I am not aware that there is a smoking gun, so to speak, that has been identified. A group has claimed the credit, and the fact that they would use a word like that for the event is a commentary on them. But, at any rate, there are various other bits and pieces of circumstantial evidence that point in that direction, but there is no real hard proof.

Q. Talk a bit, if you will, about how you hope to get things up on your trip, get things going again on the September 1 peace plan; what you hope to do.

A. I've been involved in lots of negotiations over a period of time. I just sort of get into them and try to see what seems reasonable and talk to people. That is about what I will do.

First, our emphasis will be in the trip on the Israeli-Lebanon negotiations in trying to get that settled, or as close to settlement as possible. Following that, of course, to follow on, if we have the opportunity, to get the conditions for Syria and PLO and other withdrawals as well.

At the same time, we will be working on the peace process but starting with the Camp David partners, so my first stop will be in Cairo. We will talk with the Egyptians, and we plan to have a meeting there of the ambassadors from the key countries involved. We'll have a good amount of time with them.

They're an extremely able group, very well informed. I expect to learn something from the discussions, and perhaps they'll all learn something from the interaction involved. Phil Habib will be there and Morrie Draper as well. We will sort of make our initial plan and go on from there to Israel and Lebanon.

I hope that as the time goes on I'll have an opportunity to visit Amman and Riyadh, but I think we have to concentrate first on—

Q. On this trip?

A. We have to concentrate first on the Camp David partners and on the Israeli-Lebanon arena. Of course, that also leads to Syria. And if we have something to talk with Syria about, namely, an agreement between Israel and Lebanon for Israeli withdrawal—

Q. You would go to Syria?

A. Then, we naturally want to take the next step and arrange for Syrian withdrawal. I think the way for me to think about this now is that I'm going to go to Cairo, and I'm going to talk to the Lebanese and the Israelis, and we are interested in the evacuation of Lebanon. And, of course, we're interested in the peace process, but we'll start that way and we'll see how it unfolds and try to do sensible things as we go along.

Q. Do you intend to go to Jordan, or is that also contingent?

A. I would certainly hope very much to have a chance to visit with King Hussein and King Fahd as well as Mr. Assad. But I think the priority has to be on getting the Lebanon situation straightened out.

Q. Are there any Palestinian, official or unofficial, leaders that you expect to be talking with?

A. No, I certainly have no plan to meet with anyone from the PLO, if that is what you're getting at.

Q. Informal meetings in the lobbies of hotels?

A. No meetings.

Q. There is a view that the Israelis, by being difficult about withdrawing from Lebanon or taking time and making more settlements in the West Bank, can in fact, prevent a peace plan that they find uncomfortable from getting anywhere. Do you have a thought about that?

A. I've heard that said a lot and read it in the papers. Against that you have to put the fact that a great deal of progress has been made in the negotiations with Lebanon. I personally have no doubt that the Israelis want to withdraw from Lebanon under the right circumstances. It's not that easy to find the right circumstances. It has certainly taken a lot longer than we expected or would like. But, nevertheless, I think that it's possible and doable. That's one side of the equation.

On the settlements, I think it's a very important issue. It cuts in both directions. I know that the Israelis feel strongly that there was a time, before they were the occupying force, when the Jews were not welcomed to live in the West Bank, and so the settlements make a point.

I might note that in the President's plan it's very explicit that if the settlers want to stay in their settlement, they stay, but they would live under the jurisdiction of whatever is the jurisdiction of that territory. In the President's plan, it's perfectly consistent with Jews living in the West Bank.

Middle East: Negotiation and Reconciliation

As you know, I've been out of the country for a few weeks. It's great to be home.

The Middle East has been the focus of almost constant American diplomatic efforts for more than a decade now. I don't have to educate this group in the reasons why the Middle East is so important to the United States. It is a region of vital economic importance and strategic location; we have many friendships and relationships in the area, including a deep moral commitment to Israel and many friendships and ties with moderate Arab countries. And the United States is in a unique position to promote progress in the great task of reconciliation between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

This last point is worth emphasizing. Sometimes foreign policy seems a frustrating endeavor; we have so many problems on our plate, and some Americans must wonder whether our global exertions are worthwhile. They should have been with me in the Middle East! In the Middle East we see the remarkable phenomenon of Arabs and Israelis, locked in conflict for generations, looking to the United States as the one great power able to help them find a way out. Both sides trust our fairness; they respect our good faith, and they find reassurance in our participation as they face the risks and challenges of peace. Even those who disagree with us on many issues want us involved as a counterbalance to others whose motives are more suspect.

This special trust in the United States is the main reason for the success we have had. I found it deeply moving to travel in the Middle East and see the admiration for America and the faith in America that peoples and governments in the Middle [29] Source: Department of State Press Release 184, May 13, 1983; also printed in Department of State Bulletin, July 1983, pp. 55–57. For the omitted portion of Secretary Shultz's speech, concerning Lebanon, see document 356.

East show so openly. They know that the United States is not only strong but just, not only powerful but fair. It is an extraordinary tribute to this country—it is a tribute to the basic decency and generosity and goodness of the American people. I can tell you I was very proud to be there as Secretary of State of the United States of America.

Let me say a little about my trip to the Middle East, [30] and about the negotiation that was just concluded last week between Israel and Lebanon.

By a symbolic coincidence, my trip began in Egypt at the time of the first anniversary of the final return of the Sinai to Egypt under the terms of the peace treaty with Israel. There is a lesson in this symbolism, which I emphasized over and over again: Egypt recovered its sovereign territory through a negotiation with Israel. The process of negotiation worked, in a way that violence or rejectionism did not and could not work. Egypt and Israel together vindicated the principle of solving problems through peaceful means. It is a cardinal principle of a decent world order, and the success of that process is an instructive example for others.

It is, of course, the principle that we are striving now to vindicate again in Lebanon.

Let me say a few words, finally, about our broader objectives of Middle East peace. Last September 1, President Reagan made a major proposal to bring Jordan and the Palestinians into direct negotiations with Israel to decide the future of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. It is a fair and balanced proposal, which has its roots in the Camp David Accords and UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which have been the bases of all our peace diplomacy in the Middle East over the last 15 years. It derives as well from the tragedy of Lebanon, as a signal of our determination to address one of the underlying problems of the Arab-Israeli conflict which had had its spillover effect on Lebanon.

I am pleased to be able to tell you, after my trip to the Middle East, that our friends in the Arab world are still supportive of President Reagan's initiative and are actively working to put together a positive Arab response. In our view, Arab support for King Hussein to step forward as interlocutor on the Palestinian question would create the best possibility for a fruitful negotiation. I am confident that Israel would respond positively to such a step, despite its negative reaction to the President's initiative last September.

The fate of the Palestinians living in the West Bank and Gaza is both a political problem and a humanitarian problem that cries out for the concerned attention of all people of good will. A particular responsibility rests now with the Arabs, who would do a grave disservice to the Palestinian people if they missed this precious opportunity to begin a negotiating process. Only through a negotiating process can the Palestinian people hope to achieve their legitimate rights and their just requirements. As Egypt and Lebanon have shown, negotiation works; violence and rejectionism get nowhere.

We have only made a beginning, but it is an important beginning. President Reagan, I know, is determined to continue his efforts to carry the Lebanon negotiations, and the peace process, forward.

There is no more noble enterprise for our country to be engaged in. Here our strategic concerns and our moral concerns coincide; our tradition of leadership and our hopes for the future point in the same direction. It is a bipartisan effort—and an example of what this country can accomplish when Americans are united.

So, even though difficult days and weeks and months lie ahead, I look to the future with confidence.

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz), June 22, 1983 (Extract) [31]

The Struggle Within the PLO

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, what do you make of the current struggle within the PLO? How do you interpret the Syrian involvement in that? And if Yasser Arafat were to be overthrown, would that necessarily be a bad thing?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We don't have a lot of contacts with the PLO, so our intelligence is all second-hand and third-hand. I shouldn't say we don't have a lot; we don't have any direct contacts with the PLO. That always leaves you a little less well informed than you might otherwise be.

But there is, clearly, a struggle going on, and it has probably some elements of policy. There may be some elements of the results of indecisiveness involved and control over funds and bureaucracy—I don't know. The basic issue, I think, is how can it be brought about that more attention is paid to the problems of the human beings called Palestinians, who live there, and whose lot is a poor one and whose prospects, not just taking it from year to year, but almost from generation to generation, are not that great.

It seems to me that we do have to pay attention, not just us but the PLO and everybody, to the legitimate rights and aspirations of these human beings, and see if we can't do better by them. I think it must be so that one of the reasons why there has been such difficulty with conflict in the Middle East is the fact that we, as an international group of countries, have not been able to come to "grips" satisfactorily with the human condition of the Palestinian people, and we really have to bear down on it. It's a very difficult problem, I know. That's the reason it hasn't been solved. But I think that is at the heart of the matter more than sort of internal PLO politics.

Q. But would Arafat's coming or going bode ill or well for your ultimate objectives, do you think?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It's a question of the degree of unity in the PLO and the extent to which there are factions and what orientation of the PLO might have, and whether or not, in the end, whatever happens might make it more possible for King Hussein to have a non-PLO, legitimate Palestinian delegation that was endorsed with him in entering the peace process. That's what we have been trying to achieve.

The extent to which Syria comes to dominate the organization, which may be happening—you read that a lot—I think makes it questionable, whether or not these developments would ease that problem. So we have to look elsewhere for our method: or perhaps in our discussions with the Syrians we might find some answers.

Testimony by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Pelletreau) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, August 3, 1983 (Extract) [32]

Withdrawal of the Egyptian Ambassador to Israel

[MR. LEVINE.] It seems that the reluctance or refusal of Egypt to return her Ambassador to Israel [33] is perhaps only the most evident example of a clear cooling of relations if not between Egypt and Israel at least from Egypt to Israel, and in light of the support that this Congress has shown for Egypt in a whole variety of directions which I believe has been appropriate and has been predicated upon Egypt's constructive role in the peace process, I would ask you to speculate as to the continued appropriateness of that unless we do see a continued pattern of or a return to the past pattern of trying to work closely to maintain the peace process between Egypt and Israel.

I am deeply troubled as I am sure you gathered by my first series of questions just about the Ambassador about this whole cooling of relations because if I were an Israeli asking myself whether or not I would like to risk whatever it is that would be at risk and obviously some significant security questions would be at risk in making peace or agreements with other Arab nations, I would be asking myself how long-term these agreements are likely to be if almost immediately after the return of the Sinai and the oilfields and the other very significant concessions the Israelis made, the Egyptians, the only Arab State with whom Israel has signed a peace treaty, appear to be just backtracking to such a significant extent.

To what extent are these relevant concerns and to what extent are these issues which have been the subject of discussion between our State Department and other parties in the Middle East particularly Egypt?

MR. PELLETREAU. The key point to focus on is the Egyptian-Israeli treaty itself. Egypt has maintained its commitment to that treaty.

MR. LEVINE. Well, one of those commitments, and again I do not want to go get into a long thing, about this, but one of the commitments was ambassadorial relationships, perhaps the most significant symbol of the treaty. So to say that Egypt had maintained its commitment under the treaty is certainly a suspect conclusion to reach in light of its refusal to return its Ambassador.

MR. PELLETREAU. As I just said, we do not want to prejudge the question of whether withdrawing its Ambassador and not sending its Ambassador back is a violation of the treaty. Neither party has asked us to make a judgment on that question.

I think if you look at the language of the treaty you can see that it is open to a pretty broad interpretation on that. We do want the Ambassador to go back.

When the Ambassador was called back to Egypt, considering the full range of possible actions that Egypt might have taken at the time, given the fact that Israel was taking military action against another Arab country, this was not a major action, and the Egyptian commitment to the treaty itself, we believe, remains strong.

There are a number of what I would call pesky issues that are pending between the two countries that we would like to see resolved. They include some questions over exactly where the line should go and where forces should be.

They include a question at Taba. They include a question of import licenses and some other things. We would like to see the situation develop where the two countries would seriously work to resolve these outstanding differences, and that includes the ambassadorial question as well.

. . . . . .

[33] Egypt recalled Ambassador Saad Mortada from Tel Aviv on September 20, 1982, following the massacre of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps. The Egyptian Government later linked Ambassador Mortada's return to an Israeli commitment to withdraw from Lebanon.

Document 292

Statement by the Deputy Representative at the United Nations (Lichenstein) Before the U.N. Security Council, August 2, 1983 [34]

The Situation in the Occupied Territories

Mr. President, the issue before the Council today is grave and farreaching. It stems from the continuing violence in the West Bank, which disrupts the hopes of peace-loving people everywhere for an early settlement of the Middle East conflict. The United States shares the anguish expressed by many speakers in this session about the loss of life and destruction of property that the West Bank has witnessed in recent weeks. We are eternally opposed to violence and terrorism from whatever quarter such acts may come, not only because of the human tragedies involved but also because of the resulting damage to the spirit of reconciliation which is so necessary to peace.

The draft resolution before us today reflects this feeling of anguish, but regrettably it does so only in one operative paragraph condemning the Hebron events. It does not adequately address the recent series of criminal attacks in the West Bank. We, of course, join the other members of the Council in condemning the attacks against civilians. We condemn all these acts, starting with the murder July 7 of an Israeli settler in Hebron and including the wanton destruction of part of the Hebron market that occurred immediately thereafter. The brutal terrorist attack at Hebron University on July 26 was the latest and, in many ways, the most horrifying of these criminal acts. [35]

We also share the view expressed in the draft resolution that The Hague Regulations of 1907 [36] and the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 [37] are applicable to the territories occupied by Israel. The United States Government has stated this position on numerous occasions, and I affirm it again today. Israel, as the occupying power in the West Bank, is bound by the terms of the Fourth Geneva Convention.

Mr. President, the draft resolution contains elements which are unacceptable to the United States, and we, therefore, were obliged to vote against it. Let me make clear, however, that we did not vote against the draft because we approve of Israel's settlement policy. On the contrary, as President Reagan said on September 1, 1982: "Further settlement activity is in no way necessary for the security of Israel and only diminishes the confidence of the Arabs that a final outcome can be freely and fairly negotiated." The most obvious flaw in the text of the draft resolution is its clear implication that Israel has carried out forcible transfers of Arab population from the occupied territories. The allegation made here is not one of individual deportations—which have, observers recognize, regrettably taken place—but rather that a policy of large-scale transfers of the Arab population has been pursued. There is no body of evidence to support this allegation.

Lichenstein's statement was made in explanation of a U.S. veto of a draft resolution, introduced by Jordan and cosponsored by 19 other Arab countries. The draft resolution determined, among other points: that Israeli settlements in the "Palestinian and other Arab territories occupied in 1967" had no legal validity and were a major obstruction to achieving peace; called upon Israel to abide by Article 49 (6) of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of August 12, 1949, and to desist from action that would change the legal status, geographic nature, and demographic composition of occupied territories, and not to transfer parts of its own civilian population and to force the transfers of Arab populations from these territories; called upon the Government of Israel to rescind those measures, to dismantle the existing settlements, and to desist from expanding and enlarging existing ones; condemned recent attacks perpetrated against Arab civilian populations in the occupied territories; and called upon all States not to provide Israel with any assistance to be used specifically in connection with settlements. Thirteen members of the Security Council voted in favor of the draft resolution; one abstained. The United States voted against it, a veto. For text, see U.N. document S/15895, August 1, 1983.

Moreover, turning to the provisions relating specifically to Israeli settlements, let me reiterate that we believe Israeli settlement activity in the occupied territories constitutes an obstacle to a fair and lasting settlement in accordance with Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, and in particular that further settlement activity in urbanized areas such as Hebron can only exacerbate tension. As President Reagan emphasized last September 1, a freeze on settlements throughout the occupied territories, more than any other single action, would foster the kind of atmosphere needed for negotiations leading to peace.

We do not believe, however, that it is at all practical or even appropriate to call for the dismantling of the existing settlements. The future of the settlements is one of the key issues which will need to be addressed in negotiations. Nor can we accept continuing the sterile argument as to whether the settlements are "illegal," an argument which unfortunately has dominated discussions in the United Nations on this question to the detriment of the basic issue, namely how to bring about a just and peaceful resolution of the conflict over the occupied territories, of which the recent events in Hebron are a tragic manifestation.

Mr. President, the problems of the West Bank are real and agonizing. The United States remains committed to the resolution of all aspects of the Arab-Israeli conflict and its underlying causes. A debate in the Security Council over whether Israeli settlements are "legal" or "illegal" fails to address the real problem and encourages the kind of rhetorical, legalistic arguments that tend to polarize differences which can only be bridged by unconditional negotiations. We make these differences appear much wider and deeper than they are. Indeed, this polarization exacerbates the relations of the protagonists on the ground, the very parties who must be induced to come to the bargaining table in a spirit of mutual accommodation which is essential if there is ever to be peace in the Middle East.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Reaffirmation of the U.S. Approach to Peace

. . . . . .

But our current efforts in Lebanon are only a small part of our search for peace in the Middle East, including a compassionate, fair and practical resolution to the Palestinian problem.

The Middle East Peace Initiative which we announced almost a year ago is definitely alive and available to those parties willing to sit down together and talk peace. We remain committed to the positions we set forth, and we stand ready to pursue them in the context of the Camp David Accords.

Those positions are in the best long-term interests of all parties. Most importantly, they're the only realistic basis for a solution that has thus far been presented.

The United States continues to support UN Security Council Resolutions 338 and 242.

The establishment of new Israeli settlements in the occupied territories is an obstacle to peace and we're concerned over the negative effect this activity has on Arab confidence in Israel's willingness to return territory in exchange for security and a freely and fairly-negotiated peace treaty.

The future of these settlements can only be dealt with through direct negotiations between the parties to the conflict. The sooner these negotiations begin, the greater the chance for a solution.

This Administration, like those before it, is firmly committed to the security of the State of Israel. We will help Israel defend itself against external aggression. At the same time, the United States believes, as it has always believed, that permanent security for the people of Israel and all the peoples of the region can only come with the achievement of a just and lasting peace, not by sole reliance on increasingly expensive military forces.

Unfortunately, the opportunities afforded by our initiative have yet to be grasped by the parties involved. We know the issues are complex, the risks for all concerned high, and much courageous statesman—statesmanship, excuse me, will be required. Nevertheless, those complex issues can be resolved by creative and persistent diplomacy. Those risks can be overcome by people who want to end this bitter and tragic conflict. And in the process, the United States will be a full partner, doing everything we can to help create a just and lasting peace.

Until next week, thanks for listening, and God bless you.

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Murphy) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, November 14, 1983 (Extract) [39]

U.S. Commitment to the Middle East Peace Process

. . . . . .

In recent months, we have, of necessity, been preoccupied with the crisis in Lebanon. But this does not diminish our desire to press forward in the broader Middle East peace process, if the parties whose cooperation is needed are willing. Some have claimed that we will avoid dealing with the very sensitive issues of peace in the Middle East during an election year. This is untrue. Witness President Reagan's appointment of Donald Rumsfeld, a distinguished American with a rich and varied background in public service and foreign affairs, as his new envoy for the broader peace process in the Middle East as well as Lebanon. This is a sign of our determination to pursue the peace process and the President's initiative of September 1, 1982.

The President has reaffirmed his commitment to that initiative. The proposals he put forward remain the most realistic basis for progress toward reaching a fair and just solution to the Palestinian problem and resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict. We are ready to pursue these proposals if a credible Arab leader—such as King Hussein—were to step forward and agree to negotiate with Israel. The President's initiative is an opportunity for those in the Arab world who seek peace, and for Israel to satisfy its right to long-term security through negotiated agreements. We regret that thus far, neither the Arab States nor Israel have seized this opportunity.

Let me turn now to our relations with Israel. Our close collaboration continues under the new government of Prime Minister Shamir. President Reagan looks forward to Prime Minister Shamir's visit here in the coming weeks. The visit 2 weeks ago to Israel by Under Secretary Eagleburger, in which I participated, was the latest in a series of high-level consultations between our two governments. We discussed our common interest in a stable and sovereign Lebanon.

We reaffirmed our ironclad commitment to Israel's security. And we consulted on various aspects of our security and economic relations. We have our differences over how best to proceed in the peace process, for example, or over Israel's settlements policy, which we oppose. But our fundamental relationship is deep and strong and we share many common interests.

The Need For Peace in the Middle East

Now, every Secretary of State becomes a Middle East expert very rapidly, whether he wants to or not. Usually his training is a process of ordeal by fire. But the process has a healthy way of bringing you back to the basics of foreign policy: the importance of standing by principles and commitments to friends; the virtue of courage and steadfastness in the face of challenges; the uses and limits of power as a factor in diplomacy; and the need for a moral compass to steer you on a steady course through turbulent waters.

Today, in the Middle East, the United States is engaged on a variety of fronts. We are extending our cooperation with Israel. We are seeking to restore peace in Lebanon. We are trying to strengthen the forces of moderation in the Arab world. We are exploring new possibilities for progress in the peace process. We are attempting to contain the possibly dangerous consequences of the Iran–Iraq war.

It may seem a confusing kaleidoscope of problems, but there is a central core to our diplomacy, which pulls together all these issues and all our strategic, political, and moral concerns about the future of the Middle East. And that core is the effort to achieve a secure peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors. So all our activities, in whatever dimension of the Middle East, are geared in one way or another to that central goal. (Applause)

And that goal itself has a deeper meaning. In the final analysis—behind all the codewords about "just and comprehensive peace" and "secure and recognized boundaries"—we are talking about people and the quality of their lives. True peace is not measured only by legal or political criteria but in human terms—by whether individuals can live their lives and go about their business and raise their children without elemental fear for their personal safety. It means people's confidence that their community and their society have a future. It means a sense of opportunity and possibility, not fear of random danger or deliberate threat.

As the poet said, "No man is an island." So the fate of others affects our own. No people understands this better than the Jewish people. Anti-Semitism in a faraway country; persecution of Jews in the Soviet Union, Iran, or Ethiopia; mindless denunciations of "Zionism as racism" in international forums; Katyusha rockets landing on the towns of northern Israel—these touch you deeply. No people understands better than you the fragility of the restraints that hold civilized society together, because no one knows better the profound inhumanity of which the darker recesses of human nature are capable.

Similarly, the people of Israel have struggled so long and so hard for peace with their neighbors; but then the first leader to make peace with them is assassinated. And Lebanon, the second moderate Arab country to negotiate an agreement with them, is right now under assault from Arab radicals precisely because it did so.

There should be no doubt of where the United States stands on any of these questions. The Jewish tradition is one of the principal sources of the values of our civilization—freedom, democracy, the dignity of the individual. (Applause) In a world where those values are widely threatened, the condition of Israel and the Jewish people is a measure of the vulnerability of those values. The appearance of anti-Semitism has always been a symptom of deeper sickness of a society; similarly, the vicious international campaign against the existence of Israel is a reflection of a much broader ideological assault on the interests, well-being, and principles of the whole free world. Therefore, when we concern ourselves with the fate of Israel, we are also concerning ourselves with the fate of the values that both we and Israel stand for. (Applause)

In this spirit, I want to say a few words about our policy in Lebanon and then about the broader subject of promoting peace between Israel and all its Arab neighbors.

At stake in Lebanon are some of these basic values and some basic principles of international law and international morality:

—the principle that differences among nations are to be settled by reason and negotiation, not by the use or threat of force, and —the right of a small country to decide for itself how to achieve its sovereign objectives, free from outside pressure, threat, or blackmail.

Lebanon is a proud and beautiful country whose people have contributed much to the world. Yet it has had a complex and turbulent history. The roots of enmity in that country go very deep. Nevertheless, for many years Lebanon thrived because political rivalries were accommodated and a delicate balance maintained. The yearning for peace, too, runs deep in Lebanon.

But the delicate balance in Lebanon was upset, primarily by the involvement of outside, non-Lebanese forces—just as today, the primary obstacle to the internal reconciliation is the presence of outside, non-Lebanese forces.

For Israel, the sovereign independence and peace of Lebanon continue to be a major strategic interest, directly affecting its own security. Israel, too, has influence in Lebanon, and we are confident that Israel will be using this influence in support of the Lebanese Government and its efforts of national reconciliation.

At stake, as I said earlier, is the fate of the second Arab country to negotiate directly an agreement with Israel. I need not elaborate on what it would mean for the overall peace process if Lebanon should be coerced into renouncing that agreement. It is the only existing formula that ensures both Israeli withdrawal and a solution to the security problem that created the Lebanese crisis in the first place. We will not accept its abrogation. (Applause)

I must say when I hear all of the criticism of that agreement and I look at that agreement—and I know quite a bit about it—I have to ask myself, "What's so unreasonable about an agreement between two neighboring countries that provides some measures for their mutual security, which they both want and need, and a minimal degree of human and commercial contact between them? What's so unreasonable about that?" It seems damn reasonable to me. (Applause)

But the main issue now is national reconciliation. Especially in view of the sacrifices that have been made, the international community has a right to ask all the parties in Lebanon to redouble their efforts to settle their national problem. As the Bible tells us, to everything there is a season. There is a time to debate and a time to decide. Now in Lebanon is the time to decide. (Applause) As in every negotiation, there must be compromise. For every risk taken, there is gain. And the risks of failure to act right now are far greater than any of the risks of a fair political solution.

As long as there is no solution to the basic issue of Middle East peace, however, the region is bound to be subject to other crises, in other places, in other forms. Therefore, our efforts in Lebanon have not diverted us from the larger goal.

The issues at stake in Lebanon, as I said before, have wider significance: the principle of peaceful settlement of disputes, the right of small countries to live in peace and security with their neighbors. As Israelis and Jews have learned very clearly from bitter experience, we all live in a world in which many do not share these principles. Therefore, these principles must be defended, sometimes at the price of great risk or sacrifice. If the free nations are to preserve their security and defend their ideals, they must have sufficient military power to deter or resist aggression. Whether in Central America, the Middle East, Western Europe, or Asia, history shows that diplomacy works only when aggressors conclude that no military option is available. (Applause)

The United States has always understood that a strong Israel is not only a guarantor of security for the Jewish people but also a powerful force for freedom and a strategic partner to America and the West. (Applause)

That's why we have ensured—and will continue to ensure—that Israel receives the help it needs to maintain a military advantage to deter its enemies. The Soviet military buildup in Syria underlines this necessity, and underlines it again and again for anyone who will look to see. (Applause) The United States has furnished over $20 billion in military and economic aid since 1949, most of it in the last 10 years. In Fiscal Year 1984, Israel will receive a total of $2.6 billion in military and economic assistance. (Applause)

Now, I think we should say to ourselves in providing this aid we help Israel, but we also are helping ourselves. (Applause)

But military power is not enough. Israel's dream of becoming "a nation like all other nations" is yet to be realized. The Jewish State did not rescue the survivors of the ghettos in Europe and the Middle East in order to become itself a new ghetto among nations. And yet, 35 years after its founding, Israel remains rejected by most of its neighbors and isolated in international fora. I remember being in Israel just after Sadat's historic journey to Jerusalem and feeling personally—very personally—what a tremendous emotional impact Sadat's visit had. It was clear to me how deeply all Israelis yearn for true peace.

The requirements of defense are still a heavy burden on Israel's economy. Military reserve duties disrupt family life and economic productivity. The prospect of living with perpetual hostility, and the long-term threat from advanced weapons technology in enemy hands, cannot help but be deeply troublesome to Israel's people. And the moral burden of the occupation can undermine the values on which Israel was founded and can divide its society.

Military might and control of territory have prevented defeat on the battlefield, but true security and peace of mind can come only when Israel has gained the acceptance and recognition of its neighbors. That is why, even as we assist Israel's capacity to defend itself militarily, the promotion of Arab-Israeli peace through negotiation is the number-one priority of our policy and our efforts in the Middle East.

Since the great achievement of the Camp David Accords, the peace process has encountered many problems. On the Israeli side, we remain deeply concerned about the ongoing construction and expansion of settlements, unilaterally changing the status of the occupied territories even while their future is subject to negotiation. On the Arab side, there is the intense and continuing struggle between those who want to secure a better future through negotiation and those who reject peaceful solutions or simple recognition as a matter of ideology. The outcome of this struggle will go a long way toward determining the chances for progress.

Once before when our focus was on Lebanon—on September 1, 1982—President Reagan reminded us of the bigger picture and of our commitment to a broader peace. On the day the PLO completed its evacuation of Beirut, the President challenged the parties to make a "fresh start" in the Middle East. He spelled out the foundation of the American position—in essence the principle of exchanging territory for peace, as called for in UN Security Council Resolution 242, which has been our policy ever since 1967. At the same time, the President added, "our view on the extent to which Israel should be asked to give up territory will be heavily affected by the extent of true peace and normalization and the security arrangements offered in return." He made clear the American view, among other things, that the security and legitimacy of Israel are crucial criteria that have to be recognized in any settlement; that neither a Palestinian state, nor permanent Israeli control of occupied territories, nor a return to the pre-1967 security situation is a viable solution; that Palestinian self-government in the West Bank and Gaza in association with Jordan offers the best chance for a durable peace; that Jerusalem must be undivided; (applause) and most fundamentally, that the terms of a settlement can only be determined by the parties concerned, in direct negotiations. (Applause)

The positions laid out in the President's initiative are fair, balanced, and realistic. They were meant as a stimulus to negotiation, not as the dictated outcome of a negotiation. The initiative was an opportunity for the seekers after justice in the Arab world to achieve their goal through negotiations leading to peace. Although it triggered a vigorous—and, on the whole, constructive—debate among Arab leaders, none of them has yet seized the opportunity. Likewise it was a challenge to Israel to achieve true and lasting security through peace, rather than relying on the short-term illusion of security through territory. The Israeli Government, I regret to note, rejected the President's initiative. But I have little doubt that if an Arab leader comes forward with a mandate to negotiate on the basis of those principles, Israel will not let such a historic opportunity slip away. (Applause)

We cannot be certain, however, that that opportunity will remain open indefinitely. Every passing month creates new facts on the ground which, I am convinced, are making the process for reaching a negotiated settlement ever more difficult and its prospects ever more uncertain. The peace treaty with Egypt—and the return of the Sinai to Egyptian sovereignty—prove that negotiations work. I might say when people—my friends in the Arab world, and I have a great many—tell me that you can't sit down and negotiate and come to an agreement with Israel, I say "You're wrong. Look at Camp David." What other country in your memory has reached agreement and given back such a large piece of territory adjacent to its own as the Sinai? (Applause) So negotiations work and agreements can be reached as I saw myself in the case of the Israeli-Lebanon agreement, but both sides must recognize—and soon—that negotiations are the only hope for a secure, just, and peaceful future—the only hope. The absence of negotiation is a formula for endless conflict and mounting danger.

I have spoken a lot tonight about the human dimension of the Middle East conflict, and there is another aspect that must be mentioned. I am thinking of the Palestinian people. The Palestinians have been victimized above all by their self-appointed leaders and spokesmen who, for decades, have chased the illusion of military options and foolishly rejected the only possible path to a solution—direct negotiations. (Applause) The utter failure of rejectionist policies ought to be obvious by now. But I am thinking in particular of the 1.3 million Palestinians living in the West Bank and Gaza. Their well-being, their desire for a greater voice in determining their own destiny, must be another issue of moral concern, even while we continue to pursue an agreed solution to the final status of the occupied territories. If their acceptance of a peaceful future with Israel is to be nurtured, they must be given some stake in that future by greater opportunities for economic development, by fairer administrative practices, and by greater concern for the quality of their lives.

I must add a word here about Jordan. It has been our view since the 1967 war that Jordan is the key to a negotiated solution in the West Bank and Gaza. The PLO has thus far excluded itself as a negotiating partner by its refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist. Jordan, in contrast, under the leadership of King Hussein, has long sought a path toward moderation and conciliation. Jordan's participation in the peace process has been inhibited by many considerations, including the absence of the necessary support from other moderate Arabs, but most of all the fierce opposition of Arab radicals. Last spring King Hussein nearly achieved an agreement that would have permitted him to take a more active role in the peace process on behalf of the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. The effort failed because of radical Arab opposition—no doubt goaded on by Syria. More recently, a bitter and violent struggle has broken out within the PLO and between the PLO and Syria. King Hussein has pointedly and courageously raised the question of whether the PLO, if dominated by Syria, can continue to claim legitimacy as spokesman for the Palestinian people. The outcome of this struggle is sure to have major implications for Jordan, the Palestinians, and the future of the peace process. For our part, the door will always be kept open for a negotiation in accordance with the President's September 1 initiative.

There may be some who have already written off the peace process for the next year. They think we will shy away from the sensitive issues of the Middle East during a Presidential election year. Well, they are wrong. Ronald Reagan has no intention of letting the search for peace lapse. We cannot afford to. (Applause) Let it never be said that the United States was too busy practicing politics to pursue peace. (Applause)

I might just say, for that matter, let it never be said of the United States that the pursuit of peace is bad politics, because it isn't. (Applause)

In the next 2 weeks, President Reagan will be receiving in Washington Israel's new leaders—President Herzog, Prime Minister Shamir, and Defense Minister Arens. Our two governments have many things to talk about: Lebanon; the relationship with Egypt; the possibilities for progress toward peace; the threat of Soviet expansionism in the Middle East; the need for Israel to restore its economic vitality; the fate of threatened Jewish communities around the world, especially in the Soviet Union; and other important common concerns. (Applause)

Our cooperation is an enduring reality, whichever party is in office in either country, because this relationship is deeply rooted in the sentiments of our peoples and in the values of our civilization. There is no stronger bond between countries. So we come back, in the end, to the human dimension. The fate of Anatoliy Shcharanskiy and the fate of Lebanon and the fate of the villagers of Kiryat Shemonah and the fate of the Palestinians—indeed, the fate of all men and women of good will, who wish to live in peace—this is the common agenda of Israel and the United States, as it is the common agenda of our civilization.

Mubarak–Arafat Talks

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, do you think the new approachment between Arafat and Mubarak now opens the way to break through for the possibility of your peace plan getting moving and Hussein taking part? [42]

THE PRESIDENT. Well, Helen, I'm always a little leery about saying a breakthrough, but I do think this. We are optimistic about this because, if you look at the relationship there and the two countries—or the two peoples that were involved, Mubarak is the head of state of the one country in the Arab world that has gone forward and has a peace treaty with Israel. We're hopeful that the peace process will bring about more Arab nations making their peace with Israel.

Obviously, a part of that process depends on a fair and just settlement of the Palestinian question. And Arafat has, in the past, been one who has refused to recognize Israel's right to exist as a nation. But the fact that earlier, and before this split in the PLO ranks, he has begun to discuss with King Hussein negotiations and participating in those negotiations on behalf of the Palestinians. Then that broke down with the split in the Palestinian movement.

Now, I think that what President Mubarak is doing is talking to him about returning to where he was earlier, making contact with King Hussein and getting those peace negotiations, our peace proposal, underway again.

Q. Do you think there's a good chance?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I do. I really do. We've—because we had believed that settlement in Lebanon had to precede going further with that. I don't think that's necessarily true now. I think enough progress has been made there that we can go forward with the peace movement.

Q. May I follow up, Mr. President? Israel has denounced the talks between Arafat and President Mubarak saying it was a pure violation of the Camp David agreements. Would you respond to that?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I don't think it was a violation, and I think—I can understand their feelings in view of the recent tragedy in Jerusalem [43] and the group taking credit for that claim to be a PLO group and all. But at the same time I think, as they look at this a little more clearly, they will see that Mubarak, based on the experience of Egypt and its willingness to go forward for peace, is simply trying to persuade others to change their thinking.

There was one point not too long before the peace treaty with Egypt in which Egypt was violent in its hostility, as perhaps today the elements of the PLO are. So, who is better able to try and bring in another person into the peace process than someone who has made the change that Egypt has made?

Q. Do you think Mr. Arafat is still a popular leader among the Palestinians themselves?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, this is what we need to find out. I can't believe that that radical group under the influence of the Syrians created all of this tragedy around Tripoli and the innocent people that were killed because of the violence of that battle. I can't believe that the millions of Palestinians are going to choose that leadership.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Schneider) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, April 28, 1983 (Extracts) [1]

Overview of U.S. Relations With North Africa

I am pleased to appear, along with my colleague from the Bureau of African Affairs, before the subcommittee to discuss the Administration's request for assistance to Morocco and Tunisia and pertinent developments in North Africa.

Policy Toward North Africa. To initiate our discussion today, I would like to describe our regional posture, with particular reference to Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia—the states of the Western Maghreb—and Libya. The United States wants to encourage and maintain solid, friendly relations with all of these states on the basis of mutual respect and shared interests, where possible. These states, by virtue of their geographic situation, natural resources, and influence within the international community, have considerable significance for United States foreign policy concerns. Our interests in the region are varied and important—maintenance of peace and evolutionary change in the Maghreb, protection of NATO's southern flank, and preservation of security, development, as well as the requisite stability in the Maghreb and contiguous Mediterranean and Sahelian regions.

The policy pursued by this administration includes the encouragement of regional reconciliation and peaceful negotiated settlement of divisive issues. We have a long history of close and cooperative relations with Morocco and Tunisia. Our ties with Algeria are important, substantial and improving, and we are pursuing their expansion while reaffirming and strengthening our links with our traditional friends, Morocco and Tunisia.

Morocco. Our relations with Morocco are excellent. They are based on 200 years of cooperative effort. Morocco is strategically located at the crossroads of NATO-Europe, sub-Saharan Africa and the Arab world. A close relationship with a friendly Morocco is important to our security interests.

Morocco shares many of our foreign policy objectives. Like the United States, Morocco has been concerned over the challenges posed by the Soviets and their friends. Morocco is playing an active and constructive role in the Middle East peace process, working to consolidate an Arab consensus and bringing the Arabs into better communication with us. Morocco, in a manner consistent with its nonalignment, has concluded an access and transit agreement with us which would help us deploy U.S. forces in defense of Southwest Asia in certain contingencies. Morocco has taken a long step in the Western Sahara by accepting the OAU's cease-fire/referendum formula for ending the conflict there.[2] It is now engaged with Algeria in an important effort to improve intra-Maghrebi relations. Our relations with Morocco are close, reflecting the convergence of our interests and the mutual benefits to be derived from our relationship. This is one of the reasons we have felt free to ask Morocco to understand our need to reprogram substantial resources to El Salvador pending replenishment from the supplemental now before the Congress. The administration urges you to restore these funds in full.

As vehicles for the exchange of mutually useful ideas we have formed with the Moroccan Government both Joint Economic (JEC) and Military Commissions (JMC), knowing full well that security and development are interrelated. We have agreed to a number of measures designed to facilitate investment in and trade with Morocco. These are moving forward under the aegis of the JEC. The Joint Military Commission is exploring ways in which our military cooperation can best serve our mutual interest. We are working to ensure that these measures are consistent with our relations with neighboring states. The joint exercises which we carry out with Morocco are designed primarily to provide opportunities to improve the readiness of United States forces and provide training for the Moroccan armed forces.

For Morocco in fiscal year 1984. The administration proposes $19 million in Development Assistance, $34.5 million in PL-480, $7 million in ESF, $30 million in MAP, $60 million in FMS credits and $1.7 million in IMET. This continuing level of support reflects the serious economic difficulties that Morocco faces, as well as our support for that country's military modernization program.

Under the fiscal year 1983 supplemental request, we are asking for restoration of $52 million in FMS guarantees, previously approved by Congress but rescheduled for El Salvador. This amount would bring the FMS total back to $75 million for Morocco.

The development assistance program contains a significant allocation for expanded efforts in rainfed agriculture, as well as programs for family planning, nutrition and resource development. After agreement with King Hassan in May 1982, we have proposed an ESF program for Morocco in Fiscal Year 1984. To augment the development assistance program, $7 million ESF has been requested. This ESF will be used to help improve Morocco's output of cereals in dryland farming areas, which will increase the availability of food and foreign exchange in the country.

It is in our interest to see Morocco maintain a level of military strength sufficient to assure its national security and support a regional balance. We requested for FY-83 provision for the first time of direct grants (MAP) of $25 million and an increase in the level of FMS from $30 million to $75 million. The FMS credits will purchase spare parts and maintenance capability for previously supplied U.S. equipment and will help finance completion of air surveillance equipment and anti-armor weapons. No major equipment purchases are being undertaken. Our FMS request will enable Morocco to make very selective improvements in its logistics and even more selective improvements in its defensive equipment. It is worth noting that before Morocco began its program of military modernization several years ago, to which we have made modest contributions, its armed forces had only obsolete, Korean war vintage materiel. Due to immediate and overriding proprities which as already mentioned have necessitated reprogramming of substantial FY-83 FMS credits, a portion of these FY-83 credits has been reprogrammed; their restoration is being requested via supplemental appropriations. We have also requested small increases in IMET funds to provide more training in logistics, maintenance, and communications related directly to Morocco's ongoing modernization program.

Algeria. For the United States, Algeria is an important country, one in which the United States has important interests. It is a leader among the nonaligned, a supplier of hydrocarbons to the United States, an intermediary through whose auspices we are adjudicating a possible $4 billion in American claims with Iran. A market for $1 billion in American exports in 1982.

Although we have divergent interests on some issues, including the price of Algerian LNG in the U.S. market, we are pleased that Algeria's leaders are demonstrating a strong desire to explore our differences and to expand the opportunities inherent in our ties. This is a process to which we are both committed. It has led to the visit of a highly successful trade investment mission led by Secretary Baldrige, [3] the first U.S. Cabinet official to visit Algiers since Henry Kissinger, and to the successful visit of Under Secretary of State Eagleburger, which has been just completed. [4] We have also been able to begin limited commercial sales of nonlethal military equipment in support of Algeria's efforts to diversify its sources of military equipment.

We respect Algeria's nonalignment and we recognize its desire to steer a course which avoids becoming beholden to any single state. We respect also its renewed efforts to develop its human and natural resources to improve the quality of life of its people. The Algerian Government has made clear that it looks to the United States among others for assistance in this and we look forward to constructive relations in this sphere and others in the future.

Algerian-Moroccan Relations. The recent meeting between King Hassan of Morocco and President Bendjedid of Algeria is a welcome development. [5] Both parties have stated that the meeting was a culmination of preparatory contacts designed to lead toward a restoration of bilateral relations, suspended since 1975. Naturally, we support any rapprochement between these two important neighbors. Both sides have also stated that the recent meeting does not reflect changes in their policies concerning the Western Sahara. Both have reaffirmed their support to the OAU proposal for settlement while giving different emphases to the requirements for a settlement. We should await developments to gauge the direction and pace of the rapprochement between Morocco and Algeria. We believe, nonetheless, that the Hassan-Bendjedid summit augurs well for the negotiated resolution of the Western Sahara question in a multilateral context.

Tunisia. Although Tunisia has not been directly involved in the Western Sahara conflict, it is key to a stable and progressive North Africa. We have a long history of close and friendly relations. Tunisia has made remarkable economic and social progress: it has a pluralist society and seeks to strengthen its democratic institutions. The Hassan-Bedjedid summit was followed by a summit meeting between President Bourguiba of Tunisia and President Bendjedid. [6] Thus, greater Tunisian-Algerian cooperation is also emerging at present.

Tunisia's impressive economic progress has impelled us to begin phasing out economic assistance. The Tunisian Government would prefer to continue to concentrate its resources on economic and social development, but circumstances—the threat from Libya as dramatically demonstrated by the Libyan sponsored Gafsa raid—have caused President Bourguiba to decide that Tunisia must modernize its long underfunded defense capability. Tunisian concern regarding the Libyan sponsored attack on the Tunisian city of Gafsa in 1980 [7] and succeeding manifestations of the threat from Libya has thus had much to do with this change of Tunisian policy. The Government has made careful plans for a modest modernization of its armed forces, on the expectation of substantial continuing U.S. security assistance We believe its plans are prudent and appropriate to Tunisia's circumstances. We have requested a supplemental appropriation for FY-83 in order to meet our commitments for security assistance to Tunisia. As you know, this fiscal year's allocation has had to be severely cut back to accommodate reduced appropriations, leaving the Tunisian Government with plans and commitments it will have difficulty in funding.

For Tunisia in FY-84, the administration proposes $90 million in FMS, $50 million in MAP, $1.7 million in IMET, and a total of $11.1 million in PL-480.

Under the fiscal year 1983 supplemental request, Tunisia would receive an additional $58 million in FMS and $15 million in MAP, for a total of $120 million in FMS guarantees and $20 million in MAP.

Although we do not intend to obligate any new development assistance funds or ESF to Tunisia, programs funded earlier will continue to operate for several years. We will also support Tunisian development through a PL–480 program aimed at improving the stagnant agricultural sector.

The security assistance, substantially the same level requested last year, will help fund a minimal capability built around F–5 interceptor aircraft, M–60 tanks, Chaparral missiles, and perhaps lesser equipment. A team composed of experts from the State and Defense Departments which visited Tunisia to study its defense needs in March 1980 recommended the purchase of these items. IMET funds will provide accompanying technical and professional training for members of the Tunisian military. The MAP component of our security assistance will enable the Tunisian Government to make essential improvements in its military without adversely affecting the country's economic development.

Western Sahara. Military activity in the Western Sahara has steadily decreased over the past eighteen months and now appears to be at stalemate. This condition is conducive to efforts toward a negotiated settlement in accordance with the OAU proposals. Moroccan construction of an earthworks (BERM) around the major population centers has apparently placed major civilian targets beyond the reach of the Polisario and has enabled the Moroccan military to deploy to greater defensive advantage. Substantial Moroccan resources are being invested in the development and infrastructure of the territory under Moroccan control.

U.S. Policy Toward the Western Sahara. U.S. Government policy on the Western Sahara conflict has been consistent. We support fully and encourage all parties to support the Organization of African Unity's (OAU) cease-fire/referendum formula for a negotiated settlement. We envisage such negotiations as seeking to arrange a cease-fire and the working out of modalities for holding a referendum on self-determination.

We believe that the war is not winable and that its continuation is not in anyone's interest. We hope that a referendum can lead to the end of the conflict in the area.

Status of Negotiations. The effort to seat the self-styled Saharan Democratic Arab Republic (SDAR) as a member of the OAU (supported by Algeria and Libya, among others) contributed to the collapse of two successive attempts to convene a summit meeting of the Organization of African Unity. The Polisario continues to demand that the SDAR be seated as a full member of the OAU, an act we believe would prejudge the outcome of an eventual referendum.

Developments in the Region. Our policy of assistance to Morocco and Tunisia has demonstrated the United States resolve to support its friends. It has made modest contributions to the modernization of Morocco's obsolete military matériel which the Moroccan Government felt it could no longer postpone beginning several years ago. Essentially defensive in nature, this modernization was necessary primarily in order to balance sophisticated military equipment supplied to other countries in North Africa. The program of modernization has brought the ancillary benefit of enabling Morocco, in a very modest way, to preserve conditions under which it could pursue political solutions rather than merely addressing military necessities in the Western Sahara. We are, of course, gratified that both Morocco's and Algeria's original acceptance of OAU resolutions proposing a cease-fire and referendum have recently been reaffirmed.

U.S. economic and military assistance complements security assistance relationships maintained by Morocco and Tunisia with other countries, notably France. We have made it clear to the French that the United States welcomes continued and indeed irreplaceable French military and economic aid to both countries and that our contingency access and transit agreement with Morocco does not imply a U.S. intent to resurrect any of the military basing rights we voluntarily relinquished in the 1970's.

We have also continued to express our desire to improve relations with Algeria, not at the expense of other states in the region, but as a natural expression of our bilateral interests.

In concluding, let me state that we consider that our development and security assistance programs have made a positive contribution to U.S. interest in the evolving situation in North Africa. They are also a sign of our strong commitments to our friends. We ask that the subcommittee recommend appropriation of the levels we have requested.

Address by Vice President Bush, Algiers, September 14, 1983 [8]

Community of Interests Between the United States and Algeria

Distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen.

You have made my wife, Barbara, and me feel very much at home here in Algeria, and I want you to know that we appreciate your warm welcome very much.

I am honored that you have invited me to the beautiful capital of Algiers to meet and talk with you about the important issues that confront our two nations.

The United States has many valued friends in this part of the world, and fruitful relations with most of the countries of North Africa. So it is a pleasure for us to come here and renew our diplomatic, economic and cultural ties.

Our two countries share a common heritage: We both won our independence after long and bitter struggles against foreign domination. Algeria has shown what can be accomplished in nation-building in just a generation. It is a leader of the nonaligned movement, with an influential voice for fairness and reason in regional and world affairs. In this connection, all Americans gratefully remember Algeria's help in the resolution of the hostage crisis a few years ago. You have countless friends in America you do not even know.

Algiers is a most appropriate place, therefore, for me to talk about America's relations with the newly independent and developing countries of the world.

My country is 200 years old, but as we have not forgotten the dreams of our own beginnings, we have not grown indifferent to the hopes and desires of the younger nations. The United States had the first anticolonial revolution; and toward the end of the First World War, when colonialism still shrouded the globe, we were instrumental in beginning the modern process of decolonization. After World War II, the United States continued to champion decolonization, because we remembered our own struggle for independence and the principles on which our own nation was founded.

Today, the end of the colonial system has transformed international politics and international economics. The United States is acutely aware that much of the world's future is being shaped by events in these newly independent and developing regions which embrace the broad majority of mankind. Out of enlightened self-interest and a consciousness of common humanity, the American people share your aspirations for peace, freedom, security and progress.

We are now more than two decades into the postcolonial era. The euphoria of the early independence period has given way to a sober appreciation of the long-term problems of nation-building. New nations are confronted by serious challenges of regional security and economic development. Both developed and developing nations have learned that, politically and economically, our destinies are intertwined. Our well-being and security are closely interrelated. We face many common challenges and opportunities for the future.

In the political dimension, as a result of history, geography, and philosophy, America and Algeria have different approaches on many issues. How vividly I remember this from my days as UN Ambassador. But while we often disagreed, we were never adversaries. This is due not only to the courtesy of Algerian diplomats and the skill of Algerian diplomacy. It also reflects a basic truth about America's conception of world order.

[8] Source: Press Release, September 14, 1983; Office of the Press Secretary to the Vice President; also printed in the Department of State Bulletin, November 1983, pp. 11–14. Vice President Bush addressed Algerian officials at the El Aurassi Hotel. In addition to Algeria, he visited Morocco (September 11–13), Tunisia (September 15–16), Yugoslavia (September 16–18), Romania (September 18–19), Hungary (September 19–20), and Austria (September 20–21).

It was President John F. Kennedy—a great friend of Algeria—who said that America's goal was to help "make the world safe for diversity." The United States has its interests and objectives in the world, just as Algeria has its own. But America sees a world of truly independent, prospering nations as totally compatible with its interests. We do not wish to make over the world in our image. This is not our way. We respect the independence of others even when their ways are different.

Our own political and economic system stresses free competition, the clash of ideas, tolerance, openness—in a word, freedom. It is sometimes chaotic, but it is a system that gives free rein to individual talent and initiative. Likewise in the international arena, we see pluralism and diversity as a source of creativity and dynamism. We seek no artificial uniformity or regimentation. We are not afraid of spontaneity. We are prepared to compete on a fair basis in the world of ideas as well as the world of economics. This is our tradition and our vision of a just international order.

Therefore, we accept, and respect, the practice of genuine nonalignment. As long as a country is making its own independent sovereign decisions and respects the sovereignty of other nations in the world community, we respect its views, even when they differ from ours. And we are ready to work constructively with those countries on issues on which we agree and in areas where our interests coincide—even though we may not agree totally.

We welcome the diversity of points of view that exists among all countries, developed and developing, and we know their interests and circumstances are not all identical.

Every country has its unique potential and its unique problems. Therefore, we are concerned when some developing countries compromise their own individual principles to meekly follow a single voice or alien ideology, or to pretend a false identity of views on major international issues. Such an artificial conformity obscures the real nature of the problems and blocks realistic solutions.

We reject the theory, offered by some nations, of a "natural alliance" between the nonaligned nations and the East bloc. If anything, we believe the West has vastly more to offer the nations of the Third World—in terms of freedom and economic opportunity. And what the West has to offer does not require automatic conformity to preconceived social structures or political positions. True nonalignment means to seek a position independent of East and West, and to apply equal objectivity in judging the actions and policies of both. If the nonaligned nations criticize the West, that is fine and healthy for all of us. We are always open to constructive criticism. Our system is built on debate and the free exchange of ideas and opinions. But objectivity and balance require equal care in observing the faults of the East. Many governments that call themselves nonaligned are remarkably myopic in recognizing what communism does to human rights wherever it takes hold. Religious beliefs and practices, for instance, are strictly controlled by the State, sometimes outlawed altogether, and the faithful are harassed, intimidated and thrown in jail.

It detracts from the credibility of the nonaligned movement when gross violations of international law are ignored or when human rights violations in the West are focussed upon while those of the East—as in Afghanistan and other places—are overlooked. Credibility is the movement's currency, and it should not be so debased.

Our desire, and our policy, is to view every country in the developing world in its own right. Contrary to some misconceptions, we do not seek to inject East-West controversies into Third World issues or to attempt to force the countries of the Third World to choose between affiliation with the West or the East. We not only respect nonalignment, we value it as a precious contribution to global security, peace, and freedom.

Sadly, the world is much beset by regional conflicts which pose immediate dangers to the independence of developing countries and sometimes raise the grave danger of outside involvement. The world community therefore has a vital stake in strengthening the rule of law. It is the smaller countries of the world most of all whose well-being depends on the rule of law—on the principles of peaceful settlement of disputes, noninterference and respect for the sovereign independence of states.

Recently the world was shocked by the tragic events over the Sea of Japan.[9] The callous murder of 269 civilians aboard a commercial airliner was only compounded by the bald and careless lies of those responsible, and the absolute contempt they showed for the just inquiries of the international community. The Soviets even threatened that they would do it again. No remorse. No expression of regret or sorrow. It's apparent that they don't place the same value on human life that we do. Imagine saying, "We'd do it again."

I ask you: Would your own country wantonly shoot down an unarmed commercial airliner filled with innocent men, women, and children for any reason at all? Never. Nor would mine. When any nation shows such brazen disregard for the most basic rules of international behavior and the most elementary humanitarian considerations, it weakens the security of all nations and undermines the prospects for peace.

When developing countries come into conflict with each other, we believe that the best safeguard against expansion of local conflict is the concerted action of regional countries themselves—whether through institutions like the OAU, or informally, as the Maghreb countries have recently demonstrated. Such efforts will always have the support of the United States. On Lebanon, for instance, we are working with all concerned in an attempt to secure the peace and integrity of Lebanon. We are trying to help, not dictate.

Let me turn now to America's economic relations with the developing world. In the economic dimension, Algeria and America start from different philosophies. But we have learned that practical cooperation is not only fruitful but essential, because philosophy alone won't put a dollar or a dinar in your pocket, or contribute to a nation's economic development. Business is business. You need it and we need it.

The United States, too, was once a developing country, and our approach is very much colored by our historical experience. We have seen the free market system work—as a great liberator of talent, energy, initiative, and creativity. In our experience, technological innovation and economic growth came from the dynamism of private enterprise, not from government. And we saw this process of development work most effectively for us, in a political context of pluralist, constitutional democracy.

Other nations, we recognize, having a different history and philosophy, have chosen different models. Some have chosen ours, and we sincerely believe our approach has proven the most effective for many countries in the developing world. But we believe more strongly that every people should be free to choose their own way. We have no quarrel with those who choose a different economic system from ours—only with those who seek to impose their choice on others, or who claim to speak for workers without allowing workers to speak for themselves.

As Algerians know, there are no shortcuts to development. In the long term, trade—not aid—is the primary source of external resources to stimulate growth for all countries. In 1980, the developing countries had export earnings of about $580 billion. This amounted to 17 times their net inflow of resources from foreign aid. Therefore, the openness of the world's trading system is of crucial importance. As the world economy now moves toward recovery, it is most important for all of us to resist internal protectionist pressures—and indeed to move ahead on new measures of trade liberalization, such as we have undertaken with our Caribbean Basin initiative, with special care for the opportunities and vulnerabilities of the developing countries.

The United States has a strong tradition of support for development through bilateral and multilateral aid, through trade liberalization, through strengthening international institutions, and through technology transfer from the private sector. In the decade of the 1970's, the United States Government provided $57 billion to the developing world—$43 billion in official aid, and $14 billion in contributions to the multilateral development banks. Our foreign aid program has increased each year of the Reagan administration, even while many domestic programs for our citizens have been cut. The United States continues to be the world's largest contributor of official development aid, and over two-thirds of our aid goes to the poorest countries. We have played an active role in multilateral efforts to ease debt problems, and we are proud of it.

The bilateral economic relationship between the United States and Algeria is proof that cooperation can be mutually beneficial for two very different economic systems. You have welcomed modern technology from the West and yet preserved your values, your independence and your nonalignment. The United States is happy to have cooperated in algeria's technological progress. Our mutual experience shows that American private business and Algeria's enterprises nationales can work as partners, to mutual benefit. As Commerce Secretary Baldrige's recent visit demonstrated, we are ready to do more.

The American economy is now launched on a vigorous, sustained recovery. This is probably the single most important thing we can do to help restore growth in the developing world. In the United States, inflation and interest rates are way down from past years, and the key indicators of production are up sharply. We are embarked on a broad program of regulatory relief, to get the Federal Government off people's backs and out of their pockets. Growth with low inflation has also returned in Britain, Germany, Japan, and others, which together with the United States account for about three-quarters of the production of the industrialized nations. If we all maintain discipline in our policies and freedom in our trading system, the entire world may be headed into a new period of steady, long-term, noninflationary economic expansion.

We in the United States know that our own future is very much bound up with the future of the rest of the world. Political turmoil and regional conflict affect international security, which threatens us all. And our own economic health is very much enhanced by the economic vitality of the world economy, of which the developing world is an increasingly important part.

To any country that seeks freedom, peace, and free and fair trade, the United States will be a reliable friend. We look upon the problems of peace and economic development as challenges facing us all. We are prepared to do our part to help. We hope that others will meet us in the same spirit.

The United States is proud of its growing relations with Algeria and its long friendship with the people of the Maghreb. We are privileged to be able to work with you on the common agenda facing mankind. If we are at odds, there is little that we can accomplish separately. If we work together, there is much we can do to make the world a better place for all our peoples.

Thank you for your hospitality.

Economic Cooperation With Algeria

. . . . . .

Q. Augot, Agence France Presse. What do you think of the attitude of, rather the refusal of King Hassan II to talk with the Polisario directly?

A. Well the U.S. position on that is well known—we do support the referendum. Who talks to whom is an African matter and should be resolved between the various countries and interests involved. That is our position. We do favor the implementation of the OAU call for a referendum and we would like to see that go forward.

Q. Joelle Stolz, Radio France Internationale. You seem to want to have the United States participate in Algeria's economic development. But is the American Government ready to give guarantees—Government to Government—that Algeria, in general, has asked for in order to encourage economic contracts? Is the United States ready to give official guarantees to guarantee commercial contracts which may be concluded? Is the United States ready to give official guarantees to guarantee commercial agreements?

[10] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the Vice President. Vice President Bush answered questions from French and Algerian journalists at the Houari Boumedienne International Airport prior to his departure from Algiers.

A. You have to understand the American system. Our system is built on private enterprise. Our system is built on contracts with business enterprises in many things. Sometimes there is government to government. Often, most often, it is one entity in a country with private business enterprise, in which case there is no government guarantee and that's when one trades with the United States which is the largest producer in the world. That's the way it works. But for the most part, commercial deals are made with private business enterprises in the United States. Sometimes there are government guarantees.

[Q.] Taieb Belgiche, El Moudjahid. Mr. Vice President, I have three questions to ask of you. First, on your arrival you emphasized the fact that the United States is undertaking efforts to encourage and stimulate cooperation in the Maghreb. However, a conflict, that of the Western Sahara, unfortunately hinders these efforts. In the context of the (Western Sahara) conflict, the United States in 1979 greatly increased its shipment of arms to Morocco, as they said, to help them (the Moroccans) get out of the war and to resolve the problem through negotiation. This war continues five years later. Morocco continues to refuse to negotiate. Can't one conclude, therefore, that these arms deliveries to Morocco have actually encouraged Morocco to pursue the war, and could the shipments of arms encourage Morocco in other adventures by enlarging the field of confrontation? I have a second question, if you will. I have three questions to ask. You stated furthermore, in yesterday's speech [11] that the United States is not trying to introduce East-West differences into the issues which concern the Third World. Don't you think that these massive arms shipments could help to introduce, in fact, an East-West confrontation in this region?

A. The answer to that question is no. I will go back to the first question, but go ahead, I don't believe that. This isn't an East-West argument and the United States has no intention of making it into an East-West problem. It is a problem of the Maghreb. It is a problem for discussion, for negotiation and nothing in U.S. policy is designed to widen this dispute that everybody here is aware of to make it into a U.S.-Soviet thing. Absolutely not. And similarly anything that the United States has done by way of cooperation with Morocco should not be interpreted here, and I have had a chance to tell the leaders this, as anti-Algerian. The answer is not military action. The answer is consultation, implementation and discussion. And that's what we favor and the United States is in no position, nor do we want to be in a position, to dictate or impose, or anything of that nature. That is not our role, that is not our purpose. The third? This is what we call at home a "follow-on."

Q. Algerian Press Service (APS). Mr. Vice President, in your speech yesterday, you gave, if I may say so an apologia of the capitalistic system, and criticized in veiled terms, the countries of the East. Why have you chosen Algeria, a Socialist country, and one which has very good relations with countries of the Eastern (bloc), to deliver such a speech? What is your objective?

A. Well, you know, it was an excellent opportunity to address an important audience, not only of government officials and leaders, but of students, and our relationship with Algeria, you see, is a developing relationship, improving relationship. Just as it is important that a visit like this gives me a chance to talk to the Algerian Ministers and understand the conviction behind their system and their approach—or in this instance, your system, your approach—it is also important as this relationship develops that they understand convictions that we Americans have about our system. I am an advocate for our system, proud advocate for our system, not an apologia but having said that, at the same time we can have respect for the Algerian experience, for what Algeria is doing. The progress that Algeria has made. So I was up there saying this is what the United States is about, this is what our system is based on. We are proud of it, we think it is [has] helped not only the American people but a lot of other people, and we want you to understand how strongly we feel about it. Having said that, we respect what Algeria is doing, and I respect it more having had the opportunity to visit at length with President Chadli Bendjedid and President Bitat. And so many others who have given disproportionately of their time and that all means understanding, mutual understanding, mutual respect. That was what that was all about yesterday . . . .

U.S. Relations With Tunisia

BUSH. I have a short statement which we'll translate and then I will be glad to respond to your questions. Our departure today concludes our visit to the Maghreb, three countries—and in many ways it's fitting that Tunisia should be the last stop in this part of the world—I'd like to just take a moment to reflect on my stay here in Tunisia.

Though our stay was short, we were able to accomplish much—thanks largely to the Prime Minister's skill at getting straight to the heart of every matter. Even when we disagree, our differences are those of friends. Tunisia and the United States share a common approach to the world—an approach founded on the belief that international relations should be based not on subversion, threats, mindless calls to arms, but on cooperation, mutual respect, and reason. And here in the Maghreb—this dynamic, youthful, rapidly changing region of the world—the United States has no stauncher or more important friend than Tunisia. And this is just as true now as it's been for the last quarter of a century. We admire Tunisia's achievements, in which we are gratified to have been able to play a part. We support Tunisia's independence from external threats and pressures and we respect Tunisia's nonaligned status. Our support for Tunisia's security reflects not geopolitics, but our profound belief that the Tunisian model of responsible political and economic development is one which has achieved significant progress and one that some others—including those who sometimes cast a covetous eye on what Tunisia has done—would do well to emulate. The kind of international environment that we seek to foster is in essence one in which the Tunisias of the world are free to progress and develop in accordance with their particular national genius. And I am happy to say that I come away from this visit with a renewed and deepened sense of confidence, both in the underlying strength of our friendship, and in the achievement of Tunisia's institutions and political traditions.

And finally, Mrs. Bush and I want to especially thank President Bourguiba, as well as our good friends the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, and all their colleagues for all their wonderful hospitality. We really have been deeply impressed by the history which surrounds us here, the dynamism of a modern Tunis, and the warmth and the unquestionable sincerity of all the Tunisians that we have been privileged to meet. And now I'll be glad to take questions, yes sir.

Q. (In French) You have discussed a theme which Algiers holds especially dear, the movement for Arab Democratic Nationalism like ours, the theme of nonalignment. How do you think it is possible to reconcile on the geostrategic and economic plane this choice with the following facts: first of all the systematic policy favoring Israel adopted by the United States to the detriment of the fundamental interests of the Palestinians. Secondly, the accelerated development of RDF called for to intervene notably in the Gulf and on the African continent—a force which envisages attaining 4,000,000 men equipped [unintelligible]. Thirdly, the negative attitude adopted by the United States toward the Third World marked by the refusal to take into account the ultimate aspirations of the countries of the Third World for economic independence. And finally, fourthly, [unintelligible] the American administration, the theme of human rights and the U.S. support of non-democratic regimes.

[12] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the Vice President. Vice President Bush's opening statement was also printed in Department of State Bulletin, November 1983, p. 15. The press conference took place prior to the Vice President's departure for Yugoslavia.

A. This may take a while but I'll be glad to respond. First, I think I've answered the first part of your question as it relates to Israel. We have good, strong relations with many Arab countries, many muslim countries, and yes, we have good, strong relations with Israel, and I think I've explained to this gentleman what our policy is. I see no conflict at all between an RDF, Rapid Deployment Force, able to support strong friends of the United States, strong friends of Tunisia in the gulf. I see no conflict between that and nonalignment—none—no conflict whatsoever. There are radical elements that threaten the gulf. There are radical elements that threaten the Maghreb from time to time, there are radical elements that do not share Tunisia's view. And if they don't have a friend that is strong and willing to respond, where are they going to turn to protect their experiment in democracy and their progress and their independence. About question three, the negative attitudes of the United States on the Third World, I assume you are talking about North-South. I would like you to report accurately that the United States is by far—by far—the largest donor of multilateral aid, bilateral aid in the entire world. Helping people that want to become independent, helping people that are independent—by far—nobody is close to us. And that is done not to acquire power, not to acquire hegemony but because it's the right thing to do. Having said that, we think countries like Tunisia that encourage investment and jobs, encourage trade with other countries is on the right approach, rather than those countries that are always saying please give me more money, please give me more money, please give me more money. Tunisia has a different approach. We respect it. and yet we have tried to be helpful to them in both aid and in terms of investment opportunity. Lastly, human rights, we're not perfect. But who is? The United States commitment to human rights is well known throughout the world. There is no retreat, but it is not our intention to dictate on the internal affairs of every country with whom we have aid arrangements or whatever kind of arrangements that they have to be exactly like we are. That is not our view. It is not our view that we should intervene in the internal affairs of every country and say unless you conform to our total standard of human rights we'll have nothing to do with you. That's not our approach. And yet our commitment to human rights remains strong. If you don't believe it, attend a press conference in Washington, D.C. You would hear the criticism people get there. This is mild.

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Rabat, December 11, 1983 (Extracts) [16]

Secretary Shultz's Meeting With King Hassan II

. . . . . .

Q. What about the discussions you had this afternoon with King Hassan II?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The discussions went on for around two and a half hours. We discussed matters of mutual interest having to do with the Middle East—Lebanon, the peace process, the problems of the Palestinians. We discussed bilateral questions involving Morocco and the United States. We discussed His Majesty's initiative in calling for a referendum, and of course the United States supports that. We discussed events in Europe. King Hassan was interested in the meetings I had just been in, NATO meetings. In other words, they were very wide ranging discussions.

Q. Mr. Secretary, what's the American perception concerning the development of events in West Africa, if the African parties responsible for the preparation of the referendum refuse the suggestion which was proposed by His Majesty the King as the final solution to the problem of the Sahara?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think first of all we have to wait; there is an initiative that His Majesty has proposed, and I think that if people have an opportunity to express themselves, that's really the proper way to do it. I hope that people from around the world will support this initiative, and I hope that it does come to pass.

Q. Mr. Secretary, did the King or any of the other Moroccan officials have anything to say about the new strengthened relationship between the United States and Israel?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I described the intent of our recent visit from Prime Minister Shamir and also from President Gemayel, and I think His Majesty was well posted among the subjects that we discussed.

Q. Did he show any enthusiasm?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. His Majesty is a very sophisticated man and I think I won't speak for him, he'll speak for himself, but from my standpoint we had a searching and satisfactory discussion.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, did you and the King discuss any ways of putting momentum behind President Reagan's peace plan for the Middle East, and if so, what was said?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We did discuss that at great length and His Majesty had a number of suggestions. Without feeling it proper to try to quote His Majesty, I believe, myself, that the problem of the Palestinians is at the center of the issue, and of course what we look for, and have wanted to see for a long time, is a legitimate group of Palestinians join with King Hussein and be ready to sit down at the peace table with Israel, and try to work out what sort of arrangements will bring about stability in that part of the world. We did discuss that and other issues of the Middle East in great detail.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you heard during your stop in Tunis [17] considerable criticism of the recent U.S.-Israeli policy and I am wondering if you have heard similar criticism here during your stop in Morocco?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We have certainly discussed the U.S.-Israeli relationship, and particularly the relation of some of our thinking, with the Israelis, when they visited us, to the Soviet buildup in Syria, but

I found the discussion here was constructive and informative in tone, and I tried to respond and describe what we were doing and thinking. So far as I can see, it was received in that same spirit. But of course, I don't wish at all to speak for the Moroccans or King Hassan; they'll speak for themselves.

Security Assistance to Oman and Yemen

. . . . . .

—Oman, strategically located on the Strait of Hormuz, is making a major contribution to our Southwest Asian security posture by granting the U.S. access to military facilities. By providing modest military and economic assistance, we demonstrate that we are prepared to support the very real security needs of this country, which faces Iran across the Strait and which has a history of past conflict with Soviet-backed South Yemen.

—The Yemen Arab Republic, The poorest nation in the region, occupies a critical location on the southern border of Saudi Arabia and at the Bab al-Mandab entrance to the Red Sea. Our assistance to Yemen contributes an important increment to its development needs and, in cooperation with Saudi Arabia, makes a vital contribution to its security and that of the Arabian Peninsula generally.

The United States has a strong interest in the stability and orientation of these countries over the period ahead. Our continuing support to help them face external and internal challenges is a major factor in advancing our interests in the region.

For Oman in fiscal year 1984, we are requesting $15 million ESF, $45 million in FMS guarantees and $100,000 for IMET. Under the FY 1983 supplemental request, Oman would receive $10 million in FMS for a total of $40 million in this fiscal year.

Oman has given vital support to U.S. interests in the region by allowing access for our forces to specified ports and airfields. These facilities, which would be crucial to any effort to confront aggression in the Gulf, are now being improved under a major construction program. It is important that Oman's armed forces be modernized so that they can contribute even more effectively to Oman's defense. Moreover, Oman has accepted risks and criticism by its steadfast support of the Camp David peace process and particularly of Egypt's role.

Omani security needs are real. Oman shares a common border with Soviet-backed South Yemen. Though tension between the two countries has eased, South Yemen still represents a security threat to the Sultantate. In addition, potentially hostile Iran is only a few miles distant across the Strait of Hormuz. By providing modest assistance, we can demonstrate that we are committed to a growing security relationship as part of our strategy in the area.

Our relationship with Oman also recognizes the rapid progress this country has made during the past decade in creating modern economic and social infrastructure where a traditional society existed before. Oman has been helped in this endeavor by its oil income. But these resources are small by the standards of the region and in relation to the development task it is facing. The country has received substantial assistance from friendly countries in this difficult task and will rely on similar help in the future.

For the introduction and conclusion of Placke's prepared statement and his description of proposed assistance to Jordan, see document 331.

In an effort to broaden our relationship with Oman beyond its security aspects, the U.S.-Oman Joint Commission was established in 1980 in conjuncion with the facilities access agreement. We provide $5 million a year in ESF grants to fund the operation of the Joint Commission, feasibility and design studies, technical assistance and training. A $10 million ESF loan program has thus far concentrated on water resources and is planned in fiscal 1984 for school construction.

For the Yemen Arab Republic in fiscal year 1984, we are requesting $28 million in Development Assistance, $3 million in PL-480 Title I, $15 million in grant Military Assistance Program and $1.5 million in IMET for fiscal year 1984. Our fiscal year 1983 supplemental asks $6 million in FMS guarantees for a total of $10 million, and $4 million MAP for a total of $5 million in FY 1983.

U.S. economic and security assistance in Yemen is part of our effort to counter the Soviet challenge in the Middle East and to confront the challenge of radical forces in the region. Our security assistance helps to provide Yemen with an alternative to exclusive reliance on the Soviet Union from which Yemen for a long period obtained the bulk of its military supplies.

The YAR scored a series of victories over Marxist-led insurgents last year, culminating in a cease-fire which left the YAR government in the most secure position it has enjoyed since the outbreak of the insurgency. However, the threat of externally sponsored aggression or subversion persists, and the threat is aggravated by Yemen's presently deteriorating economic condition.

The YAR is unable to utilize FMS funds because these would increase its medium-term debt burden. Nevertheless, the country has essential training requirements related to the 1979-80 arms purchase financed by Saudi Arabia. These requirements cannot be fully met through our IMET program, and we are requesting grant funds in FY 1984 in recognition of the Yemeni financial situation. This training contributes to Yemen's security and lessens Yemen's dependency on Soviet military assistance. This continues the process of orienting Yemen toward moderate Arab States and the West. A portion of the MAP funds will also be utilized for purchase of required spare parts and ammunition.

It is equally important that we contribute to Yemen's effort to develop its human and economic resources. The severe earthquake last December added a new dimension to Yemen's already troubled economic situation, which has experienced declining levels of foreign aid and reduced remittances from workers in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States. The proposed new PL-480 Title I program represents a further modest but recognizable effort to respond to Yemen's increased economic need.

Our development assistance funds will continue programs designed to meet basic human needs in education, primary health care, and a major effort in the agricultural sector and rural water systems. We also intend to initiate a modest family planning project. Many of these programs are integrated with efforts of other donors with whom we seek close cooperation to maximize the impact of the limited aid funds available. Our projects concentrate on the development of human and organizational resources upon which the Yemen can build its own development programs.

We believe that our developmental and military assistance programs correctly address the most pressing needs of the YAR in a realistic manner, and represent the most effective and efficient use of the assistance resources we are presently able to provide.

Statements by President Reagan and Sultan Qaboos, April 12, 1983 [2]

Reaffirmation of U.S.-Omani Friendship

THE PRESIDENT. Your Majesty, it's always a pleasure for me to meet good friends on behalf of the American people. But welcoming you, a courageous and admirable leader, is, indeed, an honor.

I've read of your many accomplishments, your commitment to your people and your dedication to your ideals. And I've looked forward to this day when we could meet face to face.

Your Majesty, the American people are deeply impressed by what you've achieved. Since you assumed leadership, your country's progress—economically, socially and politically— has established your reputation as a compassionate leader who can get things done. In an inspiring commitment to the long-run interest of your people, you've built a modern educational system, of which any country would be proud.

Similarly, the level of health care available to your people is testimony to the humane character and businesslike efficiency of your leadership, and your building the infrastructure of a modern economy, fulfilling the prerequisites for progress for your people.

Your Majesty, we're pleased that as your friends we were able to make some small, but we hope significant, contribution to your bold endeavors. In your 1980 National Day address, you put forth a goal to your people. You said, "Self-reliance is to be the keystone of all our plans for the future." With this as a guidepost, you have moved forward to diversify your economy.

Now, the people of Oman are able to rely on agriculture, mining, industry, fishing and other commercial endeavors, in addition to oil, to support an acceptable quality of life. We applaud this far-sighted approach and hope that we can continue to play a helpful role.

But, Your Majesty, as you're keenly aware, peace and security are irreplaceable ingredients for progress. It is no secret that vital national interests motivate the United States in the Middle East. We and our allies depend on oil originating there, much of it moving close to your shores through the Straits of Hormuz.

Yet, unlike another world power which encourages and exploits conflict, the United States sees its interests fulfilled in regional peace and stability. We are, thus, committed to work with those in the Middle East who need our help to secure peace and to deter outside aggression. To this end, we've made rapid progress in recent years, developing the capability of coming to the assistance of our friends, wherever they may be.

I'd like to take this opportunity to thank you, your Majesty, for your support of our efforts to deter aggression. The brutality we've witnessed in Afghanistan, the attempt to suppress an entire population, the debasement of its religion and the use of chemical weapons and other crimes against civilization, suggest that our concerns are well founded.

In recent years, you've made many laudable contributions to peace. We appreciate, for example, your continued support for peaceful accommodation between Israel, Egypt and its other Arab neighbors. The United States remains morally committed to further progress in the direction of peace and security for all the peoples of the Middle East. The plan I outlined on September 1st last year is still on the table.

While there may be bumps along the way, we will not be deterred from our long-term objective, which is a broad-based settlement firmly grounded on United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and consistent with the Camp David framework.

As we speak now, radical elements are seeking to prevent an agreement which would permit King Hussein of Jordan to join the peace process. The choices facing the Palestinian leaders are clear—either the status quo and the continued frustration of their peoples' aspirations or a bold and courageous move to break the deadlock.

For our part, we will not permit the forces of violence and terror to exercise a veto over the peace process. Commenting about the conflicts surrounding Israel, you recently observed, "People now want to see the problem solved once and for all in every respect."

Your Majesty, that is certainly our desire. And I can assure you, we will spare no effort to put an end to the killing and to bring this dreadful chapter in Middle East history to a conclusion acceptable to all sides.

I look forward to discussing this problem and other important matters relating to Middle East peace with you today. Lasting peace will come when individuals of good will, though in disagreement at times, work together to prevent conflict. We have followed with interest your own efforts to foster regional cooperation, particularly the improvement in your relations with South Yemen. We wish you continued success in your attempts to eliminate the causes of tension and instability in the Gulf.

Your Majesty, we're proud to be on your side in your quest for a better life for your people and your search for peace and stability. Relations between our two peoples have spanned a century and a half. I am confident that your visit today will serve to further strengthen the bonds between us. We're happy that you have come to visit, and welcome.

SULTAN QABOOS. Thank you very much. (Applause)

Mr. President, I greatly appreciate the warm and generous words with which you have welcomed me to your great country today. It gives me particular pleasure that this, my first state visit, should so happily coincide with the 150th anniversary of the establishment of those friendly relations which have remained constant between our two countries to the present day. That these relations should have stood the test of time with which [such?] constancy is hardly surprising, for our two peoples share common and deeply cherished traditions which lie at the very foundation of our national existence.

Indeed, it was these profound beliefs in tolerance, justice, and determination to defend freedom and to uphold the sanctity of human rights which provided the great impulse which brought men from many parts of the world more than 200 years ago in a pilgrimage to this beautiful land to realize their dream of a new life and to found a nation which would enshrine those principles forever.

Mr. President, over years the United States of America has striven unceasingly to make this world a better place for humanity, but nothing you have achieved has surpassed the example of your steadfast championship of those principles often at great sacrifice and in the face of the most daunting obstacles. I and my people who have, ourselves, fought through many bitter years of struggle to maintain our country's freedom and will do so again should the need ever arise are deeply conscious of this. For we know from our own experience that peace must go hand-in-hand with dignity and freedom; that life, if it is to be worth living, can only be founded on justice and respect for humanity and that these prizes are not easily won or preserved.

I believe that the world has never stood in greater need for these values than it does today. In recent years, the forces of aggression, intolerance, and lawless ambition have increasingly sought to impose their will on mankind. The world has had no respite from the continuing threat of instability.

Nowhere has this threat been more acutely felt than in our own region of the Middle East where we and our brother states of the Gulf Cooperation Council [3] have pledged ourselves to work together in the closest accord to safeguard our peoples and our ancient culture.

Mr. President, I welcome the constructive understanding your country is showing of the problems which confront our region. And I am convinced that the measures you have taken will greatly contribute to the maintenance of peace and security there. I, also, warmly commend the endeavors you have made to help bring about an honorable solution to the strategic Middle East situation, endeavors which, as you know, Oman has unswervingly supported. It is imperative that efforts to achieve this solution continue not only in the cause of common humanity, but because so long as the present situation persists, then so long will it present a continuing threat to world peace and provide opportunity for those forces which exploit the misery and dissension it perpetuates to further their own ambitions.

Mr. President, I am sure that my visit will not only serve as a reaffirmation of the cordial relationship that has for so long existed between our two countries but will further strengthen the mutual confidence and understanding upon which that relationship rests. (Applause)

Visit of Sultan Qaboos of Oman

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me start with a little bit of background. This is the first visit by the Sultan in 8 years. He was here in 1975. We have had 150 years of political relations, as the Sultan mentioned in his remarks. [5] And we opened our Embassy in Muscat on July 4, 1972.

The visit symbolizes the importance the U.S. administration attaches to both U.S.-Omani bilateral relations and to the important constructive role played by Oman under Sultan Qaboos in the Gulf and in Mideast regional affairs.

We had four general objectives: To permit the Sultan and the President to know each other; to form personal relationships; to strengthen and broaden the already close relations between Oman and the United States; to review regional security and political issues and U.S.-Omani cooperation in dealing with these issues; to discuss the peace process, President Reagan's peace initiative and other regional issues.

The first meeting took place from 10:30 a.m. to 11 a.m., approximately, in the Oval Office. Present on our side were the President, Vice President, Secretary of State, Judge Clark and Ambassador John Countryman. On the Omani side, there was the Sultan and the Foreign Minister. I will have to get you other names from the White House, if you're interested.

This meeting of approximately half hour, apart from get-together discussions, touched on a variety of issues. But at the beginning of the broader meeting, which started at approximately 11 a.m., the President introduced the broader meeting by briefly reviewing the discussions in the previous meeting where there was a very heavy focus on the peace process.

In the discussions, there was a brief review of bilateral issues, in which we have no problems. It was more a quick review of elements of this relationship. There was a discussion of the peace process. The discussion involved the issue of how the recent position of the PLO leaders, as communicated to King Hussein, serves the Palestinian cause in general and the rights of the approximately 1 1/2 million Palestinian people under occupation in particular. Both sides acknowledge that there were problems at the present time as we look to the future of the peace process, but they also agreed on the need to persevere in the search for peace and stability in the area.

As you know, the Sultan and Oman have been strong supporters of the Camp David Accords, and Oman is a strong supporter of the President's September 1 initiative.

On Lebanon, the Sultan emphasized the need for an early solution there to allow Lebanon to be free of all foreign forces, give it the chance it deserves to develop itself. In the context of his remarks he noted the dangers to the Lebanese consensus of continued foreign occupation.

There was also a thorough discussion of the Iran–Iraq war, of the dangers of the continuation of this war which was generally recognized to be useless and purposeless bloodshed at this point, the need for meaningful initiative to try to bring the hostilities to an end.

Apart from the basic issues of security and stability for the area, there was also discussion of the very great ecological danger of the current oil spill which is a by-product of this war.

There was some discussion on the Omani side on the meetings taking place in a regional, marine ecological body, to which all of the Gulf countries and Iran belong, in the hope that this forum could lead to agreements which could allow the oil spill to be taken care of.

. . . . . .

Q. Despite what they discussed, is there a role that the United States feels the Sultan can play in getting—in your plan? Is there, despite what they discussed, is there a role the United States feels the Sultan can play in getting the peace talk back on track or the negotiations back on track?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We think that the Sultan's support is extremely important in itself. And I think that he personally, and Oman's influence within the GCC is important, has grown over the last period of time. We think that's the most important role that the Omanis can play at this time is to continue to indicate their support. And—

Q. —have any discussion at all of U.S. forces in the Gulf region?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Not in the sense of U.S. forces in the Gulf region. As you know, we have a very close, cooperative relationship with Oman in the security field. They have made available to us certain facilities to be used in emergencies. Those bilateral issues were described or discussed very satisfactorily during a visit that Admiral Howe, the Director in Political Military Affairs in State, and General Secord of ISA made out to Oman a couple of months ago. So, there was no issue with respect to that but a general review of our cooperation is probably the best way to discuss it.

Q. On the influence of Oman in the GCC, are you expecting the Sultan to persuade or did he ask him to persuade the Gulf states to support the Reagan initiative?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No. The Sultan supports the Reagan initiative. He's made no secret of it. Everyone knows this. And, as I said earlier, we believe that his continued support for the initiative is very important. And we have no doubt that—

Q. My question is with the influence in the GCC.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me put it this way. Nothing would please us more than if the entire GCC endorsed the Sultan's support of the President's initiative. But those are issues for them to work out.

Q. Did the Sultan bring any message from other leaders of the Arab world? Or did the President give him a message to take back to his fellow leaders concerning the peace process?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The Sultan did not bring messages from others. He came here in his own right. Obviously, in any discussion between a Gulf leader and the President of the United States when this leader addresses an issue of regional concern—be it the Lebanese problem or the peace process or the Iran–Iraq War, he speaks with some confidence in representing the views of others. I would say in that sense, he very clearly expressed at times that he was expressing opinions which others shared with him, but no real message.

To the extent that the President gave the Sultan a message, it was that we are—whether he shares it or not is up to him—but clearly that we are committed to our relationship of bilateral cooperation with Oman, that the Gulf remains an extremely important area, a priority American interest, a vital American interest that we intend to promote, and that the President remains committed to the search for peace and his own plan, and that we remain determined to achieve a settlement on Lebanon.

Statements by President Reagan and Emir Khalifa, July 19, 1983 [6]

State Visit of the Emir of Bahrain

THE PRESIDENT. Your Highness, it is a pleasure for Nancy and me to welcome you to the United States as a guest of the American people. Your concern for your people is well-known, particularly your commitment to the education and economic well-being of your citizens. Your personal involvement in the problems of even the humblest of your countrymen is legendary. For these reasons and others, I've looked forward to the day when we could meet.

Your Highness, you've guided Bahrain through a difficult first decade of independence with admirable skill, bringing economic progress with imaginative leadership. With far fewer oil resources than some of your neighbors, you've transformed Bahrain into a financial and industrial center with one of the most diversified economies in the region. Just as important, because of your progressive leadership, Bahrain also leads the area in health care and education. As it has been since ancient times, Bahrain continues to be a place where people of different cultures and religions live together in tolerance and peace. Your efforts to build a humane and diverse society provide an effective link in the exchange of technical skills and cultural values between East and West.

Under your leadership, Bahrain continues to be an inspiring example for all of the Middle East and the world. The American people are pleased to have been counted as supportive friends as you built this record of achievement. Our two peoples have been partners for progress and peace since the beginning of this century. We have found this relationship to be of great mutual benefit. Many of the 70 United States companies in Bahrain today continue to train Bahrainis in technology and other skills whether they be modern banking techniques, setting up new industries, or preparing coaches and athletes for Bahrain's Olympic teams. Our long history of private sector cooperation is a shining example of what can be achieved in a partnership based on mutual trust and respect.

Your Highness, as you are keenly aware, continued prosperity for your people and those of the Gulf region depend on peace and security. It is no secret that the United States has a vital national interest in the Middle East. We and our allies depend on oil originating there, much of it produced in and nearby your country. Yet we also recognize the value of partnership and respect for the culture and aspirations of states like your own—unlike another world power which seeks to impose its system by encouraging and exploiting conflict and unrest. But the United States seeks peace and stability. Together with other peace-loving nations in the Gulf region, we've made rapid progress in recent years, not only by helping our friends meet their own defense requirements but also by developing our own ability to come to their assistance should the need ever arise.

Many Americans who work in the region have experienced hospitality of the Bahraini people and for this I am most appreciative. During his recent visit, Crown Prince Hamad deepened his friendship between our two countries.

Your Highness, I want to assure you that I share your concern about the conflict between Iraq and Iran. The loss of tens of thousands of young men on both sides and the destruction borne by both countries is tragic.

I look forward to consulting with you about what more our countries might do to encourage a negotiated end to this conflict which threatens the security and even the marine ecology of the entire area.

We have appreciated your government's understanding as we pursue our goal of seeking the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and securing a settlement for the Palestinian people that is firmly rooted in the principles of security and justice embodied in the United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

As you know, Secretary Shultz returned recently from the Middle East.[7] We remain undaunted in our effort to prevent the forces of violence from exercising a veto over the rights of the Lebanese people. The people of Lebanon must have restored their basic human right to pursue their own destiny in an atmosphere of peace, security and mutual trust.

I look forward to discussing our many common concerns with you today. I know our shared goals of peace and prosperity for the region can be met in the same spirit of good will and partnership that has characterized our friendship thus far.

On behalf of the American people it is my privilege to welcome you to the United States. (Applause)

EMIR KHALIFA. Mr. President, I would like to offer my appreciation and thanks for the kind thoughts expressed in your address towards the State of Bahrain and for the welcome and hospitalities extended to us from the very beginning of our official visit to your friendly country. This indicates the strength of the friendly ties existing between our two countries.

I offer my genuine good wishes to the friendly people of the United States of America for their well being and prosperity.

I believe that this visit will succeed in developing the relations between our two countries, open up a new chapter in our fruitful cooperation and support our efforts to help maintain peace, security and justice for the world community. As you have referred, Mr. President, in your address, to some of the most important economic and political issues in the world, I should commend in this respect the positive role you play for the prosperity and security of the world. We, no doubt, support and uphold the great effort you make in this field; as we firmly believe that such issues are very important for the progress of the individual in the modern world and that without them clashes and war will break out. Clashes and war will break out and destroy all of the progress made over the years.

In the light of many common views we share in the political field, we believe, as you do, that the Middle East problem comes in the forefront of political issues in the world. It is one of the burning and explosive problems in the world, which passes now through a very dangerous stage that poses a serious threat to the world peace and security.

This imposes upon us the duty to make every effort to save the region from this disastrous situation. We hope that the sincere and good effort you make to find a suitable solution to this problem will result in establishing just and durable peace in the region which has been exposed to five major wars within 35 years with disastrous effects to its people. The tragic events in Lebanon and the damage it has suffered are but some of many inevitable results of the explosive situation in the region. Lebanon deserves all the help and backings so that its government will exercise full control over its unified territories.

We believe that—we believe that there will be no hope of stability in the Middle East without the application of the same universal principles upon the people of the region; and concluding, the Palestinian people, when they are dealing with their legitimate right to live in peace within secure national boundaries.

We are prepared to do our best and participate in every sincere, international effort to establish security in the Middle East region, within this framework, in order to put an end to this terrible conflict and enable the people of the region to live in peace.

Finally, it is my pleasure to conclude, by wishing you, Mr. President, all the success in your efforts for the progress and advance of the friendly people of the United States of America, and to bring peace, justice, and prosperity to the people of the world.

Thank you. (Applause)

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

Areas of U.S.-Bahraini Interest

. . . . . .

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Just let me tell you the Emir was in the room with the Foreign Minister and the Minister of Health and one of his senior court advisers. On our side, there was the President, Vice President, Secretaries of State and Defense, Bill Clark, and Ambassador Sutherland.

The subjects that were discussed—a bit first on the bilateral relationship. There was really just a discussion of some of the issues, some of the topics and a reaffirmation of our interest—mutual interest in close cooperative relations. Most of the time was spent on regional issues, Middle East peace—focus on the Palestinian problem, a discussion of the Reagan initiative; Lebanon, agreement on the need to get all external forces out, a need to break the current impasse; Iran-Iraq war, they discussed the urgency and agreed on the urgency of finding a solution; Soviet issues, the problems of the Soviets in Afghanistan, the pressures this puts on the Gulf; the problems of instability in the general area redounding to the benefit of the Soviets. Our visitors were quite concerned about the threats this posed to the conservative monarchies of the Gulf.

The President asked the Secretary to discuss his current visit to the area and there was a focus on Syria, Syrian attitudes, on Lebanon. Now, a large part of the discussion was on Lebanon, in part because of the merits of the case, in part because of the topicality. President Gemayel is arriving. [9]

Then in the context of discussing the Iran-Iraq war, there was a considerable discussion—the President and the Vice President and the Emir on the problems of trying to find a way to isolate the oil spill, to cap the wells, to avoid further harm to the marine ecology. We discussed the things we have been trying to do individually and to some extent together, noting that the American experts are in place just waiting to be given the green light from a security point of view in order to end that threat to the ecology of the area.

Kuwait's Request For Withdrawal of an Ambassadorial Appointment

. . . . . .

Q. Do you have anything on the story in the Post today regarding Mr. Grove and the refusal of Kuwait to accept him as a U.S. Ambassador? [11]

A. Yes, I do. It is correct that the Government of Kuwait asked the United States to withdraw its request for agreement to the assignment of Mr. Grove as the next American Ambassador to Kuwait, succeeding Ambassador Francois M. Dickman.

In making its request, the Government of Kuwait indicated the sole reason for rejecting Mr. Grove's nomination was that he had until recently served as Counsel [Consul] General in Jerusalem. We profoundly disagree with the suggestion that because one of our finest professional officers has been assigned to one post he cannot be assigned to another.

We have made known our views at the highest levels of the Government of Kuwait. A practical consequence of the Kuwaiti action is that the United States is not now represented at the Ambassadorial level in Kuwait. We have no immediate plans to nominate another candidate.

. . . . . .

Q. Just one more follow-up. Is it actually the first case like this, that an Arab country rejects a U.S. diplomat because of his service in Israel, or were there some cases like this in the past?

A. I am not aware of a precedent for rejecting a diplomat for service in Jerusalem or in Israel.

Q. The question was service in Israel. Was he actually accredited to the Israeli Government or not?

A. No. That's why I phrased my answer the way I did in response to the question. We would find objectionable a restriction of this sort in any event. In light of U.S. policy on Jerusalem, however, we find it especially ironic that the Government of Kuwait chose to take the decision it did. We've had a consistent Jerusalem policy for three decades. We do not recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital. We have never recognized unilateral actions by any state in the area as affecting the status of Jerusalem.

We regard East Jerusalem as occupied territory within the meaning of U.N. Security Council Resolution 242 and subject to applicable international law and conventions.

The Counsel [Consul] General in Jerusalem, therefore, holds a special status. He is not accredited to the Government of Israel. He reports directly to the Department of State rather than through the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv.

Joint Communiqué of the U.S.-Saudi Arabian Joint Commission on Economic Cooperation, Riyadh, October 26, 1983 (Extracts) [12]

Economic Relations With Saudi Arabia

The United States-Saudi Arabian Joint Commission on Economic Cooperation convened its Eighth Formal Session in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, October 25–26, 1983. The Minister of Finance and National Economy of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, His Excellency Mohammed Albalkhail, and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the Honorable Donald T. Regan, Co-Chaired the meeting.

During the Eighth Session of the Joint Commission, the delegation of senior level United States Government policy officials had an opportunity to review with their Saudi Arabian counterparts the progress achieved over the last year in the cooperative programs carried out under the auspices of the Joint Commission, and to discuss new initiatives for the enhancement of mutual goals. Each delegation reaffirmed the high priority its government places on the bilateral technical cooperation under the Joint Commission and the significant contribution the program makes to strengthening ties between the two countries.

Discussions took place at two levels. During Plenary Sessions the two delegations met as a whole to review overall Joint Commission progress, to consider issues of general interest, and to formalize new program activities. In addition, delegates met in counterpart working sessions to review specific programs being implemented by United States and Saudi Arabian Government organizations and to discuss issues and future plans.

Secretary Regan and other members of the United States delegation paid calls on several senior Saudi Arabian Government officials outside the framework of the Joint Commission. Discussions took place on topics of mutual interest including global economic and financial developments, the international debt and liquidity situation, and bilateral trade, tax, and investment issues. It was agreed that these sessions served to reinforce the strong ties of cooperation and friendship which have long existed between the two countries.

The United States-Saudi Arabian Business Dialogue met concurrently with the Joint Commission to confer on issues of private sector interest to both countries. Dialogue members participated with the official delegations in the opening and closing sessions of the Joint Commission proceedings.

The delegations reviewed progress achieved on several initiatives proposed last year to strengthen ties between the business and university communities in the two countries.

A major highlight of the meeting this year was the signing of two new program agreements in the areas of emergency medical services and space-related science and technology. A third program agreement was signed to extend cooperation in transportation.

. . . . . .

The highly productive proceedings were marked by open, constructively frank and friendly discussions which have characterized the Joint Commission since its inception. The Eighth Session of the Joint Commission was the largest ever held, involving twelve U.S. Government departments and agencies in program activities of twelve Saudi Government ministries and agencies. The two delegations noted with satisfaction the impressive progress which has been made since the establishment of the Joint Commission in 1974. [13]

The commission expressed its appreciation to all of the participating Saudi Arabian ministries and American departments and agencies for their commitment and dedication toward achieving the goals of United States-Saudi Arabian economic and technical cooperation.

The Joint Commission approved the issuance of its Annual Report, to be issued shortly in both Arabic and English. [14]

The Co-Chairmen agreed to hold the next Joint Commission meeting in Washington in 1984.

Bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Kuwait

Second, regarding the bombings in Kuwait, let me give you a rather extensive rundown of what we know, and it may also—just to caution you—pretty much exhaust current information.

At approximately 0630 Greenwich mean time, which was 9:30 a.m. local time today, a Mercedes truck crashed through the main gate of the American Embassy compound in Kuwait. The truck proceeded about 50 yards to an Embassy annex, where a large bomb was detonated. The explosion collapsed part of the annex building and caused extensive damage to the Chancery and to other buildings in the compound.

Information on casualties is still incomplete. Initial reports indicate that four persons were killed and 37 injured; two persons are missing. Two of the dead have been identified as foreign nationals who were working in the Embassy's maintenance section. The two other fatalities have not been identified. Of the 37 people injured, 20 were foreign service nationals; the other 17 were visitors to the Embassy or private contractors. Some of the foreign service nationals injured are in serious condition.

[15] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. Alan Romberg made the statement at the Department of State Daily Press Briefing, which began at 12:24 p.m.

All Americans are accounted for, and, although some American employees suffered minor injuries, none was hospitalized. Efforts to clear the debris are continuing.

We have received reports of other bombings in Kuwait. Information is fragmentary, although the targets included the French Embassy and the Kuwait Airport's control tower. Another location was reportedly near the SAS Hotel and the adjoining offices of the Raytheon Corporation. The extent of casualties and damage is unknown.

Any more specific information would need to come from Kuwaiti Government authorities.

We deplore all of the attacks in the strongest terms. They will not deter us from pursuing a steady policy in the Middle East.

As to responsibility, we have seen media reports that a group calling itself the "Islamic Jihad" has claimed responsibility for the attack. We have no independent confirmation of these reports. An organization calling itself the Islamic Jihad, among other organizations, claimed responsibility for the bombings in Beirut. We have no idea whether they are related.

As to prior warnings, there was no prior warning of this attack. The Embassy has in the past received several security threats and has tried to take appropriate security precautions, especially in the wake of the recent bombings in Beirut.[16] Obviously, though, embassies by their nature must be accessible to the public and cannot be made into armed fortresses. This limits the type of protective measures that can be taken.

On some specifics, there are about 3,000 U.S. citizens in Kuwait. There are some 65 Americans assigned to the Embassy, with about 237 dependents.

I should note that the Kuwaiti Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Shaykh Sabah al-Ahmad al Sabah, came to the Embassy compound shortly after the blast to express condolences on behalf of the Emir of Kuwait, the Crown Prince and the Kuwaiti Government. The Foreign Minister offered to the Embassy his government's complete cooperation and assistance. The Kuwaiti Ambassador to the United States, Shaykh Saud Nasir al-Sabah, who has been in Kuwait on consultations, also went to the Embassy to offer his condolences and assistance.

The State Department is monitoring the situation very closely. Because of the uncertainty of this situation in Kuwait at this time, we recommend that nonessential travel be deferred for a few days until we have a clearer reading of the situation as it would affect the safety of Americans.

Statements by President Reagan and Egyptian President Mubarak, January 27, 1983 [1]

Visit of President Mubarak

THE PRESIDENT. President Mubarak and I have just had a comprehensive and a useful discussion first in our office and then over lunch. And, as might be expected, given our full partnership in search for regional peace and security that—with broad agreement on the critical issues facing us in the Middle East and in Africa.

We reviewed the situation in Lebanon and I assured President Mubarak of my determination to support the territorial integrity, the independence and the sovereignty of Lebanon to the end. And to that end, there must be early withdrawal of all foreign forces.

[1] Source: White House Press Release, January 27, 1983. Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, January 31, 1983, pp. 125–126. Presidents Reagan and Mubarak made their remarks to reporters at the South Portico of the White House at 1:28 p.m., following a meeting in the Oval Office. President Mubarak's official working visit to Washington lasted from January 26 to 31, 1983.

We also discussed the urgent need to achieve a comprehensive peace settlement for the Middle East, which would permit all the states in the region to live in peace while meeting the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people.

In that regard, I thanked President Mubarak for his support of my September peace initiative and promise to work closely with him to expand the peace process.

On Africa, I reaffirmed our support for Egypt's constructive efforts as the leading African power to promote the stability and development of African countries and institutions.

On the bilateral questions, I reiterated the importance of our economic and military assistance for Egypt and assured the President that our assistance will compliment his economic policy and development priorities.

Specifically, we wish to support the priorities of the new Egyptian Five-Year Plan with emphasis on the increasing agriculture and industrial productivity and the rehabilitation and expansion of the water and related disposal systems in Egypt's major urban centers.

In response to President Mubarak's request for more flexible economic assistance, our ministries will work together to find ways and means for rapidly dispersing such assistance.

We also will explore with the Congress the ways to permit some reprogramming of funds to high priority areas.

President Mubarak's visit, the second since he was elected to office, emphasizes the special nature of our relations with Egypt and the importance I assign his friendship and wise counsel.

Our two countries share a common dedication to building in the Middle East something that is peaceful and prosperous and secure from outside intervention.

The Egyptian-American full partnership has accomplished much toward the realization of that ideal. We will continue to build on our record of accomplishment. And I look forward to working with our friend, my friend, President Mubarak, toward that end.

And welcome to our country once again.

PRESIDENT MUBARAK. Thank you, Mr. President.

I was very pleased to meet again with my friend, President Reagan, and to pursue our discussions of issues of mutual concern.

As the President just stated, we had an opportunity to review the situation in the Middle East with a view of enhancing the prospects for peace and stability in that troubled region.

We focused on the situation in Lebanon and the negotiations on the Palestinian question. I welcomed President Reagan's assurances of the U.S. determination to continue to play the role of the full partner in the peace process.

I also welcomed his reaffirmation of the U.S. commitment to support the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of Lebanon.

The time factor is crucial to the success of our endeavors. Top priority must be given to reaching agreement on the withdrawal of Israeli forces. Upon achieving that, other aspects of the problem would be easier to solve.

We have always seen the necessity to make meaningful progress towards a comprehensive settlement. In this respect, the centrality of the Palestinian problem in the entire dispute becomes self-evident.

With this in mind, we supported President Reagan's initiative on September 1, 1982. We earnestly hope that the weeks ahead will witness movement towards the negotiating table by all the parties concerned.

I am pleased—that I was encouraged by what I heard from King Hussein of Jordan and the Palestinian leadership together with several other Arab leaders. I believe that a golden opportunity exists and it would be a grave mistake to miss it.

I also believe that the peace process would be enforced if the United States moves further in the direction of supporting the rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination.

We agreed that the Israeli settlement policy is a serious obstacle to peace. Therefore, efforts must be exerted to bring about a total freeze of settlement activities.

I discussed with the President certain aspects of the war between Iran and Iraq, and the need to exert additional efforts for the purpose of achieving an immediate termination of hostilities.

On bilateral matters, we discussed issues related to economic and military cooperation. I expressed to President Reagan our gratitude to the American people for their unwavering support. This will enhance our ability to cope with the economic problems we are confronting. The United States has proven it is a real and reliable friend. We are determined to deepen that friendship, and intensify our cooperation.

Thank you.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Veliotes) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 3, 1983 [2]

Security Assistance to Egypt

I appreciate this opportunity to discuss with you the administration's security assistance proposals for Egypt. Before taking your questions, I would like to make a short statement.

Let me begin by briefly restating the foundations of U.S. policy toward Egypt. United States-Egyptian relations are based on a shared strategic interest in the stability of the Middle East and the surrounding region. The Egyptians, who have paid the heavy human and economic price of conflict, fully understand the advantages and benefits of peace. As a result they share with us a strategic commitment to the peaceful solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict, which is the fundamental problem facing the region. This commitment, first made and acted on by Sadat, has been reiterated by President Mubarak and remains a firm tenet of Egyptian foreign policy.

While a strong advocate of peace, Egypt, like the United States, understands the need to be able to deter those who would seek to destabilize the region or attempt to subvert friendly states in the area. The Mubarak government shares with us a concern about the threats to regional stability posed by the Soviets or their radical surrogates within the region. Our military cooperation stems from this shared concern and is a vital element in maintaining regional stability and in deterring aggression from within or outside the region.

The past year has seen a number of examples of the importance of close United States-Egyptian relations. We worked closely with Egypt and Israel to secure final Israeli withdrawal from the Sinai in implementation of the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty. President Mubarak has been a strong supporter of the President's September 1 peace initiative and his backing has complemented our efforts to generate broader Arab support for an expanded peace process.

I would like briefly to review the status of Egypt's relations with Israel, since I know this is a subject of interest to the committee. Mr. Chairman, I note from your report on your very useful trip to the region last fall that you discussed this subject with President Mubarak. [3] I know that other congressional visitors to Egypt have done so as well. I would point out that President Mubarak's statements to the Congress, to this administration and, indeed, to the public are strikingly consistent on the subject of peace with Israel. President Mubarak's government is committed to a peaceful relationship with Israel in accordance with the treaty between them and to the pursuit of a broader peace in the Middle East.

[3] Representative Lee Hamilton, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East, led an eight-member congressional delegation that visited Egypt on November 10 and 11, 1982. See The Unfinished Business of the Peace Process in the Middle East: Report of a Study Mission to Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Syria, France, and England, November 6–20, 1982, Under the Auspices of the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-seventh Congress, Second Session (Washington, 1983).

Despite Egypt's commitment to peace with Israel, it is fair to say that relations between the two countries have been strained by events in Lebanon. Egypt has recalled its Ambassador and has told the Israelis he will not return until there is an announced plan for Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon.[4] Israel, in turn, has complained to Egypt about media treatment of Israel and various trade problems. As you know, both states have circulated memoranda outlining complaints against the other.

We have discussed our concerns about these strains with both Governments. We have urged both to consider the importance of their relationship to the broader goal of regional peace and to be flexible in their dealings with one another. There is some evidence that these efforts, plus the desire of each state to maintain a positive relationship, may have begun to have some effect. Delegations from the two countries met March 2 to resume discussions on the Taba issue, which is the major outstanding issue remaining from the Sinai withdrawal. Talks on other issues of importance to the bilateral relationship are also scheduled to be held in the near future.

While progress on Lebanon is critical to the revitalization of Egyptian-Israeli relations, these direct bilateral talks are an important step in rebuilding a spirit of trust and confidence between the two states. The resumption of expanded peace negotiations, as foreseen in the President's September 1 initiative would, of course, be the strongest stimulus to improved Egyptian-Israeli relations.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn now to the administration's fiscal year 1984 security assistance request for Egypt. The President's request for Egypt has three components: A Public Law 480 title I program of $250 million; an ESF program of $750 million; and a FMS program of $1.3 billion, of which $450 million would be in forgiven credits. This request is an essential part of the President's efforts to promote peace and stability in the Middle East, and reflects the special relationship between Egypt and the United States. The individual parts of our budget request support Egyptian Government efforts to revitalize its economy and modernize its military.

Mr. Chairman, as your report on your recent visit to Egypt clearly noted, Egypt faces serious economic problems. While the economy is still growing, its rate of growth has slowed measurably and the indications are that this will continue. At the same time, foreign exchange earnings from tourism, the Suez Canal, oil exports and remittances from Egyptians working overseas are all down. The rapidly decreasing price of oil may contribute to further declines in three of these four areas.

The Mubarak Government recognizes Egypt's economic problems. President Mubarak has graphically outlined these problems for the Egyptian people, speaking more frankly than any modern Egyptian head of state. President Mubarak understands that change is needed if Egypt is successfully to rebuild its economy and achieve a better life for its people. Change, of course, means economic reform. The Mubarak Government is implementing reforms, although not always at the pace that we and others might think best. But unlike the past, the issue is no longer whether reforms are needed, but rather the pace at which they are to be implemented.

Our military assistance program for Egypt is designed to help the Mubarak Government modernize its military establishment, which is still largely equipped with aging Soviet equipment. Egypt needs a credible military force to deter the direct threats to itself from radical states in the region and to help support others from aggression. Our military assistance and training programs are critical parts of the Mubarak Government's efforts to maintain a credible military force. Given Egypt's economic problems, however, we have sought to package this assistance so it will have the lowest possible cost for Egypt.

In closing, let me reiterate the special nature of our relationship with Egypt, which has its roots in shared strategic interests and a common dedication to the pursuit of regional peace. Both the economic and military components of our security assistance program are designed to strengthen that relationship and thereby serve vital U.S. interests in the Middle East. The Mubarak Government sees this assistance as a tangible demonstration of [4] Egypt recalled Ambassador Saad Mortada from Tel Aviv on September 20, 1982, following the massacre of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps. The Egyptian Government later linked Mortada's return to an Israeli commitment to withdraw from Lebanon.

U.S. support and as a key component of its own efforts to deal with its economic problems and to rebuild its military strength. In short, this assistance is an investment in support of not only a key Middle Eastern ally, but regional peace and stability as well.

I would be happy to respond to any questions or comments you might have.

President Mubarak's Second Visit

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I will make a few comments about the visit of President Mubarak and then take questions.

This is President Mubarak's second visit this year and the third since he assumed office. We believe that these visits are a mark of our special relationship with Egypt.

President Mubarak will be in Washington from the evening of September 29 until the evening of October 3. The principal purpose of President Mubarak's visit to the United States was to participate in the United Nations General Assembly. I believe he addressed the Assembly yesterday.

President Reagan invited him to Washington to renew their continuing dialog on regional and bilateral issues.

In addition to his meeting and lunch with the President, President Mubarak will meet with the Vice President, the Acting Secretary of Defense, the Acting Secretary of State, the Secretaries of the Treasury and Commerce, the U.S. Special Trade Representative, the Administrator of AID, and the House and Senate leadership. Secretary Shultz met with President Mubarak in New York yesterday.

The principal regional issues for discussion will be Lebanon and the Middle East peace process. The United States and Egypt share views on what is needed to resolve the problems in Lebanon, beyond the cease-fire: Political reconciliation, support for the central government, and the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

We would expect the President to express his appreciation to President Mubarak for Egypt's support of Ambassador McFarlane's efforts in Lebanon. The Egyptians have been quite visible in envoys who are being sent back and forth as well as their public statements. And they will exchange views on the situation there as we look to the future.

On the peace process, the Egyptians support Camp David, of course, which they are one of the originators, and the President's initiative of September 1. They will undoubtedly discuss these issues: The need to look beyond the current Lebanese problems to the broader problems of peace and stability in the area and discuss the Palestinian problem in that context. Obviously, the President will note the importance of Egyptian-Israeli relations in the peace process and will undoubtedly indicate our continuing desire and willingness to help each state take steps to improve that relationship.

Bilateral issues will also be discussed, as well as other regional issues. I am sure we'll discuss the Iran–Iraq war, problems of North Africa. Bilateral issues we will discuss are aid programs and military cooperation.

Let me leave it at that and take your questions.

Q. Are there concerns by the U.S. Government about Egypt's purchase of weaponry from the Soviet bloc countries; Romania, for example?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Not concerns. These are decisions to be made by sovereign countries. Egypt has made clear that it looks to the United States as the primary supplier for replacing those, not one for one, but replacing the obsolescent Soviet equipment in its inventory and modernizing its armed forces.

---

[5] Source: White House Press Release, September 29, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing was conducted on background by a senior administration official in the Briefing Room of the White House, beginning at 11:08 a.m. President Mubarak made an official working visit to Washington, September 29–October 3, 1983.

Q. The U.S. Government has no problems with sales?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It's not really a U.S. Government issue. If the Egyptians are interested in purchasing arms from a country, I suppose they will.

Q. Yes, but if we are giving them a great many credits and aid, et cetera, and they are using that particular financing to buy weapons from East bloc countries—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Well, they are not doing that. All of our financing really is tied to U.S. procurement. We have I think a 5-year program we have agreed to with President Sadat and reiterated by the Mubarak government. That includes the Egyptians. We are not now and do not expect in the future to be the exclusive source of arms, although the Egyptians have made clear they would like us to be their primary source of arms. I believe they also have some purchases from France and other places.

Q. Is the administration at this point eager to push Mubarak toward restoring better relations towards Israel, such as sending back the Ambassador and that sort of thing?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Well, as I said in my opening remarks, as the good fathers of the Egyptian-Israeli Treaty, we believe we have a special and continuing responsibility for seeing to it that the relationship between these two good friends of the United States is as good as possible. With respect to the Egyptian Ambassador, our view on that is simple: The sooner he goes back, the better. Again, our view here is well known.

As far as the question of relations, I don't want to get into picking sides on this because both sides can make a very effective case on blaming the other side for problems. However, I don't think that we should lose sight of the essential fact. The Israeli-Egyptian Treaty is in place and being respected. The Sinai Peacekeeping Force is operating effectively. There have been nickel and dime types of complaints from both sides. And the Treaty withstood a significant strain. We have been into this before over events in Lebanon. So I just ask that everyone keep in perspective the fact that we have a treaty. It is a treaty which continues to form the basis of this country's peace and security policies in that area. And it is one on which we are seeking to build.

. . . . . .

Q. Do you expect the two Presidents to talk about any further American weapons going to Egypt or new bases we might get over there?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Well, we don't have bases.

Q. Their bases. We don't have our name on them, though.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, they are not bases at all. What we have is the Egyptians, through our strategic relationship, shared goals, allowing us to use their facilities on a case-by-case basis under the terms of the agreements which were entered into with President Sadat and reiterated by the Mubarak government. That includes such things as Ras Banas. They will probably talk about that. The Egyptians and we are in the process of a joint funding of a modest facility on the Red Sea which would, if it goes through—and we hope it does, because it's important to CENTCOM, and, we think, to the credibility of the American deterrent in that area, whereby we would jointly finance construction of some facilities.

Q. Do you think we need any more facilities than we already have, or not?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I don't think we need anything else in Egypt. We have, as you know, a number of agreements with countries in the area where we have access on an emergency basis.

Statements by President Reagan and Egyptian President Mubarak, September 30, 1983 [6]

The State of U.S. Relations With Egypt

THE PRESIDENT. President Mubarak and I have concluded another of our regular consultations on regional and bilateral issues. Our discussions were warm and frank, as discussions between good and trusting friends should be. They strengthen our sense of common purpose in working for regional peace and security.

There was basic agreement on the critical issues that our nations face in the Middle East and Africa. We discussed the urgent need to achieve a just and comprehensive peace for the Middle East which would permit the nations there, all the states in the region, to live in peace while safeguarding the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. In that regard, I reiterated by commitment to the peace initiative we announced a little more than a year ago and my desire to work closely with President Mubarak to bring the parties to negotiation. Our policy remains firmly based on U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and the Camp David accords. We reviewed the situation in Lebanon, and I thank the President for Egypt's support for Ambassador McFarlane's efforts to produce a settlement there, and assured him of my determination to support the territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of Lebanon. To that end, there must be an enduring cease-fire, political reconciliation and the prompt withdrawal of all foreign forces.

In discussing Africa, we agreed on the need to support nations such as Chad which are subject to external threat.

On bilateral questions, I reiterated the information—or the importance I attach to our continued assistance to Egypt and to our strategic cooperation. I've assured the President that our assistance will be responsive to Egypt's needs. And I also reviewed steps we've taken to increase the flexibility of our economic assistance so that it can support President Mubarak's efforts to reform the Egyptian economy. We agreed that we should continue our dialogue on economic issues.

President Mubarak's visit, the third since he was elected to office, highlights the special nature of our relationship with Egypt and the importance that I attach to his personal friendship and wise counsel.

Our two countries share a common dedication to building a Middle East that is peaceful, prosperous and secure from outside intervention. The Egyptian-American partnership has already produced significant results, and we'll continue to build on our record of accomplishment.

Mr. President, it's a pleasure again, as always, to have you here.

PRESIDENT MUBARAK. Thank you. It's a real pleasure for me to meet again with my friend President Reagan and discuss with him several issues of common concern.

As we share the commitment to the cause of peace, we focus on the situation in the Middle East. We both rejoice in the cease-fire agreement recently reached in Lebanon. The cease-fire must continue so that efforts to bring about national reconciliation in Lebanon be given the chance to succeed—and succeed they must. Lebanon has seen much bloodshed and destruction, and it deserves a lasting peace and stability and the real opportunity to reconstruct the country. The key to our breakthrough is the complete withdrawal of Israeli and other foreign forces. The authority of the Lebanese leadership over the entire country must be consolidated. Short of this, the situation would remain tense and explosive.

At the same time, we must not neglect the Palestinian problem. In this regard, I welcome President Reagan's assurances that he remains committed to the peace initiative of the first of September 1982. The time has come to reactivate this initiative with a view to secure the participation of Jordan and the representatives of the Palestinian people in the negotiations. I am confident that through negotiations

Presidents Reagan and Mubarak delivered their remarks in the East Room of the White House at 1:15 p.m., following a meeting in the Oval Office.

Palestinian legitimate rights will be fully recognized, and peace between Israel and all her Arab neighbors will emerge, assuring for each the right to live within secure and recognized borders and thus allowing the region to devote its energies to development and progress.

President Reagan and I have also agreed on the necessity to put an end to the war between Iran and Iraq immediately. The promulgation of the meaningless war is detrimental to the interests of all nations. We call upon Iran to respond positively to Iraq's offer of terminating the war and entering into peace negotiations without preconditions.

We also discussed current African problems. We fully support the Government of Chad and uphold the presence of foreign occupation forces there. The territorial integrity of Chad must be preserved. We support the efforts of the Organization of African Unity in this regard.

On bilateral matters, President Reagan and I are fully satisfied with our cooperation in all fields. We share the determination to bolster our fraternal ties and cement our friendship each day.

As always, I have found President Reagan most gracious and responsive. I thank him and the American people for their understanding and constructive spirit. Thank you.

U.S. Concern Over the Iran–Iraq War

. . . . . .

MR. COOPER. Here's a three-part question. What do you expect will happen regarding the Iran–Iraq conflict? What is the impact on Gulf stability and the possible U.S. policy position thereof?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It's a serious conflict. The U.S. position is that we think that they ought to stop fighting and settle their disputes. Our ability to influence that dispute is quite limited because we don't have any real relationship with Iran. We do have a relationship with Iraq, but it is not a deep and strong one so our ability to influence the outcome is quite limited. But we do support U.N. resolutions in this regard, and we support efforts made by others who have more access to the parties in their efforts to bring it to a conclusion.

I might say that the conflict is of tremendous concern, and understandably so, to the other Gulf states. Partly their concern about, in a sense, the export of a kind of revolutionary fervor that can be destabilizing to them, and then more recently in a very physical sense, the fact that you have a major oil well flowing continously. It is polluting the Gulf, and polluting it very badly, and it isn't as though you've got an oil slick out there and how are you going to clean up that slick. It's continually being produced and expanded, and it hasn't been possible to work out a sort of cease-fire or temporary truce or zone of truce that will enable people to go in and cap the well and deal with that slick.

The slick is getting so large that it is becoming a real threat to the region, to the natural fish life, and the desalinization plants are having to be shut down, and so on, so it's a genuine threat.

Persecution and Repression of the Baha'i's in Iran

America and the world are increasingly alarmed and dismayed at the persecution and severe repression of the Baha'i's in Iran. Recently we have learned that the Government of Iran has sentenced 22 prominent members of the Baha'i faith to death. This is in addition to the more than 130 who have been killed since the beginning of the revolution in Iran, including one man executed January 1, 1983, and three hanged in Shiraz on March 12, 1983.

These individuals are not guilty of any political offense or crime, they have not plotted the overthrow of the regime, and they are not responsible for the deaths of anyone. They only wish to live according to the dictates of their own consciences. I strongly urge other world leaders to join me in an appeal to the Ayatollah Khomeini and the rest of Iran's leadership not to implement the sentences that have been pronounced on these innocent people. Sparing their lives would be a step forward for Iran and the world community.

. . . . . .

Q. One more: the Gulf. Do you have any reaction to Iran's latest threat to restrict shipping in the Gulf for any country that provides port facilities for weapons going to Iraq?

A. Yes, I do. As we've said on previous occasions, the United States deplores continuation and extension of the fighting between Iran and Iraq and urges the parties to agree to a cease-fire and negotiate their differences. We would view with grave concern attempts by any party to interfere with the right of passage of nonbelligerent ships through international waters.

The principle of freedom of navigation in the Gulf is, we believe, an important interest of the international community. If this principle should be challenged, apart from whatever action we may deem it in the United States interest to take, we would consult urgently with those states most directly concerned—both in the region and in the wider international community.

Therefore, pursuant to section 202(d) of the National Emergencies Act (50 U.S.C. 1622(d)),[7] I am so continuing the national emergency with respect to Iran declared on November 14, 1979. Report on the Iran–U.S. Claims Tribunal

Pursuant to Section 204(c) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA),[9] 50 U.S.C. Section 1703(c), I hereby report to the Congress with respect to developments between my last report of May 2, 1983, and mid-October 1983, concerning the national emergency with respect to Iran that was declared in Executive Order No. 12170 of November 14, 1979.

1. The Iran-United States Claims Tribunal, established at The Hague pursuant to the Claims Settlement Agreement of January 19, 1981,[10] continues to make progress in arbitrating the claims of U.S. nationals against Iran. Since my last report, the Tribunal has rendered 42 more decisions for a total of 82 final decisions. Sixty-two of these decisions have been in favor of American claimants. Forty-two were awards on agreed terms, authorizing and approving payment of settlements negotiated by the parties and 20 were adjudicated. Total payments to successful American claimants from the Security Account stood at just under $88 million, as of October 1. Of the remaining 20 decisions, 12 dismissed claims for lack of jurisdiction, seven dismissed claims on the merits and one approved withdrawal of a claim. As of October 1, the Tribunal had held 111 prehearing conferences and 68 hearings on the merits and scheduled another eight prehearings and nine hearings through mid-November. In addition, two full Tribunal sessions of five days each were scheduled for October and early November.

2. The Department of State continues to coordinate the efforts of the concerned government agencies in presenting U.S. claims against Iran, as well as U.S. responses to claims brought by Iran. The Department has devoted a great deal of time to responding to cases brought by Iran under Articles II(3) and VI(4) of the Claims Settlement Agreement, which establish Tribunal jurisdiction over questions of interpretation and implementation of the Algiers Accords. In the last six months, the United States has replied to all of the allegations raised by Iran in a major interpretive dispute concerning the United States' implementation of the Algiers Accords. The Tribunal has scheduled eight prehearing conferences or hearings on these issues. In addition, Iran has filed three more interpretive disputes requesting clarification of: the Tribunal's jurisdiction over dual national claims; its authority to grant interest on awards; and the criteria for determining corporate nationality. Each of these questions had previously been decided by the Tribunal or a chamber thereof. The United States has filed replies in these three cases.

3. Since my last report, there has been further activity in resolving the government-to-government claims based on contracts for the provision of goods or services. Of the 64 claims filed by Iran aga the United States, nine have been withdrawn or terminated and one has resulted in an award on agreed terms. The Tribunal has received pleadings from both sides in the remaining cases and in almost all of the 18 claims which the United States filed against Iran. Since, in many instances, the Tribunal has announced its intention to decide the official claims on the pleadings, only one prehearing conference and one hearing have been scheduled.

4. Since my last report, the Tribunal has rendered a number of significant decisions. In at least six instances, Iran has filed suit in Iranian courts against claimants at the Tribunal on issues similar to those before the Tribunal. In each case, the Tribunal has requested Iran to stay the Iranian court proceedings in Iran until the Tribunal has had a chance to determine its jurisdiction over the claims. Iran, however, has yet to comply with any of these requests. On other matters, the Tribunal has found a contract to exist between a United States claimant and Iran in the absence of a formal written document, and it continues to award successful claimants interest on their awards. The Tribunal has begun to enforce more vigorously its filing deadlines, rejecting a number of Iranian counterclaims on the grounds that they were filed too late and refusing to consider pleadings filed after the established deadline.

5. In the last six months, the United States has proposed to the Tribunal that it adopt a test case approach in arbitrating the 2,742 remaining claims for less than $250,000 each. The United States has categorized all these claims according to the type of loss involved. Under this approach, the Tribunal would select a few cases in each category for a full hearing. Based on the decisions in each category, claims experts would then arbitrate the remaining cases in each category, subject to Tribunal ratification of their decisions.

6. In the period since my last report, there have been several changes in the Tribunal's composition. The resignation of Judge Pierre Bellet, one of the three third-party arbitrators, became effective on August 1. Because the six party-appointed arbitrators were not able to agree on a successor, the Appointing Authority, previously designated by the Secretary General of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in The Hague, appointed Professor Willem Riphagen of the Netherlands to replace Judge Bellet. Professor Riphagen, a former legal adviser to the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs, was a professor of international law at the University of Rotterdam. He has served as an ad hoc judge on the International Court of Justice, has presided over an arbitration between the United States and France, and has acted as Special Rapporteur for the International Law Commission.

7. On September 5, the Tribunal accepted the resignation of M. Jahangir Sani, one of the Iranian-appointed arbitrators, effective upon the availability of a successor. On September 14, Iran announced that it was appointing Parviz Ansari Moin to replace Mr. Sani. Mr. Ansari has worked in the Iranian Ministry of Justice for approximately ten years.

8. The Algiers Accords also provided for direct negotiations between U.S. banks and Bank Markazi Iran concerning the payment of nonsyndicated debt claims of U.S. banks against Iran from the escrow account established at the Bank of England in January 1981 with the deposit of $1.418 billion. Significant progress has been made in the past six months in settling these claims. As of mid-October, 24 settlements, totaling approximately $919 million, had been reached. From the $919 million paid to U.S. banks, the banks paid $327 million to Iran in settlement of Iran's claims against them, primarily for interest on domestic deposits. The Export-Import Bank received $419 million. About 25 bank claims remain outstanding.

9. During the past six months, the Department of State has begun to renovate and prepare for rental diplomatic and consular properties of Iran in the United States. In the absence of diplomatic relations between the United States and Iran, these properties have remained vacant and in many instances have deteriorated. To preserve them and to generate income for their upkeep, the Department of State, pursuant to a license granted in September by the Department of the Treasury, will sell moveable property left in or around Iranian premises following the break in diplomatic relations with Iran on April 7, 1980.

10. The Treasury Department's Office of Foreign Assets Control has established procedures authorizing the sale of blocked Iranian property in the United States and the eventual disposition of the proceeds of such sales. Much of this property is tangible property, including property which has not been authorized to be exported from the United States because of its potential military applications. In the six-month period preceding this report, three sales of such tangible property have been licensed. No sales had taken place as of mid-October. Several direct settlements of disputes between holders of such tangible property and Iran have occurred recently.

11. Despite the progress made by the Tribunal in the past six months, significant American interests remain unresolved. Iran has challenged five of the Tribunal's awards in the District Court of The Hague, seeking to invalidate them. Thus, financial and diplomatic aspects of the relationship with Iran continue to present an unusual challenge to the national security and foreign policy of the United States. By separate action of this date, I am extending the emergency with respect to Iran beyond the November 14, 1983 anniversary.[11] I shall continue to exercise the powers at my disposal to deal with these problems and will continue to report periodically to the Congress on significant developments.

Escalation and the Security of the Persian Gulf Region

. . . . . .

Another issue of war and peace in the Middle East that greatly concerns the United States is the war between Iran and Iraq. For many, this seems a remote and distant conflict, but it demands the attention of the entire international community. It has inflicted a cruel toll in lives and suffering. And it continues to threaten the security of the entire Persian Gulf region, an area of vital importance to the world economy.

Since the beginning of this war, we have called for an immediate cease-fire and a negotiated settlement to protect the independence and territorial integrity of both countries, reached without interference in their internal affairs. We deplore the continuation of this senseless war and the harm it has caused to both Iran and Iraq. There is no victor in this conflict, since both Iran and Iraq retain the capacity to do great damage to each other. Dreams of military victory or overthrow of governments are futile. Only a negotiated settlement that protects the basic interests of both countries can rescue them from this continuing disaster.

We also deplore the threats of both belligerents to escalate the war in the Gulf. Such a reckless course, by either Iran or Iraq, could be ruinous to both sides. It could also threaten the safety of other Gulf States. And it could endanger freedom of navigation and access to oil in the Gulf which is essential to the economic wellbeing of scores of nations, both industrialized and developing.

The United States welcomed the recent adoption of U.N. Security Council Resolution 540, which called for an end to hostilities in the Gulf, acknowledged the high cost of civilian casualties and damage in the war, and called for renewed efforts toward peace.[13] We have also reaffirmed, and put all parties on notice of, our strong commitment to the right of free navigation in international waters.

Mr. Chairman, many of the world's people continue to look to the United States as a defender of peace and freedom. I can assure you from my experience in the Middle East and my travels there in recent months that most of the states of that region continue to look to us for leadership. This is a time of trial, in Leba-

U.S. Assistance to Israel

I am very pleased to be here again today to testify in support of our military and economic assistance programs for Israel for fiscal year 1984. The administration is proposing a funding level of $1.7 billion in foreign military sales financing and $785 million in economic support funding.

The overall level of $2.485 billion in combined military and economic assistance for Israel would be the largest U.S. bilateral assistance program.

Mr. Chairman, [2] much of what we have to say will not be new to the subcommittee. For example, a year ago this subcommittee was told: "We are in the midst of an extremely tense period affecting not only Israel, but the entire region," and, "The presentation and examination of our foreign assistance proposals are taking place at a particularly sensitive juncture in Israel itself." [3] These views are current today.

However, specific events and immediate problems have changed. The events of the last year, as momentous and even tragic as they may have been have not changed some fundamental realities of the region with which we deal. Among those are the urgency of the need for peace, the need to support the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and unity of Lebanon, the prime importance of assuring for Israel the security it requires and the necessity of addressing the legitimate aspirations of the Palestinian people.

This is, therefore, an appropriate time to discuss the role of our assistance programs in Israel and how they fit into our larger strategy in the region.

Support for Israel's security and economic well-being is a basic firm principle of American foreign policy.

Our support for Israel grows out of a longstanding commitment to a free nation which has been a haven for immigrants from all over the world and which shares many of our own social and democratic traditions.

Our programs are designed to assist Israel in continuing to maintain its qualitative and technological superiority over any potential combination of regional forces. Our economic assistance helps Israel to finance balance-of-payments deficits. Taken in combination, our programs are the material manifestation of our traditional commitment to Israel.

While it should be clear that the security of Israel occupies a central role in our concerns and policies, our objectives in the Middle East continue to be focused on two mutually reinforcing goals.

First, the search for a just and lasting peace in the region and the second, the assurance that our friends in the area will be able to maintain their security against both outside threats as well as radical forces closer to home.

[3] Morris Draper, then Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, made these remarks before a subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee on March 23, 1982. See American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, p. 791.

Our pursuit of this overall objective requires that we maintain and strengthen our relations with other friendly moderate states in the region as well. The relations which we maintain with the states of the Middle East are obviously critical to our ability to achieve those objectives which we believe are shared by Israel.

The President and Secretary Shultz have made crystal clear on many occasions in the past few months (a) our firm determination to continue the search for peace begun at Camp David and renewed in the President's September 1 initiative; (b) our commitment to achieve complete withdrawal of foreign troops from Lebanon which will help to return stability to that strife-torn country and will also help to insure the security of Israel's northern border; and (c) our fundamental perception that a lasting peace achieved through direct negotiations is the best guarantee of long-term security for Israel and its neighbors.

The administration has highlighted that its basic policies toward the Arab-Israeli problem are based on the positive benefits accruing to all parties, including to the interests of the United States, from the resolution of these issues. We have, through many difficult months, continued a pattern of constant movement forward and meaningful consultations toward the objectives we all share both in Lebanon and with respect to a broader Middle East peace. These basic tenets guide our approach, and the assistance programs you will be considering in the coming weeks are a part of this effort.

With these general objectives in mind let me turn to the specifics of our proposal for Israel.

We have proposed that a total of $1.7 billion in military assistance be provided to Israel. The bulk of this funding would be used for progress payments on prior year purchases and to initiate purchases of artillery, missiles, APC's, and aircraft from the United States.

Our proposal includes an increase in the grant portion of that assistance from $500 million—our proposal last year—to $550 million with the remaining $1.15 billion to be provided in the form of a 30-year loan carrying a slightly concessional rate of interest.

The modest increase in grant funding we propose is motivated by our understanding of Israeli concerns over their debt burden coupled with our own analysis of that situation and our own budgetary constraints.

We are proposing a level of $785 million in ESF, identical to the level of the past several years. The program is a cash transfer, and we propose this year that the entire sum be provided as a grant. Our decision to improve the terms of our proposal for ESF from the one-third loan/two-thirds grant ratio we have proposed in the past was motivated both by the reality of the fact that ESF assistance has been provided to Israel on a grant basis for the last 3 fiscal years and by the slight downturn in Israel's export performance during the last year. This decline is a function of both the continued economic problems from which we and Western Europe are suffering, as well as the Government of Israel's domestic economic policies. Despite some difficulties, however, preliminary indications are that capital inflows to Israel during 1982 continued to exceed financing requirements as official foreign exchange reserves exceeded their levels for 1981.

We continue to have strong confidence in Israel's economic potential. The levels and terms we have proposed for our assistance to Israel for fiscal year 1984 should be more than sufficient to meet the objectives of our program.

Israel's growing debt repayments to the United States have been a major source of concern to many Israeli officials and to members of this committee. A careful examination of the situation, however, reveals that Israeli debt—and particularly the debt service burden associated with that debt—will be manageable given sound Israeli policies and an expected modest return to growth in the world economy.

Our review of our proposals obviously had to take into account our own budget stringencies. In reaching our conclusions, we weigh all factors to achieve a balance. In the real world of budget ceilings, increases in assistance, particularly grant assistance for one country mean that funds will be unavailable to achieve other objectives.

Under our proposals Israel will continue to receive funds—both grant and credit—which are ample to meet our policy objectives in support of the State of Israel.

In addition, we would call attention to our request for $15 million in economic support funds for fiscal year 1984 for regional programs. And $7 million of these moneys will go toward sustaining our development efforts in the West Bank and Gaza. These programs are implemented through American voluntary agencies and address needs in such areas as vocational and higher education, community development, improved water storage, and agricultural cooperative marketing. The program has proved useful as an indication of our humanitarian concerns for the peoples of these regions and we would urge its funding at the level proposed.

An additional $7 million of the regional funds would finance cooperative scientific, technical and other activities of mutual interest to Israel and its Arab neighbors. The remaining $1 million is requested for project development and support activities relating to the development of ESF country programs.

Sale of F–16's to Israel

. . . . . .

The Department of Defense has transmitted to the Congress today formal notification of our intention to sell 75 F–16 aircraft to Israel. While the timing of this notification is related to the Israeli agreement with Lebanon, [5] the decision on the sale itself, which was approved over a year ago, reflects our long-term commitment to maintain Israeli's qualitative military edge in the region. Our heightened concerns about the Soviet challenge in the region, particularly the Soviet supply of the SA–5 integrated air-defense system to Syria, makes it timely for us to send this notification to the Congress now.

Q. John, does the release of the F–16's mean that the United States is convinced that Israel did not violate the agreement—the arms agreement that they have with the United States?

A. I think we can stand on the words that the President used at the times he has made his various announcements on the F–16 before.

Q. John, previously those words have included his linking the transfer, or the release of the sale, to the withdrawal of Israeli forces. Obviously, this is a change in that policy, since the forces have not withdrawn. Could you explain why that change was made?

A. I think the situation has changed in that you have an agreement between Israel and Lebanon for the withdrawal of those forces. You have an Israeli willingness to withdraw those forces.

Israeli Compliance With the Arms Export Control Act

A. The Arms Export Control Act imposes one specific requirement on the President—that he report to the Congress when a violation of the conditions under which U.S. equipment was furnished "may have occurred." [7] It does not require that the President make a judgment as to whether a violation of such an agreement has occurred in each case. Rather, it provides the President a wide range of discretion to take such good faith action as he considers appropriate to promote observance of the conditions under which U.S. equipment has been furnished. The administration has complied fully with the specific reporting requirements of the statute, and has taken certain actions designed to make clear our concerns and expectations regarding the use of U.S. equipment in Lebanon, and the Congress has been kept fully apprised of our thinking in this respect. We do not believe that it would serve any useful purpose to take further action at this time.

Overview of U.S.-Israeli Relations

To begin at the beginning of my outline, Israel lies in the center of one of the principal geographic arenas of East-West competition. Sharing with us the same democratic ideals, the same principles of freedom and dignity of the individual, Israel stands as a bastion of Western interests and values in an area perpetually coveted by the Soviet Union. As such, our preoccupation with Israel's security and well-being rests not only on a deep and abiding moral commitment to preserving this outpost of freedom, this Jewish homeland; it also rests on a broad base of common strategic interests.

Based on a similar matrix of common interests with other countries around the world, the United States has provided economic and military support to enable friends and allies from Europe to the Far East to Latin America to defend themselves from internal subversion and external aggression. This policy has contributed over the years to the emergence of a network of solid, self-sufficient free countries. These are countries capable of defending themselves from without and having the internal stability to build strong economies and just societies. Israel has been perhaps that policy's most outstanding success story.

Our ongoing generous economic and military assistance not only helps Israel defend itself; I believe it is also a solid investment in our own country's security. Israel's democratic institutions and its political stability make it a reliable and dependable friend in a volatile region. Its military power is seen by the Soviets as standing in the way of their expansionist ambitions in the Middle East. The security of Israel is a vital American interest, and we will not stand idly by in the face of Soviet threats to that security.

It is no coincidence that Israel's most implacable enemies—the rejectionists—are, by and large, clients of the Soviet Union. Many of the other states in the region, however, share with the United States—and with Israel—a common interest in resisting Soviet encroachment in the Middle East. Much of the dramatic evolution toward peace in the Middle East over the past decade has stemmed from the growing realization that the conflict with Israel runs counter to this interest.

It was no coincidence, for example, that President Sadat's first step on the road that eventually led him to Jerusalem was the expulsion of the thousands of Soviet advisors invited into Egypt by his predecessor. Sadat recognized the pernicious linkage between the futile and interminable struggle against Israel and the mortgaging of his country to the Soviet Union. Setting Egypt free and enabling it to tackle its immense internal problems required both disentanglement from the Soviets and peace with Israel. In responding with vision and magnanimity to Sadat's overture, Israel clearly recognized this linkage as well, and struck a major blow for the defense of the West.

The same linkage has been evident in the progress towards peaceful relations between Israel and Lebanon. Although the Lebanese had no fundamental quarrel with Israel, the domination of large areas of their country by Soviet-backed foreign forces blocked all avenues to peace. With the elimination of that bellicose presence from her capital and the conclusion of an agreement that would provide for the complete withdrawal of Israeli forces, we believe that Lebanon is now back on the road both to full sovereignty over its territory and to productive relations with its neighbor to the south. Syria must now decide whether it will assist Lebanon in ridding itself of all foreign forces or will ask to keep that country in a state of torment.

The Soviet Union knows that without the Israeli-Arab conflict it has nothing to offer the peoples of the Middle East. Its social and political ideas are anathema to them and its approach to economic development is bankrupt. Dependent on continuing turmoil, the Soviets have consistently tried to obstruct the peace process at every turn. Their current heavy military buildup in Syria, reinforcing resistance to the Israeli-Lebanese agreement, is but the most recent example of this irresponsibility. By attempting to thwart the effort by Israel and Lebanon to live in peace, the Russians are making a desperate bid to recoup some of their waning influence in the Middle East.

This lesson is not lost on the other states in the area, most of which have no interest in seeing the Soviets regain lost ground. The acceptance of the Israeli-Lebanese agreement, publicly or privately, by the great majority of the Arab States bespeaks a growing recognition that peace is also in their own individual and collective interest. Although progress has been painfully slow and fitful, we should not underestimate how far we have come. A year ago, significant elements in the Middle East still harbored the illusion that the Arab-Israeli conflict could be resolved by military means. Today mainstream Arab leaders are talking about how—not whether—to make peace with Israel.

Thus, the most effective way that the United States and Israel can advance western interests in the Middle East is a mutual and vigorous pursuit of the peace process. To the extent we make progress along this path, Western influence is strengthened; the absence of peace, on the other hand, provides fertile ground for Soviet encroachment. As a friend of both sides, the United States plays a uniquely constructive role in helping them resolve their differences. It is essential that we persist in that effort and that the momentum generated by recent breakthroughs not be lost.

In our unshaken view, President Reagan's September 1 initiative, solidly grounded as it is in the principles of Camp David, remains the most promising and realistic avenue for the peace process. We are convinced that it is the only approach which would both fully protect Israel's security interests and provide the minimal political elements necessary for an acceptable solution to the Palestinian problem.

No discussion of Israel and East–West relations would be complete without some reference to the Soviet Jewry issue. I want you to know that we are deeply disturbed by the virtual cessation of Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union. This situation is not acceptable to the United States. In every meeting he has with a Soviet official, Secretary Shultz reiterates that Soviet refusal to permit Jewish emigration is not only a violation of its obligations under the Helsinki Accords; it is also a serious obstacle to improvement of U.S.-Soviet relations. I wish I could be more immediately optimistic about this problem. But let me assure you that we will not rest until the gates of the Soviet ghetto are opened once again.

Before addressing Israel in the intra-Western framework, let's look briefly at the North–South context. Israel is a virtually full-fledged member of the industrialized world, but it has only recently achieved that status, by dint of a tremendous sustained campaign of economic development. As such, it has learned many lessons of great value to the developing countries. Within a few years of its founding, Israel was already offering significant high-quality technical assistance, especially in agriculture, to a number of newly-emerging countries in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. In many ways, Israel's small-scale techniques are more appropriate to developing-country needs than the big large-scale aid projects undertaken by the major industrial powers. Moreover, these developing countries need have no fear that Israel harbors political or military ambitions toward them.

Many of Israel's relationships suffered as a result of the trend toward radicalization of the Third World in the 1970's. This deterioration showed up most conspicuously in the United Nations, where the more radical LDC's, spurred on by the Soviets and their friends, have vied with each other to produce ever more distorted and vulgar calumnies against Israel. The United States has worked closely and effectively with the Israelis and other friends to limit the damage to Israel of those attacks. The real victim of this corruption of the organization's noble ideals has been the moral image of the United Nations itself.

I expect that Israel will benefit from the growing trend toward pragmatism in the Third World that I noted earlier. In conjunction with Israel's withdrawal from Sinai, one of black Africa's leading countries, Zaire, broke the diplomatic embargo and reestablished formal relations. We are hopeful that further rapprochement will take place as the peace process is advanced. In time, it is altogether probable that Israel can assume its natural role as a bridge, literally and figuratively, between North and South.

Finally, let me make a few comments about our relations with Israel in the context of what I call "West–West" relations. Our ties with Israel are, in many ways, as close as those with our NATO allies, even though we don't have the same formal institutional links. What we have most importantly in common are the same values we share with the world's other democracies: constitutional, representative government; guarantees by law of basic political and civil rights; an open economic system.

I know that Secretary Shultz was profoundly impressed by his recent trip to Israel.[9] He was moved by the warmth and graciousness of his reception by the Israeli Government and people. And he was gratified by the depth of mutual understanding and commonness of purpose between our two nations.

I am personally very pleased that with the Secretary's trip and the signing of the Israeli-Lebanese agreement, our relations with Israel are back on an even keel. I myself had very satisfying discussions with Deputy Foreign Minister Ben-Meir here in Washington just last week. The announcement of the F–16 sale has now been sent to Congress. Licenses for the Lavi aircraft project have begun to be issued and more are in the works. Israel and the United States are sharing information on military lessons learned in the war in Lebanon. U.S. economic and military aid to Israel are at high levels.

All of this obviously does not mean that we still don't have differences, just as we do with our other close friends. The most significant disagreement, of course, is over the peace process. I will not belabor those differences here—they are well known to all of you. Let me just say that the United States can—and we will—continue to assure that Israel has all the military strength it needs to defend itself. In the final analysis, however, true security can be achieved only through peace, just and lasting peace between Israel and her neighbors. I believe that peace is not only possible; it is eminently achievable, if only we can all muster enough patience, determination, courage, and vision to see the process through.

[9] Secretary Shultz visited Israel on five occasions (April 27–28, 28–30, May 1–3, 4–6, and 8) while seeking a solution to the Lebanon crisis.

Remarks by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), June 14, 1983 (Extract)[10]

Prospects For Reviving the U.S.-Israeli Memorandum of Understanding

. . . . . .

Q. When do you plan to reactivate the memo of understanding with Israel[11] and [10] Source: Public Statements of Secretary of Defense Weinberger, 1983. The remarks were made in a question-and-answer session after an address by Secretary Weinberger at the National Press Club in Washington.

do you think Israel has the capability to knock out the new missiles in Syria?

A. The latter part of the question would of course involve an estimate of mine and I don't know how valuable that would be. I would simply say that the Israel Air Force has immense capabilities and immense skill and they have demonstrated that repeatedly. On the basis of their past record I would think they probably could, but that's just a personal estimate. Obviously, we would much rather have the situation resolved peacefully by the removal of the Syrian troops from Lebanon and carrying out of the agreement the Israelis have already made to withdraw from Lebanon. In that way we can get Lebanon back to proper status of a sovereign nation and help strengthen them and help rebuild their very shattered infrastructure so that they would again exercise the normal rights of sovereignty. That, I think, is a very first and essential step in getting peace in the Mideast.

On the first part of the question, the memorandum of understanding was a memorandum which we had agreed to with Israel which provided that we and the Government of Israel and any other government in the Mideast wishes to join the agreement, would take appropriate and useful steps to prevent any kind of invasion or aggression against the entire Mideast by the Soviet Union. The revival, or the reinstitution of that memorandum could take place virtually at any time depending on the wishes of the Israeli Government. It would also be important, I think, to emphasize the fact that it was an agreement that was designed to deter attack on the entire Mideast region. So it would be entirely available to and appropriate for entering by all the other nations that wish to do so, the modern Arab nations surely, in the Mideast because the very real dangers to the region as well as the world of any Soviet aggression into the Mideast.

Military Cooperation Between Israel and the United States

Q. First of all, on behalf of the American Jewish Press Association, we sincerely appreciate the opportunity you've given for this background briefing.

I would like you to comment on the fact that there have been some extensive reports that you personally have led a move within the administration for a more open and clear strategic cooperation in the Middle East with Israel.

Would you comment on whether or not this is true; and also if the recent raid by Israeli and French planes against pro-Iranian targets in Lebanon will be followed by a similar U.S. action?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. On the last question, our policy is not to comment on it because we're not elaborating on that question at all.

On the first question, we certainly want, and I feel that since I have been in office I have had a strong, open, collaborative relationship with my counterparts and friends in the Government of Israel. I know that President Reagan feels that a relationship of that kind for the United States is very important, and he intends to nurture it in every way that we can. That means that we fundamentally support Israel. It doesn't mean that we never disagree about anything or have an argument about anything because there are times when we have differences of opinion, but those are differences in the family, so to speak, and the fundamental fact of the close relationship with Israel and the United States is there. I think it transcends administrations for that matter in either the United States or Israel. It's a basic country-to-country proposition. I am very proud to be part of the effort to work on it.

Sometimes there are people who disagree with me within the administration and if I get too frustrated, I just suggest that we have a meeting with the President and see what he has to say, and that settles it.

. . . . . .

Q. An air force general, speaking at the John C. West Foundation's Conference last week on Persian Gulf security, completely ignored Israel as a strategic base for rapid deployment of United States forces, deployment going around the tip of Africa, and through Europe; does the United States Government not consider Israel of any importance in helping to maintain the peace in the Persian Gulf?

A. I think Israel is of great strategic importance. Israel, I think—we should keep reminding ourselves, Israel is a democracy. Israel has the kind of values that we have. Israel is a stable country. Israel can have a change of governments and still be the same country, so to speak, just as we can.

Israel can conduct an investigation of something like the Sabra and Shatila problem and investigate its own leaders, and have a report and nobody even raises a question about whether that report is an honest and objective report.

I think that from our standpoint, given all of those considerations, let alone its location and Israel's affinity for us, that it's clearly a country that is very key in our interests in that part of the world.

When it comes to the Gulf itself, and I don't know what this air force general had to say or in what context, but if you put one finger down on Israel and put the other down on the Straits of Hormuz, it's quite a distance. So you're not going to be able to fly a fighter, say, from there and back. That doesn't mean that you can't position supplies and position things there. But in our thoughts about, let's say, maintaining the international waters in the Straits, we pretty much have to do that with carrier task groups where you're right in the Arabia Sea; and we also have quite a good relationship with Oman. Of course, they're right there.

I might just say, if you haven't looked into the question of Oman and read some of the things that the Sultan of Oman has said, you might do that, because he has a different attitude toward Israel than the other Arab countries do. You ought to do a little work on that. He's a pretty impressive person.

Q. When Messrs. Shamir and Orgod and Arens come, will you be able to discuss with them the pre-positioning of equipment in Israel from the standpoint that Israel can no longer afford to keep the balance of power financially? The costs are too high.

Is it possible to arrange a situation where American equipment is placed there and there's a lease-back system to Israel in case of need to use them? And, also, is it possible to consider Israel using the Merkava tank which has proven itself so well?

A. As far as the tank is concerned, and the details of this, I think I'll pass on that in the sense that we will have to approach these subjects with those gentlemen.

As for (inaudible) and my friend Mosha Arens keeps telling me that Israel produces a better tank than anything we've got anyway. And people tell me that's true.

We want to try to work out arrangements that do everything we can to help Israel maintain its posture of having an effective military advantage in the region so that it isn't going to be knocked over by somebody's superior military power. That is sort of the point of all of these things, and there are all sorts of different suggestions about how that should be done. Mosha Arens is very interested in development of a fighter aircraft, of producing it in Israel—the Lavi. That seems to be going forward. But there are all sorts of trade-offs here; you can't do everything, or Israel can't do everything. It's much more constrained than we are. It's a very small economy, and I hadn't appreciated it really until talking with the President the other day and we were discussing some of the economic problems.

The President made some question of how it would affect us if Israel did such-and-such. I said, Mr. President, you have to remember that we are a $3-½ trillion economy and Israel is a $17 billion economy. The U.S. economy grows in a quarter more than $17 billion. There is no constraint, so to speak, in our economy about the sorts of things that need to be done, because the scale is so enormously different.

I'm not really dodging your question, but I don't want to go into the specifics of it. I think that's more for the discussions that would be held and they're, of course, the kind of discussions that would be held between Secretary Weinberger and Defense Minister Arens, although I try to keep an eye on those talks. (Laughter)

Statements by President Reagan and Israeli Prime Minister Shamir, November 29, 1983 [13]

Visit of Prime Minister Shamir

THE PRESIDENT. We have held 2 days of intensive talks with Prime Minister Shamir and his colleagues, covering a broad range of subjects including political, military cooperation, Lebanon, Israel's economic situation, and the pursuit of the Middle East peace process; and these discussions, as could be expected between close friends and allies, have been very productive. We reconfirmed the long-standing bonds of the friendship and cooperation between our two countries, and expressed our determination to strengthen and develop them in the cause of our mutual interests.

We have agreed on the need to increase our cooperation in areas where our interests coincide, particularly in the political and military area. And I am pleased to announce that we have agreed to establish a joint political-military group to examine ways in which we can enhance U.S.-Israeli cooperation. This group will give priority attention to the threat to our mutual interest posed by increased Soviet involvement in the Middle East. Among the specific areas to be considered are combined planning, joint exercises and requirements for prepositioning of U.S. equipment in Israel.

We've agreed to take a number of other concrete steps aimed at bolstering Israel's economy and security. These include asking Congress for improved terms for our security assistance to Israel, using military assistance for development of the Lavi aircraft in the United States, and for offshore procurement of Lavi components manufactured in Israel, permitting U.S. contractors to enter into contracts with the Government of Israel consistent with U.S. law, which would allow Israeli industry to participate in the production of U.S. weapons systems procured with foreign military sales credits, offering to negotiate a free trade area with Israel.

A main focus of our meetings was the agony of Lebanon, and the threats there to our common interests. We examined, together, Soviet activities in the Middle East, and found a common concern with the Soviet presence and arms buildup in Syria. We reaffirmed our commonly held goals of a sovereign, independent Lebanon—free of all foreign forces, and of security for Israel's northern border.

We agreed that every effort must be made to expedite implementation of the May 17th agreement between Israel and Lebanon. Adequate security arrangements for Israel's northern border must be assigned the highest priority. We are hopeful that such arrangements can be concluded soon. We, of course, discussed the broader goal of peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors. The Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty remains the cornerstone of the peace process. I reaffirmed my commitment to the September 1 initiative as the best way to realize the promise of Camp David and the U.N.S.C. Resolutions 242 and 338 upon which it was built.

As you can see, our 2 days together have revealed substantial areas of agree-

President Reagan and Prime Minister Shamir delivered their remarks to reporters on the South Grounds of the White House at 1:24 p.m., following a meeting in the Oval Office. ment and resulted in a number of specific concrete steps that we will take to strengthen our ties.

We have also discussed some issues on which we do not see eye to eye. But disagreements between good friends do not alter the unique and sturdy foundation of our relationship.

I know that Prime Minister Shamir shares with me the renewed conviction that the warm friendship between the United States and Israel will endure and strengthen.

PRIME MINISTER SHAMIR. I am grateful for the invitation extended to me by President Reagan to come here to Washington for these discussions. The Minister of Defense and I have had the opportunity to conduct very thorough discussions with the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and their sea of [senior] colleagues and advisers. These discussions have been carried out in the spirit of the traditional friendship and the common bonds of mutual understanding that bind our two countries.

We reaffirmed our determination to insure the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. The only basis for a settlement of the Lebanese problem is the full implementation of the May 17, 1983 agreement in all its parts. We have discussed with the President and the Secretaries the necessary steps that could facilitate the carrying out of this agreement.

Syria constitutes today a major threat to the peace in our area by occupying more than 60 percent of Lebanon and by its massive concentration of Soviet arms and personnel on Syrian territory. Israel is ready to renew the peace process and discuss the final status of Judea and Samaria, following the autonomy period in the framework of the so-agreed basis for negotiations, mainly the Camp David Accords.

We discussed during our visit here the major threat that terrorism constitutes to the peace, and we shall pursue our fight against it in close cooperation with the United States. Due to the need to ensure our security, a large part of our budget is spent on defense. We hope that the American administration will increase their assistance program, taking into account the great sacrifices made by Israel in the peace treaty, by relinquishing the oil wells and building new installations as a result of the restoral of Sinai.

New measures, this time to encourage the development of our economy by establishing a free-trade area, by sharing new technology will enhance Israel's strength and enable us to pursue our economic program so vital to the well-being of our society.

In order to advance the search for peace and to strengthen the ties between our two countries, we decided to establish the mechanism necessary to determine the details of the nature and scope of our cooperation in the area, in the fields of prepositioning of equipment for military readiness, joint exercises, and other relevant fields.

We have agreed to establish a joint political-military committee to work on the details of these agreed matters. The aim of this cooperation is to strengthen Israel and deter threats to the region. The group will hold period meetings, starting the first week of January 1984.

I wish to once again thank the President and the people of the United States for their strong support of Israel and for the warm feelings conveyed to the Minister of Defense and myself by the President, the Vice President, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of Defense.

We will proceed on the road to peace with increased vigor. I return to Jerusalem strengthened in my conviction that with the aid of the United States of America, and fortified by the friendship of its people and Government a strong Israel can indeed achieve peace.

Thank you.

Expansion of Economic and Defense Cooperation With Israel

. . . . . .

[SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL.] The President['s] themes were—(laughter)—political, political-military cooperation, our relations with the moderate Arabs, the peace process, and Lebanon—the areas that he wanted to focus on that he laid out to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defense in their first session yesterday. And all of those were covered in great detail.

We had—I think you were talked through the schedule yesterday—that went on, formally, until some point after 6 p.m. last night—about 3½ hours of—4 hours of talks yesterday afternoon. Then, a couple of working groups continued to work through the evening, developing thoughts on the political-military working group and sharing our assessments on the situation in Lebanon.

This morning, when they arrived at the White House, there was a session just between the President, the Vice President on our side, and the two Ministers—Prime Minister Shamir and Minister Arens. That was for about 15 minutes, followed by 45, 50 minutes in the Cabinet Room and, then, luncheon.

And one additional subject that was covered at the lunch was the Gulf war—the Iraq-Iran war, again, sharing our respective assessments of that.

What I'd like to do is move, first of all, to a number of specific subjects. Now, these weren't in order of priority, but they're in the order of my notes. So bear with me. And, then, we can take the questions afterwards.

The Israelis have had, for some time, a strong interest in the free trade area. There have been informal discussions going on for about the past 2 years on this subject. They do have a free trade area, which will come into effect with the European Community in a year to two—time, can you—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Eighty-nine.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I'm sorry; '89.

They have been very interested in establishing a similar relationship with the United States. And we had Brock—William Brock, the special trade negotiator—open the meeting this morning to give an outline of how he saw that issue proceeding. And, basically, we now want to move from what had been informal to formal negotiations on a U.S.-Israeli free trade area.

This, Brock estimates, could be concluded in a few months time. It would be a completely reciprocal arrangement—free trade for our products in Israel, free trade for Israeli products in the States. It has implications, of course, to our global economic relations. Since 1923, our adherence [has been] to the principle of most-favored-nation. In any event—these questions—the basic questions have been studied and have been resolved in the affirmative. And we want to proceed with these talks. I think those will probably get started in December.

Now, some defense-economic decisions—the following ones were taken. FMS financing of offsets in commercial contracts: the President is prepared to make an exemption for Israel from the general policy of prohibiting offset arrangements in FMS commercial contracts and has decided to place an ad valorem 15 percent cap on that exemption. This is designed to stimulate the Israeli economy and industrial production base.

Second, the use of FMS funds for the research and development on the Lavi fighter: the administration will implement the Congressionally mandated use of up to $300 million for R&D on Lavi projects. That production [is] in the United States.

[14] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing, which was conducted on background by a senior administration official, took place in the Briefing Room of the White House, beginning at 1:45 p.m., and concerned discussions between President Reagan and Prime Minister Shamir during the latter's visit to Washington.

This exceptional use of FMS underscores our support for the Lavi program.

Further decision on FMS was its use for offshore procurement. The administration endorses the Congressional earmark of $250 million for procurement of defense articles and services in Israel for the Lavi program. It will also approve offshore expenditures of $200 million related to Israel's redeployment from Sinai. And we'll consider additional offshore procurements on a case-to-case basis.

Fourth, on cluster munitions, the United States is committed to Israel's security. It is prepared to lift the suspension on shipments and sales of cluster munitions at the conclusion of a satisfactory usage agreement that contains a definitive guarantee against violations. . . .

. . . . . .

Other subjects, subjects in the area of defense economic decisions. On the Lavi fighter, the subject of Phase 3 production technology, the President has not yet made a decision on Phase 3 of technology transfer. In this case, that would permit the production in Israel of the wing and tail assemblies.

The subject was discussed concerning use of FMS to purchase Israeli products by other FMS recipients, by third countries. This we cannot agree to.

We also discussed [the] memorandum of agreement on defense cooperation. We will continue ongoing negotiations which aim at renewing and improving the existing memorandum of agreement instead of renegotiating from what is called, a NATO type text.

Now, that's the list of defense related issues, the free trade area. On the political side, foreign policy issues, the President, the Secretary of State made our position very clear about our commitment to the Camp David framework and the September 1 initiative. They emphasized—and these were in separate conversations—that we continue to see [UN Security Council Resolution] 242 as applying to all fronts and that settlements, we see, as an obstacle to peace.

We share the commitment which the Israelis spoke to us about of upholding the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty and helping to develop that relationship because if 242 is for peace, that treaty is, of course, of key importance in the process.

We spoke at the main meetings and in private sessions, I understand, that each Secretary had this morning with his counterpart over breakfast, [conversations] about the quality of life of the Palestinians on the West Bank and Gaza. We expressed the hope that more consideration will be given to what we call development type projects, developmental initiatives affecting those populations.

We have a number of private voluntary organizations operating in both areas and had a review of their work. The President, as well as the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense, I know, also participated very vigorously in the discussion, addressed the need, our need, for military relationships with moderate Arabs. It's part of the whole picture of our role in the Middle East. As we said, there are times that this is going to involve arms sales. We recognize this will create problems, has created problems, misunderstandings between us and Israel and we will work to explain our needs in such a way as to minimize any future problems. We have a major stake in maintaining our relationships with the moderate Arabs and we laid that out very plainly as a major theme is the discussions.

Israel's Security and the Stability of the Middle East

Q. Mr. Eagleburger yesterday said on ABC television that the United States strategic agreement with Israel intends to stabilize the Middle East and that it will work to help Israel and the moderate Arab States. How can you explain that, sir?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think that, first of all, the security of Israel is a very important element of stability in the Middle East insofar as the United States is concerned. So, always, in our relationships with Israel we examine that problem and we seek to do everything we can to insure that.

In the present situation, what we have seen is a very substantial Soviet buildup in Syria, and that is a fact. We discussed it in great detail with the Israelis, and it's something to which we need to pay attention and be prepared to respond. I think doing so does help bring stability in the area.

We discussed many other things with the Israelis and we agreed, among other things, with them to establish a joint political military group. It will have its first meeting in January, and it will be a way to keep track systematically of many of these matters that we discuss when we have visits back and forth. So that process will be in motion, and I think it will help the cooperative action between the countries, but it's something for the future, of course.

Reports of U.S. Support For a Jordanian Rapid Deployment Force

. . . . . .

[MR. LANTOS.] Mr. Secretary, if I may pursue the Jordanian issue, there has been some speculation in the media that we are planning to build a rapid deployment force in Jordan, to serve in the Middle East. Can you tell us a little bit about this force, and how far the planning has gone?

MR. VELIOTES. Well, MI. Lantos, I am not going to address the specifics of the press reports and speculation that we have all seen. I will say, however, that for over a quarter of a century, we have shared with Jordan, under King Hussein, common goals with respect to stability and security in the area and the Gulf.

This has been reflected in our close security relationship with the Government of Jordan, and if you look at the record, if I may say for a moment, the Government of Jordan has a long track record of engaging itself in security issues in the Gulf.

Back 20 years, they sent a brigade to Kuwait when Kuwait was directly threatened by Iraq. Jordanian battalions were in Oman helping to put down the Communist-inspired rebellion from Aden.

Thousands of Jordanian personnel are in the police and military services of that whole peninsula, and thousands more Gulf Peninsula security and police personnel receive training, so Jordan is definitely very deeply involved in these issues.

MR. LANTOS. Your answer in that sense is yes. My question was not critical. My question is, are we supportive of the creation of what, in fact, is a minirapid deployment force made up of Jordanian troops?

MR. VELIOTES. We are supportive of our traditional relationship with Jordan, which in part, significant part, is based on our common position and cooperation in trying to insure the stability and security there.

MR. LANTOS. In this connection, have there been any commitments made to Jordan, privately or otherwise, concerning weapons deliveries in the future?

MR. VELIOTES. This has been addressed publicly, I believe, by the Secretary before the House Foreign Affairs Committee the other day. There are no formal requests before us. We know that the Jordanians do want aircraft and air defense equipment.

We also are aware that the King, should he decide to join the peace process, will increase his risk factor by geometrical proportions given those who will be opposed to him.

Under those circumstances, and all things considered, certainly we are prepared to consider on the merits any eventual formal Jordanian request, and the disposition of such a request would depend upon circumstances, including the consultations with the Congress.

MR. LANTOS. But there will not be a repetition of last year's episode where one of the arguments for the AWACS sale was that commitments have already been made and we would be embarrassing the administration if Congress were not to approve the sale.

MR. VELIOTES. Without digressing into AWACS history, I think we also made a very strong case on the merits for the AWACS, which I happen to believe is still valid. We will make our case, should we make our case, for the Jordanian arms sale on its merits.

MR. LANTOS. And not in terms of previous commitments made.

MR. VELIOTES. It will be on its merits.

Prepared Statement and Testimony by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Placke) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 10, 1983 (Extracts) [2]

Security Assistance to Jordan

Mr. Chairman, members of the Subcommittee: I welcome the opportunity to testify today in support of the administration's proposals for economic and security assistance to Jordan, Oman and the Yemen Arab Republic for fiscal year 1984.

While our assistance programs are tailored to each country's needs, these programs are elements of the broad regional strategy which the administration has developed and is carrying out. In each country, our assistance programs are intended to nurture basic relationships of mutual interest and trust and to assist their governments in strengthening their security and promoting their economic progress. In the process, we will be advancing our objectives of peace, and security and progress toward realization of the economic and social aspirations in this strategically important part of the world. The funding that we are requesting, developed in light of our own budgetary stringencies, is what we believe is essential to pursue our regional policy and to progress toward these objectives. Specifically:

Colonel Homer D. McKalip, USA, Chief of the Near East/South Asian Division, Defense Security Assistance Agency, also testified before the subcommittee. Placke's testimony also dealt with assistance to Oman and the Yemen Arab Republic; see document 303.

—Our assistance is important to Jordan's security and economic well-being, the maintenance of which is essential for that country to have the internal strength to enter the peace process at this critical juncture. In addition, our strong support is crucial to Jordan's ability to continue to contribute to the security and stability of the region.

. . . . . .

The United States has a strong interest in the stability and orientation of these countries over the period ahead. Our continuing support to help them face external and internal challenges is a major factor in advancing our interests in the region.

For Jordan. Therefore, in fiscal year 1984, we are requesting $20 million in economic support funds (ESF), $115 million in foreign military sales guarantees (FMS), and $2 million for International military education and training (IMET). Under the fiscal year 1983 supplemental request, Jordan would receive an additional $35 million in FMS, which brings the total for that category in FY 1983 to $75 million.

Our continued support for Jordan is crucial to its ability to remain a viable, moderate factor in the region. We must encourage this country to join direct peace negotiations with Israel by ensuring that Jordan has confidence in its own strength and that support from the United States is sufficient for the Government of Jordan to accept the heightened risk to its security which entering such negotiations is likely to entail. We must help assure Jordan's ability to keep its borders secure and to continue its policy of preserving peace along its frontier with Israel. It is in our interest to encourage Jordan to continue to be an effective regional source of military training and advisory assistance.

Jordan urgently requires more modern armament, especially in the face of the Soviet resupply of hostile Syria. FMS financing assists in the acquisition of military equipment most critical to Jordan's legitimate self-defense. Any arms request from Jordan will be considered carefully. Congress will be consulted and have ample opportunity to review major arms sales decisions. Priority material for which this funding is intended includes ammunition, armored personnel carriers, communication equipment, chemical protective equipment, and spare parts.

IMET enhances the professional capability of Jordan's armed forces and contributes to the general Western orientation of Jordan's officer corps. This funding also assures that Jordan can continue its valuable military training and advisory assistance role in the region. A role we see as generally supportive of U.S. interests.

In addition to security assistance, this request provides for continuation of our longstanding support of Jordan's economic development. Jordan's economy is heavily dependent upon transfer payments in the form of foreign (primarily Arab) aid and expatriate worker remittances. Our assistance has long been an important supplement to these receipts, but it is more significant now that these flows are likely to be adversely affected by the reduced earnings of the oil exporting countries of the Gulf. ESF funds will continue to assist in the development of water and waste water systems, Jordan valley irrigation projects and health and agricultural programs. The program will also emphasize institution building through management training and technology transfer.

. . . . . .

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, we are working closely with the governments of each of these three countries to foster common objectives of peace, freedom, security and progress toward economic and social aspirations. A continued adequate level of economic and security assistance is crucial to our interests in each of these countries. We will not have peace in the Middle East and stability in Southwest Asia if we do not back our rhetoric with resources.

MR. HAMILTON. Does anyone else have a statement, or are you ready to go?

Let's start with the military assistance for Jordan. We have a big increase there. You are requesting $115 million for FMS for 1984, and that is a huge increase over the $40 million provided in 1983. I see you have a supplemental there, but even with the supplemental of $35 million, you have got a big jump.

So the first question, I guess, is why the increase?

MR. PLACKE. Mr. Chairman, going back a bit further in history, I am sure you recall that this level of funding is substantially less than that which we had sustained through much of the 1970's until it declined to these present levels.

I might note that the administration's request for fiscal year 1983 was a total of $75 million, which accounts for the additional funding we are seeking through the supplemental appropriation.

The increase that we are seeking for 1984 is indeed a substantial one. It is intended, in part, to address the accumulation of requirements that we see in Jordan that have mounted over the past several years.

This level of funding is not for extraordinary new programs or for exotic weapon systems, but simply to maintain the Jordanian army and other military forces at an adequate state of preparedness and to engage in modest modernization of those forces.

MR. HAMILTON. It is meant as an inducement for Jordan to enter the peace process? We are all awaiting the King's decision here. This isn't a little carrot, is it, to bring him into the peace process?

MR. PLACKE. Not in the direct sense, Mr. Chairman, no. Clearly this level of funding is not something that is going to influence King Hussein's decision. The issues are far too fundamental and important for Jordan and, indeed, for the region to be affected by a program of this magnitude or probably any level of funding one could reasonably foresee.

It is related to our efforts to encourage Hussein to participate openly and directly in the peace process in the sense that by doing so he certainly is going to accept a higher level of risk, particularly vis-à-vis Syria and some of the other radical states in the region. In order to make that risk an acceptable one, we believe it is important to enhance Jordan's security by these means.

MR. HAMILTON. So it is related to, but not linked, is that what it is?

MR. PLACKE. Yes, sir.

MR. HAMILTON. Are we tying Jordan's access to some of these sophisticated weapons like the F-16 in any way to their participation in the peace process?

MR. PLACKE. No, sir. It is an open secret that Jordan is interested in modernization of its air defenses and foresees a requirement for an advanced fighter aircraft as well as a ground-to-air missile system, but that is certainly not incorporated into this request. Indeed, we have no request from the Government of Jordan pending at this time. That is another issue that would be addressed somewhere down the road.

Clearly there is a political environment that surrounds these requests, and Jordan's position on the peace process and the level of engagement that it seeks, we all recognize will influence that environment.

. . . . . .

MR. HAMILTON. What is the status of this sale, anyway? We have been hearing for a long time about the Hawk missiles, the F-16's, and other items, the Stinger missiles, where does that stand at the moment?

Have they made a formal request for any of those items?

COLONEL MCKALIP. They have not to my knowledge.

Maybe I should defer to Mr. Placke.

MR. HAMILTON. Where does all this stuff come from? You tell me that they have not made any request. We keep hearing about it. What is going on here?

MR. PLACKE. Well, sir, as I said earlier, it is an open secret that Jordan believes that its air defense systems are well below those of its potential adversaries. Looking at Syria, for example, the Syrian Air Force is vastly superior to that of Jordan. The Syrian air attack capabilities are a current threat to Jordan, and one that their present air defense systems would not be adequate to meet.

The question is probably more one of timing. As I noted earlier, there is, as we all recognize, a political environment or a political context that surrounds these kinds of questions. The need for an enhanced air defense system for Jordan is pressing, but until we receive a request from the Jordanian Government, we don't have anything to deal with, and we are not in a position to address the question.

MR. HAMILTON. When do you anticipate getting the request?

MR. PLACKE. It is impossible to say, sir.

MR. HAMILTON. Is it related to a settlement in Lebanon?

MR. PLACKE. No, sir.

MR. HAMILTON. A troop withdrawal?

MR. PLACKE. I think it would be more in the course of decisions to be made by King Hussein in regard to his position on the Middle East peace process, recognizing that that certainly is an element in the environment in which that request will be received.

MR. HAMILTON. Are you saying to us, then, if the King enters the peace process, this administration is going to be receptive to a sale of these fancy things to Jordan?

MR. PLACKE. I think, sir, in all candor that the administration would support a request from Jordan for improvement of its air defenses whatever policies Jordan pursues so long as they are compatible with our general interests in the Middle East. With respect to Middle East peace, it is—

MR. HAMILTON. How could it be compatible if they don't join the peace process?

MR. PLACKE. I think, sir, so long as Jordan maintains its present posture of contributing to the general stability of the region—and it has done so, I think, in really dramatic ways for a sustained period of time.

MR. HAMILTON. So you think the administration will entertain favorably a request for F-16's, the Hawk missiles, and the Stinger missiles, and so forth, whether or not the King enters the peace process?

MR. PLACKE. I could not predict with that level of precision, but I think we would certainly examine very carefully and take a sympathetic approach toward Jordan's request. It would depend upon the size and the content of that request as to what the final determination would be.

. . . . . .

MR. WINN. Colonel, did you get those figures that I asked about? How many Soviet advisers are there in Jordan and what they are doing there?

COLONEL MCKALIP. I confirmed my understanding by looking at my statistics, and there are no Soviet advisers in Jordan at this time. I have to qualify that because I am sure you are aware that some months ago Jordan was reported to have entered into an agreement with the Soviet Union to provide certain air defense missile equipment.

To my knowledge this has not been delivered yet, but obviously, when it is delivered, there will have to be some sort of technical support as this is absorbed by the Jordanian forces. This would certainly bring into the country Soviet personnel, call them advisers, call them technicians, the label is open to debate.

We have expressed our concern about this, at least through Defense channels, and our counterparts have been very loud in assuring us that this is a onetime compartmentalized project and that they certainly have no intention of establishing a broad-ranged advisory relationship such as we have enjoyed between our two countries in the past and now enjoy.

MR. WINN. Doesn't the presence of the Soviet military advisers, or whatever they are going to be called, in Jordan enhance the risk of the security of the U.S. military equipment in Jordan's inventory, and wouldn't this place in risk the security of the F-16's if we sold them to them? It looks like we are a little inconsistent.

COLONEL MCKALIP. I don't think so, sir. I think that this argument can be made but it must be overemphasized. We also have confidence, particularly in the case of the Kingdom of Jordan, in their ability to provide adequate security for these various systems and to guard against the mixing which you suggest.

I would observe, having spent some time in Jordan, that they do have an especially competent military establishment. We have no reason to believe at this time that they would not be able to provide adequate security. I would also add that the ability to provide the security would be one of the considerations that we would examine if we were requested to make such a sale.

MR. WINN. What I am saying, and this is my last question, Mr. Chairman, or statement, I doubt very much that there are the votes in Congress to support a sale of the I-Hawk, or the F5-G, or the F-16 even. I am trying in my own mind to say that it looks to me like we are taking on another divisive military sale and another ugly fight similar to the AWACS battle.

I think that possibly rather than come up here with any more requests for controversial arms sales, that the administration would do better to expand its energies on the peace process.

MR. PLACKE. If I could respond to that, Congressman Winn.

MR. WINN. Certainly.

MR. PLACKE. I think we have to be careful to make a distinction between the request that the administration is proposing here, which is for modernization of largely ground forces and does not address this larger, more far-reaching and much more expensive question of modernizing Jordan's air defense systems and getting into a new air superiority fighter and so on. That is a question that we have not yet had to address, and it is difficult to predict when and in what form that might occur.

So far as the Soviet adviser issue that you raise, the technicians or whatever the appropriate term might be, it is my understanding that Jordan military personnel have gone to the Soviet Union to be trained on that system.

The system, as you will recall, was purchased because Jordan's assessment of its air defense requirements and our inability to respond to them in a way that was generally judged by military experts on both sides to be fully effective. They turned to the Soviets, therefore, as a second choice, perhaps as a choice of last resort.

Be that it as it may, the training that the Jordanian officers and NCO's receive in the Soviet Union, combined with relatively short-term and compartmentalized assistance in training on site, as it were, by the Soviet advisers yet to arrive in Jordan, altogether means a relatively short term, discrete, and contained program, certainly nothing near the scope of the assistance relationship that has existed bilaterally between us over such a long period of time.

I think it is entirely feasible to monitor that program to see that this is in fact the course that it takes, and to be fully aware of whatever risks there might be, which at the moment we think are minimal, to the integrity and security of our military systems.

It is a serious question that you raise. I think the answer is that the degree of likelihood that the Soviets can get into a position to seriously prejudice our interest in maintaining our security and military technology is a low risk at this point.

MR. WINN. I disagree with you. It looks to me like they are the 12th man in the huddle.

. . . . . .

MR. ZSCHAU. Last month a majority of Senators cosponsored a resolution[3] saying, roughly, that until King Hussein entered the peace process and ceased the purchase of Soviet arms, we should not sell any advanced weapons to Jordan. You have said, they have not requested those weapons, but this perhaps was in anticipation of a request.

Do you feel that that kind of action is helpful in motivating King Hussein to enter the peace process, or do you feel that that might be counterproductive?

MR. PLACKE. With due regard to that document, I think I would have to come down on the side of it being counterproductive for this reason: just as the conflict between the Arab States and Israel has a very long history, there is a long history of failed efforts by the United States, and indeed others, to bring about a resolution of that conflict.

When the President made his announcement on September 1 and laid out an American design or American principles for settlement, he did so mindful of the history that lies behind it. It has never been done at that level by any American administration before, so it was a very substantial commitment.

What I am saying is that in light of the history of the last 35 years, it is not surprising that there is a certain reservation about how sustained an American initiative can be. I think that all of the states of the region are well aware that there are three equal branches to this Government and that they can look at this issue quite differently. But to the extent that there are questions raised which can cause doubts to exist, or encourage doubts, about the ability of the administration to maintain a coherent policy line on this critical issue, I think that is not constructive.

MR. ZSCHAU. As a final question, I would just like to ask, are you suggesting that since the timetable for King Hussein's decision seems to be so near, you were talking about the month of March, would you advise the Congress that we should avoid any actions at this time and allow the King to make his decision without the benefit of such carrots or sticks?

MR. PLACKE. If a benign political environment could prevail, I think that would certainly be helpful at this juncture.

. . . . . .

MR. LEVINE. Let me move to one other area. What is the purpose, in your opinion, in the eyes of Jordan of obtaining Soviet equipment and Soviet military assistance at this time?

MR. PLACKE. To recall that bit of history as best I can, Jordan's assessment, and one which I think our own military largely share, is that there is a pressing need for a vastly modernized and improved air defense.

MR. LEVINE. Their defense against whom?

MR. PLACKE. Their defense against, at this point, as we discussed earlier, Syria constituting the principal threat.

MR. LEVINE. Let me just interrupt you at this point. Why would the Soviet Union have an interest in giving Jordan assistance in improving its defense against Syria?

MR. PLACKE. It is not unique certainly in Soviet policy to come down on both sides of a conflict. They have done it again in the Iran/Iraq affair, for example. They have done it with respect to North and South Yemen. There they are supplying arms heavily to both sides, and you have Soviet tanks shooting at each other, and so forth. So that is not uncharacteristic of Soviet policy.

Why Jordan? I think the history of our own relationship with Jordan suggests at least part of the answer. Jordan and the United States have enjoyed a close and, I believe, quite productive security relationship contributing to stability throughout the region, and taking it outside of the context of just the states on its immediate borders, but looking toward the Gulf, the role that it played earlier in the Oman war, the advisers that it has made available to North Yemen, and so on. The Jordanian Army is a highly skilled, I think by all military judgments, fighting force—one of the best in the region—we benefit from its availability for security purposes that are consistent with our objectives.

This has been a very productive relationship over a long period of time. If an opportunity arises where the Soviets can insert themselves into that relationship, perhaps with the longer term hope of detracting from it or disrupting it in some way, clearly they would conceive that to be clearly in line with their interest.

MR. LEVINE. Do we do anything to discourage the Jordanians from seeking military assistance from the Soviet Union?

MR. PLACKE. Yes, sir. We raised with them our serious concerns about the implications of a security relationship, however limited it might be, along the lines of some of the earlier questions today, our necessary concern with the security of our military technology. They have explained to us that they can contain this, compartmentalize it, to a very limited relationship along the lines that I attempted to describe earlier this morning. I think we will be looking very carefully to see that that in fact is the way that things develop.

U.S. Decision To Remove the Marines From Lebanon

MR. SHERMAN. Mr. Hughes, why did the United States Marines leave Beirut when they did? [2]

MR. HUGHES. Well, I think that the President sent the Marines into Beirut to do a specific job. It was an honorable decision. I think it was based on principle and integrity. There was'nt any narrow gain in it for the United States. It was rather a selfless contribution. It was intended to—with the Italians and the French, to help restore peace to a country that had been terribly tortured, that had suffered bombing and seen hundreds of its people killed in Beirut; and the intent was to be a stabilizing factor.

At the time the President made the decision to withdraw those troops, it seemed from all the evidence available that they had done their job properly. The PLO departure operation had gone forward. More members of the PLO than anybody had thought were in Beirut had been evacuated. The departure operation had been undertaken in a shorter period than had been planned. There had been no violence.

We had seen a new President of Lebanon elected in a situation which seemed to be confused. The situation on the ground was peaceful. The Lebanese armed forces and the Lebanese police seemed to be taking hold, which was one of the goals that we had been working toward.

So, given the peaceful situation, given the situation as it existed on the ground and the best intelligence available to the administration, the decision was made to bring those Marines out. Of course, the President had said to Congress that they would be there for a maximum of 30 days, and they were brought out in less than the 30 days.

. . . . . .

MR. SHERMAN. The Ambassador from France to Lebanon and Yasser Arafat and the present Prime Minister of Lebanon and other diplomats all say that the United States pulled out too early.

What's your response?

MR. HUGHES. I suppose that—you know, in retrospect, in the light of the terrible tragedy that occurred in the two camps, [3] every man or woman of conscience or sensitivity has to ask himself or herself whether the United States could have done—or whether an individual, or whether the United States could have done anything differently that would have averted that tragedy. I suppose we can't really answer that question because it's a hypothetical one.

I guess the answer is that, given the conditions as they existed and that they were peaceful—given the fact that nobody could have foretold the assassination of Bashir Gemayel shortly after our Marines left and nobody could have foretold the events that were triggered by the assassination which included the invasion of West Beirut by the Israeli forces [4]—none of that could have been foreseen—I think that the decision that was made was made on the basis of the information that was available and was the nearest right that could have been made at that time.

. . . . . .

MR. SHERMAN. What about the guarantees that Philip Habib gave the Lebanese

[4] President-elect Gemayel was assassinated on September 14, 1982, and Israeli forces entered West Beirut that same day.

Government for the safety and security of the civilians in the Palestinian camps—guarantees he gave on August 17 and 18?

Were those guarantees fulfilled?

MR. HUGHES. They were guarantees based, as I said earlier, on assurances from the Israelis and assurances from various Lebanese factions that they would do two things.

One, that they would not interfere with the departure plan, which they did not. That went smoothly. And we think that implicit in those assurances was protection for the Palestinian civilians, noncombatants, who would be left behind.

We believed in those assurances. We took them in good faith, and we said that we would do our utmost to honor them. The assurances were overtaken by events over which we had no control. As I say, the assassination of a new President and the events that transpired after that, and the occupation of West Beirut by the Israelis.

secure the withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon. Renewal of UNIFIL, in our judgment, tends to reaffirm international support for these goals.

The United States, moreover, believes that renewal of UNIFIL can be a positive element in the negotiations between the Government of Lebanon and other parties in the Middle East. These negotiations, in which the United States is playing an active part, are designed precisely to restore Lebanon's full sovereignty and territorial integrity and to prevent any repetition of the recent tragic conflict in a way that will assure peace and security for Lebanon and for all of its neighbors.

It is not yet possible to define with precision the role UNIFIL may be called on to play in the arrangements under negotiation. However, by acting to extend UNIFIL for 6 months the Security Council has wisely ensured that UNIFIL will be available to assist in the peace process.

I thank you, Mr. President.

The Impasse Between Israel and Lebanon

. . . . . .

Q. Did President Reagan agree with President Mubarak that, as far as Lebanon is concerned, the prime onus is now on Israel? Or did President Reagan, as he seemed to suggest in his departure statement, [11] reiterate the view that it is really a concurrent, tripartite responsibility—Israel, the PLO, and the Syrians?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me answer it this way. I think President Reagan is very impatient with the lack of progress so far in the Lebanese situation, and wants to break this loose as soon as possible. In our view, the key to this is the current negotiations between the Israelis and the Lebanese. We believe that, once you get an agreed framework on the withdrawal of Israeli forces and it is clear they are going to withdraw, then you will be able to get the Syrians and the PLO to, also, agree to withdraw in that time frame.

I am not suggesting that there are not other discussions going on between the Lebanese and the Syrians, the Lebanese and the PLO, other Arabs and these people—because there are. But, clearly, in the President's view, the key is breaking the impasse between Israel and Lebanon at this time.

its relationships in the region. So there are some big gaps there.

The problems of securing the complete withdrawal of the Syrian and PLO forces we have confronted, in a sense to the extent that you can confront them at the moment, that is the Syrians say they will withdraw when the Israelis withdraw. I think we also have good grounds to believe that the PLO will go with the Syrians or will withdraw as the Syrians withdraw.

Q. (Inaudible)

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It's for that reason, I guess, that it appears as though our efforts are more directed toward the Israeli-Lebanon dimensions than they are the Lebanon-PLO dimension because it takes a plan for Israeli withdrawal to provide the acid test of the Syrian statements. So we are in the midst of the kind of a process, and I wish I could report that there were breakthroughs in the offing. I'm sure there are, but I can't identify them. (Laughter)

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you believe the conditions are such that the Israelis could safely withdraw now? You say they don't seem to believe so at this point?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. What I said was that the conditions that they have put forward are quite different from the conditions that the Lebanese seem to be ready to accept, so there is a gap there that has to be worked on by both parties. In the end, of course, people have to be their own judges of what their security demands, but of course, we have our opinions also and we're in with them.

Q. What is your analysis?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I believe there is a genuine convergence of views on finding appropriate security arrangements for southern Lebanon so that you have a real insurance policy that the geographic area doesn't become the base for attacks on Israel. That is accepted as a legitimate objective. So the question is what does it take to do that and how do you do that, and not whether it should be done. My own opinion is that it can be done, and it ought to be possible to do it consistent with appropriate sovereignty for Lebanon. But I am not able just to write out the ticket and hand it to people, and there is a big difference of view about what is necessary. Beyond that are the issues surrounding so-called normalization, and that's a different kind of an issue entirely and was not part of the announced rationale for going into Lebanon in the first place, but nevertheless, is an objective. I would say from the United States point of view that, of course, we believe that the desirable objective is peace among Israel and all of her neighbors.

To that extent, I think the basic peace process involving not only Israel's security but the legitimate concerns and rights of the Palestinians is in the deepest sense at the heart of the security issues because if that can be resolved in a satisfying way, then the tension of the sort of militarily-oriented security arrangements is much less.

So this always takes me in my thinking back to the basic Camp David September 1st President's proposals as really the core of the issues to be resolved.

Q. I take it from what you have said you're not one of those who think the solution is leveling the boom on Israel?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I don't think that forcing people to do things that they believe is against their interest produces lasting solutions to the problems. I don't think it will produce a lasting solution for Israel to force Lebanon to do something that Lebanon feels deeply is not in their interest. By the same token, I think you apply that to any important party in a negotiation, so obviously negotiations are surrounded by an environment of pressures and considerations and arguments, and I don't deem that negotiations are abstracted from that, but just trying to push people around all the time, I don't think, is the way. You might get a solution but it wouldn't necessarily be lasting.

"The Key Question Is Security Not Normalization"

. . . . . .

MR. LANTOS. Why do we seem to be critical of policies for normalization of relations between Lebanon and Israel?

MR. VELIOTES. I would like to address this. I do not accept the premise of the question. We have said publicly and privately that we not only favor normalization of relations, but we favor peace treaties between Israel and all of its Arab neighbors, and everyone else with whom Israel may formally be at a state of war, and with whom it does not have normal relations in that area. That includes Lebanon.

The question has not been that. The question has been judgments as to what is possible in the short-term, which is taking, must take into account, above all, Lebanese judgments of what is possible, given their own internal issues and Lebanon's relations and, frankly, economic dependence on the Arab world.

Now, there has been a lot of rhetoric flowing around that somehow there were agreements that had been achieved between Israel and Lebanon that did not happen to be agreements when it came down to them.[14] There were some who said fact that what people claim had been achieved really hadn't been achieved was due to the Americans.

Now, I don't believe there are many people gullible enough or stupid enough to swallow that line, and I know that wasn't the implication of your question, sir. The problems are in the Lebanese making judgments as to what it is that they can sustain.

Now, this Government of Lebanon is clearly on the record as wanting good relations with Israel, frankly wanting friendly relations with Israel. There is no hostile intent whatsoever. It is thoroughly prepared to consider effective security arrangements on its own territory, to preclude the buildup of any hostile element in the south or anywhere else in Lebanon, because anyone who comes into Lebanon to threaten Israel is also threatening the Lebanese, and that specifically includes the PLO.

They are meeting, as I mentioned earlier. There are no secrets. They are not hiding in closets. They are meeting openly in Israel and in Lebanon, talking about a whole variety of issues, including the framework for future relations, and the Lebanese in my judgment have to be the ones who make the controlling judgment on what it is they can do at any point in time.

Now, I should say that some people are accusing the Americans of playing a negative role with respect to Israel's aims in Lebanon. There are others, radical Arabs, accusing us of being Zionist tools in the negotiations. That usually suggests we are doing some good things, if we are in the middle of these two extremes, and we are.

It gets to the question of security, Mr. Lantos. The Lebanese, if they cede the things that they believe are going to destroy their internal consensus, that is going to lead to instability, not stability. Or if they cede things that are going to dramatically affect their economic well-being and their hopes for reconstruction and prosperity, that is going to lead to instability, and I think instability in Lebanon is certainly not in the security interests of Israel.

Incidents Between U.S. Marines and Israelis

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, can you give us your own reaction to the half dozen incidents that have occurred between our Marines and the Israelis in Lebanon? And could you also respond to this growing feeling that the Marines are in there for a longer stay than we initially thought. Some people are now talking about the possibility that the Marines may be there for another year.

THE PRESIDENT. I can't set any time limit on it. We're trying to expedite the departure from Lebanon of all the foreign forces in there. These incidents are the type of thing that can happen, and the best answer to them is for the Israelis, the Syrians and what remnants of the PLO there are, to go back beyond their own borders. The multinational forces were put in there at the request of the Lebanese government, while they tried to establish stability in their own country.

And this is evidence of it, the fact that where the multinational forces are carrying out their purpose, these repeated efforts to go through their lines and do what has been agreed that they will not do. And I think our forces are behaving very well.

Sam? [16]

Q. Sir, I'd like to follow up on that. Did the Marine captain do the right thing? Were the Israelis trying to penetrate a place where they should not have? And, I guess more importantly, do we now have assurances from Israel that it won't happen again?

THE PRESIDENT. We do have such assurances. And I must say that, yes, the same unit and the same commander had tried three times at this same point. [17] And, in my view, the Marine officer did the only thing that he could do.

Israel Is "Technically in the Position of an Occupying Force" in Lebanon

. . . . . .

Q. —ask you about your relationship with Mr. Begin? (Laughter) There is—settlements proceeding apace on the West Bank. There's tension between our forces and Israeli forces in Beirut. And I'm wondering if the Reagan plan is falling on totally deaf ears as far as Mr. Begin is concerned. Is your relationship—has your relationship improved at all?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think that it is—it is as strange as some would have you believe. I think. I think that we've established quite a personal bond on his visits here.

It's true we disagree on this particular issue about getting out of Lebanon because we know that in our efforts to try and bring the Arab States around to the position that Egypt once took so that they can make peace with Israel.

We have to be careful. And one of the big contentions is the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. And Israel is delaying, we believe, unnecessarily in that. So Phil Habib has gone back again and—with a proposal and a plan. And we're hopeful that they finally will because the Arab nations are holding back and are reluctant unless they see this kind of gesture of good will.

Also, I think that there's a certain moral point that we think the Israelis are neglecting or not observing. And that is the new Government of Lebanon, after all these years of revolution and upheaval, has asked all the foreign forces to leave. For them not to leave now puts them technically in the position of an occupying force, that they are there by force in this country that has said to them, "We now want you to depart."

So we're going to continue trying to bring this peace movement on. But we don't believe that we can move to the actual peace negotiations in the Middle East until the Lebanon situation is clearer. And I personally have believed that if this requires even an increase in the Multinational Force for further stability that we should be willing to do that.

Lebanon: "A Country Torn Asunder"

. . . . . .

Our objective in Lebanon is straightforward. We seek to restore Lebanese sovereignty and insure Israeli security. These objectives are two sides of the same coin. The threat to Israel does not come from the Lebanese people but from foreign forces that have usurped Lebanese sovereignty and are still camped on Lebanese soil. It follows that a peaceful Lebanon, free of all foreign forces and sovereign over all its territory, will make a major contribution to Israeli security.

We are currently engaged in diplomatic efforts seeking the withdrawal of external military forces and the restoration of Lebanese authority over its territory. At the same time, it is vital that the Government of Lebanon, weakened by years of civil strife, the inability to collect normal governmental revenues, and the lack of normal governmental services, be assisted in revitalizing itself. The financial situation of the government is precarious. It cannot move ahead with the reconstruction of the country without outside assistance. The United States can and must join with other nations in that effort. Both military and economic assistance are needed.

. . . . . .

MR. WEISS. I would like to ask you, the one question I have, about what seems to me to be an orchestration of criticism from various quarters of this administration aimed at Israel, as if, in fact, Israel were the sole block toward a settlement of the situation in Lebanon. I saw that the [19] Source: Foreign Assistance Legislation for Fiscal Years 1984–85: Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1984), Part 1, pp. 107–108, 144–147.

Syrians and the PLO have indicated they are ready to move out simultaneously. I would like to have you give us some specifics as to when and who said that. I know the Israelis have said it publicly. I have not seen anything from the Syrians or the PLO. I note that Secretary Weinberger took a situation which almost ended in a tragedy, to a great extent if not totally, because of his refusal to allow lines of communication between our forces and the Israeli forces, blown up as if it, in fact, was the Israelis' fault, when the facts seem to indicate our people didn't have clear direction as to where the line of demarcation was. I would like your comments as to whether there is a policy on the part of the administration to lay the blame on the shoulders of the Israelis exclusively.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The policy of the administration is to support our friend, Israel, in its efforts to security and to do everything we can to help bring peace in the Middle East. The administration's program, as presented to you in the material that is before you, is a very strong and supportive program, and the speech that the President made on September 1 [20] goes to extraordinary lengths to recognize the importance of the security of Israel. There isn't any ambiguity about it whatever. Insofar as the undertakings of the PLO and Syria are concerned to leave Lebanon, we don't deal directly with the PLO, so any comments made by them come to us second hand, through the Government of Lebanon, or somebody else who is in contact with them.

As far as Syria is concerned, the statement you quoted has been made to me by the Foreign Minister of Syria, but more recently, of course, that is what they have told the Government of Lebanon.

Now, at this point their statement, they can just make the statement—you don't have any way of testing it out until you have a plan for the withdrawal of Israel.

MR. WEISS. Why not have simultaneous concessions—

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Wait. Let me answer the question. So naturally the concerns of Israel about her security which prompted their movement into Lebanon in the first place are matters that have to be taken and taken carefully and seriously. And so that effort in connection with the program of withdrawal is underway, attention is being paid to that, because that is the process that is before us right now. And I believe that most people involved are impatient, for good reason. The country of Lebanon is a country that has been torn up by the inability of all parties to produce any reasonable peace in the Middle East, and particularly the issues surrounding the Palestinians have been apparently impossible to address. They have caused Lebanon to be a country torn asunder. Lebanon has to put itself back together again. It has its maximum chance when the war stops to do that. The longer things drag on, the greater the difficulty. So I think there is a real importance to some speed in that regard.

I am sure the Israelis feel it. We feel it. The Lebanese feel it. And others in the region do. So this expression of impatience is universally felt, it is not anti-Israel. It is pro getting the matter settled.

MR. HYDE. You don't see a double standard operative in requiring the President to certify that progress is made in human rights conditions in one country, say El Salvador, but over in Lebanon, where 438 people we know were killed in a massacre, 900 people are missing, and nobody is going to go to trial anywhere in Lebanon, the Phalangists, nobody is pursuing who did the killing, the identity of these people, who was in command of them. It just seems to me enormous human rights violations have occurred there, but we are not going to require any certification that human rights conditions are improving in Lebanon as a condition precedent to sending over $1.3 or $1.4 billion. And I see that as a double standard.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Poor Lebanon. Lebanon has been destroyed almost by problems that did not originate in Lebanon. They have a big Palestinian population in Lebanon. They became the headquarters for the PLO which created a Government within the country and contributed tremendously to the ripping up of that society. My heart bleeds for Lebanon. I think Lebanon, of all countries in this world, deserves all the help and support it can get because it has suffered by our inability to come to grips adequately with these other problems.

Now, Lebanon has plenty of problems of its own in composing its own confessional groups, and, of course, the massacre that you referred to has a relationship to that. Does anybody feel a sense of the humanity and the shame connected with those massacres? I am sure they do. We have had an exhibition of a democratic government in Israel undertaking a thorough investigation, having the report of the investigation come out, having it acted upon by the Government. [21] Personally, I found that extremely impressive. But the sense of remorse must be very widespread. Personally, I feel it, because we were involved, in the United States, in undertakings when the first Beirut settlement was put forward. I think we behaved properly throughout. I think we took our forces out when we should have. There was stability there.

Nevertheless, these events took place. And I would think people throughout the world would feel some remorse about them, including you.

MR. HYDE. I feel more than remorse. I feel guilty at our guaranteeing the safety of those people in those examples.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We didn't guarantee their safety. What we did was transmit a statement made by the Government of Israel.

MR. HYDE. Which guaranteed their safety.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Which made certain undertakings.

MR. HYDE. If I may just say—

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Governments cannot control everything. We have to remember that.

MR. HYDE. Please understand me. I am not advocating a different standard for Lebanon. I am admonishing Congress for imposing formal requirements in certain parts of the world and being very informal in human rights concerns in others. It is Congress' double standard, not the administration.

Israeli Withdrawal As a Necessary Step to Peace and Security

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, Rick Smith, the New York Times. You said yesterday in your speech that your government was prepared to do everything that was necessary to help secure Israel's northern frontier. [23] What does that mean, Mr. Presi-

[21] On February 7, the Final Report of the Commission of Inquiry Into the Events at the Refugee Camps in Beirut was submitted to the Israeli Government by Commission chairman, Justice Yitzhak Kahan, and the other two members of the Commission, Justice Aharon Barak and Major General Yona Efrat. The Commission concluded that Israel was not directly responsible for the deaths at the camps, but bore indirect responsibility for what took place there. The Report called for the resignations of Defense Minister Ariel Sharon and Director of Military Intelligence Major General Yehoshua Saguy, and indicated that it might have called for Chief of Staff Lieutenant General Rafael Eitan's resignation, if he was not due to retire in 2 months. The Israeli Cabinet accepted the findings and Sharon subsequently stepped down as Defense Minister on February 17, but he remained in the Cabinet as a Minister Without Portfolio. For extracts from the authorized translation of the Report, see New York Times, February 9, 1983, pp. A18–A20.

For the full text of the interview, see ibid., pp. 279–290. The question-and-answer session took place in the State Dining Room of the White House where the President hosted the 17th anniversary of the weekly sessions begun by Godfrey Sperling, Jr., of the Christian Science Monitor, to bring Washington officials and journalists together for exchanges on current issues.

dent? Does that involve putting American Marines or troops down in Southern Lebanon to police that area? Or does that involve some kind of international arrangement? Did you have specific ideas in mind?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. This is not anything different than has been said before by me and by several Presidents before me, that this country has always maintained that it has an obligation to the security of Israel.

But in this particular instance, I was answering the question. And I thought I made it plain that I was talking about with the withdrawal—that in the aftermath of that withdrawal, we were prepared to guarantee their safety on the northern border.

Let me recall to you that that was the reason for the invasion in the first place, that there was shelling and rocketing across that border, taking its toll of casualties in Israel. And our idea of trying to settle the Lebanon thing before we get into the actual peace negotiations, I think, is a sound one after all the years of disruption there, to give the Government of Lebanon a chance to stabilize its country and assume its control and sovereignty over its own territory.

Now in that instance, I have already said that we in consultation with our allies in the Multinational Force would be prepared until Lebanon was actually stabilized and able to guarantee this safety we would be willing to enlarge the Multinational Forces. This is, of course, in consultation with our allies as I said before and, thus, ensure the safety of those borders until this process is completed, until Lebanon is ready to take over the protection of its own borders.

And so there is not anything new in that. And I was a little surprised at the wind that started blowing after I said it.

Q. How much of an enlargement of forces do you have in mind, sir?

THE PRESIDENT. What?

Q. How much enlargement of the Multinational Force do you have in mind?

THE PRESIDENT. Actually, we have not dealt in figures yet. That would, I think, have to follow a military review of what the responsibilities would be.

. . . . . .

Q. [Jack Nelson of The Los Angeles Times] Mr. Arens suggested, Mr. President, that there should be no timetable on withdrawal of troops. Do you agree with that?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't agree. I think time is not on our side in this. And I believe there's no reason why with the proposals that we've made that the PLO remnants that are still in Lebanon, the Syrians and the Israelis, why they can't get out of that country—of Lebanon, and let the Lebanese Government try to re-establish itself and establish sovereignty over its own land.

Q. One more time. Do you think this should be done, in other words, before a peace treaty is reached between Israel and Lebanon? And do you think there should be a specific deadline that you might mention?

THE PRESIDENT. I think that to wait for a peace treaty for the withdrawal of forces is wrong. And I think that that can come about and I think full normalization. I think there can be an agreement, an informal agreement there about what they're going to do with regard to withdrawal and the terms of the border and, as I say, our own willingness then to help in ensuring that there can't be incidents across that border is enough. And then settle down to the business of full, formal normalization with Lebanon.

But the longer we delay in this, the more we endanger the possibility of moving on into the general peace discussions.

Letter From the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations (Moore) to Representative Ike Skelton, March 1, 1983 [24]

No U.S. Armed Forces Involvement in Hostilities

DEAR MR. SKELTON: Your letter of February 10 to President Reagan has been referred to me for reply. I appreciate your concern for the well-being of our Marine personnel serving with the Multinational Force (MNF) in Lebanon. The U.S. Marines are in Lebanon for the specific purpose of assisting the Lebanese Government to reassert its authority and control of its sovereign territory. Strengthening the central government of Lebanon is an important step which will facilitate the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. The U.S. contingent to the MNF is a critical element in the restoration of peace and security to the capital city of Beirut. The U.S. role is an essential contribution toward a successful conclusion of the current negotiation efforts between Israel and Lebanon. As you know, Ambassadors Habib and Draper have been in Lebanon and Israel almost constantly for several months now as personal envoys of the President in an effort to lend our support to these important negotiations.

I can assure you that we are not unmindful of the continuing need to consult with the Congress on U.S. involvement in Lebanon and the Middle East situation in general. We have made a concerted effort to keep the Congress informed in a manner which I believe exceeds any requirement inherent in the War Powers Resolution. [25]

In response to your specific questions, I would like to make clear that we certainly do not discount the danger inherent in any U.S. presence in Lebanon. However, as the President's report to the Congress under the War Powers Resolution stated, [26] there was no intention or expectation that U.S. Armed Forces would become involved in hostilities. This remains the situation at this time. All parties involved clearly understand the guidelines under which the MNF was provided to assist the Government of Lebanon. With the MNF in Lebanon, there is additional assurance that hostilities will not resume.

The U.S. Marines are in Lebanon for a limited period of time. We do not envision an open-ended commitment. The U.S. component of the MNF will depart Lebanon as soon as the objectives of the MNF are achieved.

I hope this information is helpful.

With cordial regards,

Sincerely,

POWELL A. MOORE

Economic and Security Assistance For Lebanon

I welcome this opportunity to appear again before the subcommittee in support of the administration's supplemental foreign assistance request for Lebanon in fiscal year 1983. I have submitted a statement. There are some minor changes on page 5 and page 7. I will quickly summarize them, and I will also make sure I focus on those changes so all members of the subcommittee will have the language.

The $150 million in economic support funds, $100 million in foreign military sales guarantees, and $1 million in IMET funds we requested are needed now to begin urgent projects which cannot await the normal fiscal year 1984 appropriations cycle.

Lebanon endured nearly 8 years of brutal civil war followed by the Israeli invasion. During the period, the agony of Lebanon and its residents, as measured in human as well as physical terms, has been enormous. Although the major hostilities are over, the scars of the constant bloodletting and physical destruction are very vivid, and today the agony goes on in the form of the continued military occupation of most of Lebanon by the Israel Defense Forces, the Syrian Army, armed PLO elements, and other armed foreigners. The Lebanese Armed Forces, the legitimate military arm of the Lebanese Government, control only the capital city of Beirut.

Lebanese has been the victim over the years of a violent cycle of action and reaction and PLO attacks against Israel and Israeli retaliation. There can be no repeat of this unhappy history. It is necessary for the Lebanese Armed Forces to be the only armed force in Lebanon. It must be sufficiently strong to control effectively its borders and prevent outside armed groups from reentering the country. It must be equipped and trained to insure that Lebanon never again becomes the battleground for outside contending forces.

The United States fully supports the territorial integrity, unity, and sovereignty of Lebanon, which we believe is consistent with, indeed the prerequisite for, the long-term security of Israel's northern border.

The funds we are requesting will finance programs in Lebanon designed to help rebuild the economic and security infrastructure of that war-ravaged country, by providing the Government with the resources necessary to reestablish its sovereign authority throughout the country.

The ability of the Lebanese Government under President Gemayel to restore essential government services and maintain security is crucial to building a national consensus which will strengthen the Government's ability to negotiate the departure from Lebanon of all foreign forces. The departure of those forces is of vital importance to our purposes, both in Lebanon and with regard to the Middle East peace process.

A stable, reconstructed Lebanon, free from all foreign forces and with a strengthened Central Government exercising sovereign control over all of its territories, is a most worthy goal on its own merits. Such a Lebanon will also make a major contribution to the security of Israel's northern border.

Finally, this Lebanon, enjoying good relations with its neighbors, will give a stimulus to the broad peace process. For these reasons, it is critically important for us now to demonstrate in a concrete way the U.S. commitment to Lebanon's reconstruction and restoration as a sovereign and independent nation.

Lebanon and Israel are currently conducting direct, intense negotiations with our participation and support. Many exceedingly difficult problems remain, but the United States is working closely with both sides to help them reach a compromise which will satisfy the major issues of sovereignty and security.

When this occurs and when all foreign forces withdraw from Lebanon, we fully expect a resurgence of confidence among both Lebanese and foreign private investors, who will then start to play a major role in the reconstruction of Lebanon.

Reconstruction of infrastructure is urgent. The economy remains a shambles. Basic infrastructure is destroyed or deteriorated. The Government cannot provide much in the way of basic services outside Beirut and entrepreneurs are afraid to invest in reconstruction until they see positive signs of improvement.

The Government of Lebanon will need a great deal of assistance to accomplish the tasks before it. U.S. assistance alone will not suffice. Multinational agencies and other nations must also help, and indeed have already indicated to us their willingness to do so. They are all waiting, however, for the political and security situation to improve, and of course for the longer term stability that would be provided by the complete withdrawal of foreign forces. Their very waiting, however, is contributing to the fact that, other than the very significant restoration of security in Beirut, progress is limited.

The ESF funds will be used primarily to rehabilitate and reconstruct basic infrastructure, such as potable water systems, telecommunications, and public health services.

The FMS program will be supported by the slightly increased IMET program, military training program, which will improve overall training of the Lebanese Armed Forces. Equipment and training needs of these forces, while urgent, are paced by the availability of military manpower. FMS and IMET funds sought in the supplemental are matched to the ability of the Lebanese Armed Forces to absorb them. Lower FMS and IMET levels of $15 million and $750,000, respectively, are sought in fiscal year 1984 because all of the equipment for the LAF buildup should have been ordered by then.

Thus, to an extent Lebanon is caught in a vicious circle of inaction. The United States is taking steps to help break this vicious cycle. We are strengthening the military forces of the Government of Lebanon by providing equipment and training. Already, this assistance has had a notable effect.

The Lebanese Armed Forces are now in full control of Beirut, a city which contains over one-third of the population of Lebanon. No longer are armed militiamen or PLO fighters seen in the streets. This provides a highly visible political signal of the expanding ability of the Government of Lebanon to exercise sovereignty and to provide security.

In recent days, the Government has also taken over a portion of the Port of Beirut which had long been illegally operated by a private militia. Government forces are now in control of the administration of the entire port. Currently, the entire capital city of Beirut is enjoying peace for the first time in years. That is only the beginning, but the restoration of central institutions in Beirut is a model which we want to see expanded countrywide and which we believe can be.

However, these are only initial efforts and the overall security needs of that war-torn country require our urgent attention. By assisting the Lebanese Armed Forces to increase its capability, we are helping the Central Government reassert and extend its authority throughout the country. The expected increase in the size and effectiveness of the LAF forces in maintaining security will permit the withdrawal of the Multinational Forces.

We are talking about a LAF structure of some 20,000 personnel, which requires a great deal of equipment to provide for national security. We have nearly completed a program to make four brigades capable of performing this mission. In the next phase we plan to equip another brigade and further enhance the effectiveness of one of the original four brigades. This supplemental funds additional equipment and training for two more brigades. That would in effect, give Lebanon seven equipped brigades, an ideal long-term goal. But the Lebanese Armed Forces are ready now to take on new missions and put to use the new equipment and training they are receiving.

We know that the members of the subcommittee are interested in knowing how long the Multinational Forces will have to remain in Lebanon to bolster the security role of the Lebanese Armed Forces. I cannot today give you an exact date. But it is our intention to phase out the multinational presence just as soon as the evacuation of Syrian, Israeli, and Palestinian forces is complete and the Lebanese Army is able to do its job countrywide. The success of the military assistance program we are describing today will directly contribute to that goal.

As a result of technical assistance and infusions of modest but critical amounts of material assistance from the United States the Government of Lebanon is beginning to improve its organization, throw off the torpor induced by years of civil conflict, and gear up to rehabilitate and reconstruct basic infrastructure in order to get the economy moving.

In Lebanon, as anywhere, perceptions are important. As other donor organizations, such as the World Bank, and other donor countries perceive that some progress is being made, there will be a bandwagon effect. Some other donors have already agreed to participate in the reconstruction effort, but much more will be needed.

The funds which the United States contributes to this reconstruction effort, small in terms of total needs, will allow vital reconstruction to get started now, at a time when others are watching and waiting. Once this effort begins, we fully expect it will attract funds from other donors, funds which will carry the rehabilitation through to completion.

To conclude, Mr. Chairman,[28] even while the United States is currently working with the Government of Lebanon in an effort to obtain the departure of all foreign forces, critical projects for reconstruction and reequipping the Lebanese Armed Forces have begun. This is not lost upon the Lebanese Government or the people of Lebanon, who look to the United States as their principal friend during this most difficult time.

The actions which the United States takes in Lebanon this year and next will benefit not only Lebanon but the entire Middle East for years to come. We cannot overemphasize the impact that our programs in Lebanon will have upon our efforts to obtain a just and lasting peace for all countries in this important region.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Letter From the Commandant of the U.S. Marine Corps (Barrow) to the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), March 14, 1983[29]

Marine Corps Commandant's Concern Over Incidents With Israeli Defense Forces

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I must formally register my deep concern over the two unprovoked incidents in Beirut of this past weekend involving Marines of the Multinational Force and members of the Israeli Defense Forces. I had considered commenting on earlier incidents between Marines and the IDF but corrective measures, which were rapidly implemented in February 1983, appeared to defuse the situation. I can no longer remain silent on this continual problem of provocation from the IDF.

In addition to the U.S. MNF incidents, I have received information concerning serious harassing incidents by the IDF of U.S. officers attached to the United Nations Truce Supervisory Organization (UNTSO). These particular incidents involved USMC and USA officers in life-threatening situations, replete with verbal degradation of the officers, their uniform and country. Unfortunately, and of greater concern to me, incidents of this nature are the rule, rather than the exception.

It is evident to me, and the opinion of the U.S. Commanders afloat and ashore, that the incidents between the Marines and the IDF are timed, orchestrated, and executed for obtuse Israeli political purposes. The U.S. has been prompt and forthcoming in defusing previous problems and has established a viable communications procedure between the Marines and IDF. The IDF, however, persists in creating serious incidents.

I am distinctly proud to have Marines participating both as members of the Multinational Force and with UNTSO under the auspices of the United Nations. It is inconceivable to me why Americans—serving in peacekeeping roles—must be harassed, endangered, and degraded by an ally.

Previous demarches and diplomatic initiatives have not eliminated difficulties between our Marines and the IDF. Additionally, the expansion of communications links and the use of Liaison Officers will not preclude additional problems, unless the attitude and actions of the Israelis are altered. It is time for firm and strong action, to demonstrate to the Israelis that a role as a peacekeeper does not presume weakness. If anything, the Israelis should respect our efforts in this region.

Warm personal regards.

Sincerely,

BOB

U.S. Policy Objectives in Lebanon

. . . . . .

SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. . . . Let me reiterate for you briefly our policy objectives which were first outlined last fall by the President. They are the guiding principles in the negotiations that Ambassadors Habib and Draper have been conducting these past months, and they are central to the discussions we are holding with the two delegations here: [31]

One, the withdrawal of all foreign forces—Israeli, Syrian, PLO, Iranian, you name them. All armed elements remaining in Lebanon must be subject to the control of the Central Government, and this includes the militia forces in the south.

Second, arrangements to secure the security of Israel's northern border; third, the restoration and reenforcement of a stable Central Government in Lebanon, the extension of Lebanese sovereignty throughout its territory, and the unity of that territory.

Then, of course, subsumed under all of these are arrangements to assure the security of all of the residents of Lebanon, including the Palestinians.

While many issues have been dealt with and agreement has been reached in the course of the negotiations, we are now at the point of addressing the remaining core issues. It is essential that momentum is not lost in the timetable for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon be worked out as soon as possible.

I have mentioned the President's personal involvement and his commitment through his meetings with the Foreign Ministers. In addition, Secretary Shultz has been conferring with and briefing the President throughout the visit of these two Foreign Ministers.

Once an agreement has been reached for the withdrawal of all foreign troops, it will be clearer to what extent an international presence is needed to assist the Lebanese armed forces. I should say it would be clearer as to the nature of the international assistance, because I think it's clear that there will be a need for some time.

We continue to see an important role for the 6,000 UNIFIL troops currently in Lebanon. There is also a need for the Multinational Force. The objectives of this force would be to facilitate the withdrawal process and to assist the Lebanese Central Government in reestablishing its control throughout Lebanon. These details will be worked out.

The security of Israel's northern border is a hallmark of U.S. policy. The United States will do all it can to assure that an agreement is reached which will preclude a return to a situation in which hostile acts can be perpetrated on Israel across its northern border from Lebanon.

Israel has pressed its case for full normalization of relations with Lebanon. This is the second part of the discussion, the first part being the security issue. That is a worthy goal, and one we readily share.

We will continue to strive to see full peace, security, and normal relations between Israel and each of her neighbors, as we seek to resolve the Palestinian problem. This is the basic message in the proposals outlined in the President's initiative on September 1.

At present, progress towards this goal, full normalization and full peace with Lebanon, must be conditioned by Lebanese judgments of what is possible, consistent with Lebanese needs for internal stability and political consensus, as well as the essential relations with the other Arab countries. A stable, secure, and free Lebanon would be an historic achievement for the area, for Lebanon, for Israel, and for the world. A Lebanon beset by strife, living

Assurances From Israel of Cessation of Incidents

MR. KONDRACKE. Mr. Secretary, the Government of Israel says that recent confrontations between its troops and ours in Lebanon result from your refusal to establish direct liaison with Israeli forces there. The Israelis say that they have such relations with the British, with the French, with the Italians, but not with us. What do you say about that?

A. Well, I say that that is basically not a correct statement. We do have liaison at all levels where it is required. We have basically the same kind of liaison that is possessed by the other members of the multinational force. We recently had meetings between the Marine Field Commander and the Commander of the Israeli forces, and we have all of the communication that is possible and that is possessed by the other units.

MR. KONDRACKE. But is there now going to be consistent direct liaison between our forces and theirs, so that these incidents won't take place again?

A. There is to be basically no change. The Marine Commander in the field has always had authority to go and call on the Israeli commanders, or on the telephone lines that exist, or by direct contact. He does that—he did that just last week. And he has reported to us that no further additional means of liaison are required and that what is there is perfectly satisfactory.

MR. KONDRACKE. Well, how do you explain the incidents that did take place then if it was perfectly satisfactory?

A. Well, I don't think that I want to go—into all the detail. There have been a great many incidents and General Barrow, Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Marine Commander in the field have both reported to us that there have been some difficult problems. [33] They're very hopeful, as I am, that those have been resolved. I've talked to Defense Minister Arens of Israel two or three times on the telephone, and we're all hopeful that these incidents have stopped. The last time I talked with Mr. Arens, the next to the last time, he assured me that he had given the strictest instructions that there were to be no more of these incidents on the Israeli side.

THE PRESIDENT. You must realize that under the law [35]—the law exists now—those weapons must be for defensive purposes. And this is, again, one of the obstacles presented by the stalemate in Lebanon. While those forces are in the position of occupying another country that now has asked them to leave, we are forbidden by law to release those planes. They're F-16's, the planes that are on order. And it's as simple as the other forces returning to their own countries and letting Lebanon be Lebanon. (Applause).

Reason and Realism in the Middle East

. . . . . .

Lebanon poses a critical test for American diplomacy. It affects Arab, Israeli, and Palestinian interests alike. Our objective is straightforward. We seek to restore Lebanese sovereignty and ensure Israeli security. These are not separate objectives. A stable, sovereign Lebanon and a secure Israel are two sides of the same coin. The threat to Israel's northern border has come not from the Lebanese people, but from foreign forces that temporarily imposed an alien regime on Lebanese soil. It follows that a peaceful Lebanon, free of all foreign forces and sovereign over all its territory, will benefit Israel and Lebanon alike.

To achieve our objective, we and the responsible international community support a four-part strategy:

First: Prompt and complete withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon;

Second: Agreement on effective security arrangements to prevent future attacks against Israel from Lebanese territory;

Third: Strengthening the Lebanese Government and the Lebanese Armed Forces;

Fourth: Reestablishment of a Lebanese national consensus and reconstruction of the Lebanese economy.

The United States is moving now in support of the Lebanese Government to implement all four parts of this strategy. Our special envoys, Ambassadors Habib and Draper, are negotiating continuously to secure the immediate and complete withdrawal from Lebanon of all outside forces—Israeli, Syrian, and PLO. Lebanon is negotiating with each of these parties separately. Since no outside forces are likely to be withdrawn from Lebanon without assurance of the withdrawal of each of the others, the future of all three negotiations is inextricably linked.

In order to move the Israel-Lebanon negotiations forward, the foreign ministers of Lebanon and Israel recently came to Washington for talks with Secretary Shultz. In those talks we provided Foreign Minister Shamir with a number of concrete ideas for assuring Israeli security. The Government of Israel has found these proposals thought-provoking and worthy of serious study. The proposals were designed to strengthen Israel's confidence that the Lebanese Armed Forces are ready and able to secure the South of Lebanon. We have stated our belief that the Lebanese Armed Forces must operate under a unified command structure, meaning that local militias and irregular forces, in South Lebanon as well as further north, must be absorbed within it. We have also stated our belief that close liaison and cooperation between Lebanon and Israel will be necessary to ensure the security of South Lebanon. And we have made known our firm conviction that Lebanon can only regain control over the South in the context of the full withdrawal of the Israeli Defense Forces.

We believe that the security measures now being considered by Lebanese, Israeli, and U.S. negotiators incorporate the safeguards necessary to provide the people of northern Israel the security to which they are entitled. No security regime is perfect. But we will hold to our goal that South Lebanon never again becomes a base for aggression against Israel or a state-within-a-state.

In the period between the withdrawal of foreign forces from Lebanon and the Lebanese Government's consolidation of control over all its territory, agreed security arrangements will be necessary to supplement the capabilities of the Lebanese Armed Forces in the South. Our concern for stability in Lebanon, however, extends beyond the South. In this wider context, while we and our allies are working to rebuild the Lebanese Armed Forces, we have agreed to consider favorably the Lebanese Government's request that the United States join with Italy, France, Great Britain, and perhaps other nations in an expanded multinational force, if that appears necessary. The role, size, and areas of deployment of such an expanded force will have to be determined in the future.

To ensure that Lebanon will be able to take over full responsibility for its own security in the shortest possible time, the administration has asked the Congress for a supplemental appropriation of $251 million.[37] This figure includes a $100 million loan to Lebanon for new military equipment and $1 million for military training. It is important that the Congress act promptly on this request.

A fully sovereign Lebanon and a secure Israel, however, cannot be achieved through political and military measures alone. The Lebanese people must have a chance to restore their once-dynamic economy. The Government of Lebanon must be able to rehabilitate and reconstruct public infrastructure vital to the national economy. The credibility of the Lebanese Government will depend as much on its ability to provide normal government services as it will on its ability to ensure internal stability and secure its borders. To this end, our supplemental appropriation includes a request for $150 million for economic assistance to Lebanon.

Military security and economic rehabilitation are short-term mechanisms for bringing the Lebanon conflict to an end. National reconciliation in Lebanon and normal relations between Lebanon and its neighbors present the only long-term guarantees that Lebanon will never again pose a threat to international peace. Reconciliation will take time and careful management. Its development is not served by undue caution, but neither can it survive overwhelming pressure. President Gemayel is engaged in a life-or-death struggle to forge anew the national consensus that once made Lebanon a model of democracy. He has our full support.

Lebanon is also engaged, through its negotiations with Israel, in defining an approach to normal relations. This is a key element in the negotiations. Israel wants and needs this guarantee for the future. Lebanon cannot give more than the requirements for domestic reconciliation will permit. The problem is difficult, but concrete progress has been made. Both sides have agreed that the state of war on their border must end. And both sides have agreed that the process of developing relations must continue beyond the agreement which secures the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

Possible Application of War Powers Resolution

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I understand that the House Foreign Affairs Committee has adopted an amendment to the Lebanon supplemental which provides that the President shall obtain statutory authorization from the Congress with respect to the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into Lebanon in conjunction with agreements for the withdrawal of foreign forces and the creation of a new multinational force. I understand that this language was deliberately drafted so as not to interfere with the President's ability to begin such an introduction, if circumstances urgently require it, while Congress is considering his request for statutory authorization.

Under these circumstances, the HFAC amendment correctly describes what this administration intends to do, is consistent with what we have done in comparable situations in the past (such as the Sinai Multinational Force), and is therefore acceptable to us. It is our intention to seek authorization from Congress as soon as possible following the completion of the ongoing negotiations, and we trust that Congress and the executive branch would then work expeditiously together with the objective of obtaining such authorization, if at all possible, prior to such new deployments.

I strongly hope that your committee will not find it necessary to deal with this question in the context of section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution. [39] It would be highly premature and unwise, and potentially damaging to the integrity of the resolution, for Congress to prejudge the possible applicability of that section to future arrangements which have not yet been negotiated and future circumstances which cannot yet be predicted. Such an action, which would amount to a public finding that U.S. forces will be exposed to an imminent risk of involvement in hostilities, is in no way a foregone conclusion, and could give entirely the wrong public impression as to what results these negotiations are intended to produce. Surely it would be far preferable for Congress to reserve judgment on this matter (as we will) until it can evaluate the circumstances as they develop, knowing that the provisions of the war powers resolution will, of course, remain available.

I appreciate this opportunity to comment on your committee's work, and hope that we can arrive at a result which accommodates our mutual interests in this matter.

Sincerely,

KENNETH W. DAM

Terrorist Attack on U.S. Embassy in Beirut

My fellow Americans, in a few hours I'll undertake one of the saddest journeys of my Presidency. I'll be going to Andrews Air Force Base to meet one of our Air Force planes bringing home 16 Americans who died this week in the terrorist attack on the United States Embassy in Beirut. [41]

I undertake this task in great sadness but also with a tremendous sense of pride in those who sacrificed their lives in our country's efforts to bring peace to the Middle East and spare others the agony of war. Greater love hath no man. The courage and the dedication of these men and women reflect the best tradition of our Foreign Service, our armed forces, and the other departments and agencies whose personnel serve our Nation overseas, often in situations of great personal danger.

We don't know yet who bears responsibility for this terrible deed. What we do know is that the terrorists who planned and carried out this cynical and cowardly attack have failed in their purpose. They mistakenly believe that if they're cruel enough and violent enough, they will weaken American resolve and deter us from our effort to help build a lasting and secure peace in the Middle East. If they think that, they don't know too much about America. As a free people, we've never allowed intimidation to stop us from doing what we know to be right. The best way for us to show our love and respect for our fellow countrymen who died in Beirut this week is to carry on with their task, to press harder than ever with our peacemaking efforts and that's exactly what we're doing.

More than ever we're committed to giving the people of Lebanon the chance they deserve to lead normal lives, free from violence and free from the presence of all unwanted foreign forces on their soil. And we remain committed to the Lebanese Government's recovery of full sovereignty throughout all its territory.

When I spoke after the bombing to Lebanon's President Gemayel, he expressed his people's deepest regret and revulsion over this wanton act of terrorism. I in turn assured him that the tragic events of this week had only served to strengthen America's steadfastness as a force for peace in his country and the Middle East. To this end, I've asked Secretary of State George Shultz to leave tomorrow night for the Middle East. Secretary Shultz will now add his personal efforts to continue the magnificent work begun by Ambassadors Phil Habib and Morris Draper bringing about the earliest possible withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon in a way that will promote peace and security in this troubled region.

The scenes of senseless tragedy in Beirut this week will remain etched in our memories forever. But along with the tragedy, there were inspiring moments of heroism. We will not forget the pictures of Ambassador Dillon and his staff, Lebanese as well as Americans, many of them swathed in bandages, bravely searching the devastated Embassy for their colleagues and for other innocent victims.

We will not forget the image of young Marines gently draping our nation's flag over the broken body of one of their fallen comrades. We will not forget their courage and compassion. And we will not forget their willingness to sacrifice even their lives to the service of their country and the cause of peace.

Yes, we Americans can be proud of these fine men and women. And we can be even prouder that our country has been playing such a unique and indispensable role in the Middle East, a role no other single nation could play. When the countries of the region want help in bringing peace, we're the ones they've turned to. That's because they trust us, because they know that America is both strong and just, both decent and dedicated. Even in the shadow of this terrible tragedy in Beirut, that is something to remember and draw heart from. It is also something to be true to.

I know I speak for all Americans when I reaffirm our unshakable commitment to our country's most precious heritage, serving the cause of peace and freedom in the world. What better monument than that could we build for those who gave their all that others might live in peace.

Until next week, thank you and God bless you.

U.S. Promotion of the Withdrawal of All Foreign Forces From Lebanon

Q. Do you have any idea what you hope to accomplish in the troop withdrawal talks in Lebanon?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I hope that we can first arrive at an agreement between Israel and Lebanon that will provide for the withdrawal of the Israel forces from Lebanon, and obviously then we have to go on and work out with the Syrians and Lebanon and with the PLO their withdrawal consistent with the Israeli withdrawal schedule.

Q. Are you optimistic in getting such an agreement with the Israelis?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think that it is a very do-able thing. Basically, that's because it seems to me it's very much in both the Israelis and the Lebanese interest and anyway, as a negotiator and mediator, you have to be optimistic, you have to think it will succeed, otherwise you won't get anywhere.

Q. What are the major obstacles now as you are going out?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, there are, of course, the two tracks in the sense of the negotiations—they have to do on the one hand with security arrangements and on the other with the movement of goods and people and other aspects of the relationship between Lebanon and Israel. There has been a tremendous amount of accomplishment, at least as I see it, by Phil and Morrie [43] in working with these and with the Israelis. But there are still difficult issues in each of those areas and so I'll try to identify them as clearly as I can and work with the parties to help in any way I can to get them resolved.

Q. How concerned are you that even if you do get an arrangement with the Israelis that you will end up with nothing from the Syrians—that they will no longer be willing to leave?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, anything is possible, but they have said that they will withdraw as the Israelis withdraw, as the Government of Lebanon requested them to withdraw. The Arab/Fez statement set that out as an Arab understanding, [44] all of those things were confirmed when the Lebanese met with them in New Delhi at the time of the nonaligned summit [45] and so all those statements are there. But we have to have an Israeli agreement to call their card and I hope that we'll have it.

"The Peace Process Continues . . . and It Must Advance"

. . . . . .

I am here also, as you know, to concentrate on helping Israel and Lebanon conclude an agreement that will lay the basis for withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. Restoring Lebanon's full sovereignty and authority over all its territory will enable that country to live as a peaceful, secure and friendly neighbor of Israel. The human losses suffered by all parties in the conflict require an outcome that will ensure that such a tragedy never recurs—and an outcome that establishes security for all peoples of the region.

Substantial progress has been made in your negotiations with Lebanon up to now, though difficult issues remain. I want to express my admiration and gratitude to the able negotiators—Director General Kimche, Ambassador Fattal, Phil Habib, Morris Draper, and all their colleagues.

The negotiation has gone on for 4 months, as of today. If the remaining issues were easy—if there were not important considerations on both sides—they would already have been settled. They have been debated, analyzed, pored over, agonized over. Now is the time to resolve them. As the Bible tells us, to every thing there is a season. There is a time to debate and there is a time to decide. Now is the time to decide. As in every negotiation, there must be compromise. For every risk that is taken, there is gain. And the risks of failure are far greater than any of the risks of an agreement as it is now envisaged.

If we succeed in Lebanon, that country will regain true sovereignty, independence and integrity. It will be able to rebuild its flourishing society in safety and dignity and as the Foreign Minister noted play its unique role in this region. And we will have enlarged the circle of peaceful relationships between Israel and its neighbors.

The peace process continues. It must continue—and it must advance. To cease our efforts is to allow bitter wounds to fester and to invite future conflict. President Reagan is committed to working with you on the noble enterprise of peacemaking.

For the ultimate guarantor of security is peace. And the greatest gift and legacy we can leave to our children is peace.

I know how much this dream must mean to the people of Israel. As some of you may know, I was here in Israel shortly after President Sadat's visit to Jerusalem. [47] I felt here then a powerfully moving tide in human attitudes. You could feel it palpably in the atmosphere: the yearning of the entire Jewish people for peace. A people who had been compelled to do battle for survival time and again were infused with a sense of the possibility if not probability of peace. I can never forget that moment, when the people of Israel, who had made so many sacrifices in defense of their country, were uplifted by a great vision. Let no one try to tell me that the Israeli nation does not want peace.

Let us all dedicate ourselves to ensure that no more young lives will be wasted—that no more families will be bereaved.

Mr. Foreign Minister, let me propose a toast to your President and Prime Minister, to you and your colleagues, and to the brave people of Israel who, in the words of the sages, love peace and pursue it will all their might.

The Role of Syria in the Withdrawal of Armed Forces From Lebanon

Q. At what point in the process do you envision talking to the Syrians about what it is you've done? When you get close to a deal between Lebanon and Israel or after it's concluded or how do you keep the Syrians from saying, well, you did to me what they did at Camp David to Jordan? You present me with something I have nothing to say about, I don't want to participate.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. First of all, I have talked on various occasions to the Syrian Foreign Minister and there have been conversations between the Lebanese officials and the Syrians at various times. We will have to make a judgment about when is the appropriate time to go to Syria for a concrete kind of approach to an agreement. We have had our Ambassador Paganelli go to the Foreign Ministry to see if we're welcome to come there and we have received the answer back that we are. And there are possible dates, but what the right date will be, I don't know. Assuming that we do make genuine progress, and that's an assumption because the issues are far from resolved to see how you might resolve them, but assuming that we do make some genuine progress in the next few days, certainly we'll want to go to Damascus.

Q. Have the Syrians in the last several weeks indicated they could not accept the way the Lebanese-Israeli negotiations seem to be going, at least the content of them?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. They've made statements about the conditions under which they would withdraw. They have also, I gather, complained to people that they're not as well-informed as they'd like to be. So we presume they are getting better informed. The basic condition laid down by everybody has been complete withdrawal of all foreign forces, so I think in terms of a fundamental given here is that in the Israeli-Lebanon agreement, there are provisions for a complete withdrawal. And that's the fundamental thing that Syria has put forward. And so they probably are rejecting to some extent statements that you read about in any morning's paper that suggest something other than complete withdrawal. But as far as we're concerned, complete withdrawal is the underlying premise.

Soviet Presence in Syria

Q. All of the reports that we see indicate more and more Soviet advisers not only in Syria but in the Syrian-occupied parts of Lebanon. What is this Soviet goal, do you think? What is their intention in putting so many of their people in these advanced areas where there is beginning to be a little danger; isn't there?

A. I think there is a great deal of danger involved in what the Soviets are doing now. It's much harder to give you a sensible explanation of what they are doing. I think probably the best explanation is that the Soviets realize that as a result of the Israeli attacks on the Syrians during the Lebanon war, the Syrians really took a clobbering and that this reflected very badly on Soviet supplies, Soviet military equipment, and, indeed, on the Syrians as a surrogate of the Soviets. I suspect that what has happened now is that, at least in part, the Soviets have decided that what they have to do is provide sufficient equipment to demonstrate to the Syrians and to the other Arab States, and particularly to the radical Arab States, that the Soviets still are players in the Middle East. So I suspect that that's the basic reason for it.

There may be something far more devious involved here, but whether there is another intention or not, I think the fact of the matter is, that with the Soviets putting all of these men and equipment into the Middle East, and particularly into Syria, they create real dangers of an escalation which could become a serious confrontation between East and West. It's a very, very unwise step, in my view.

Q. Doesn't it follow automatically, however, that the Soviets, in fact, have dealt themselves back into the decisionmaking process in the Middle East, whether it was by accident, design, or whatever? You must take them into consideration in a way you have not in the past.

A. They have always been a factor in the Middle East and in the Middle East settlement. Nobody argues that. The fact of the matter also has been, however, that the Soviets were in no position to deliver anybody to the peace table. The view has always been, and I think rightly, that it is the United States, and the United States alone, of the superpowers that has any ability to bring the various parties together at the table. I think that is still true.

I wouldn't argue with you at all that the Soviets, particularly with these latest deployments, become a greater factor in the Middle East. I'm afraid that the fact of the matter is though, to the degree they are a greater factor, it is a negative factor and not one that leads toward bringing about a peace settlement. With all of that said, I am still absolutely convinced that the United States, working with the moderate Arabs, and the Israelis, can bring about a peace settlement, with or without the degree of Soviet involvement that we now see in Syria.

Syrian Attitude Toward the Israeli-Lebanese Accord

First, the schedule, which was that we met with the Foreign Minister [51] and his party—first a little group, then a larger group, for a couple of hours or so. We discussed mainly the Lebanon negotiations, but also such matters as the Iran-Iraq war and tensions in the Middle East in general. We then had a working lunch with the Foreign Minister and, following a slight break, about 4 hours of discussion with President Assad, which again covered a wide range of things but I would say at least half of it on the Lebanon situation. In the interest of time, I'll just comment on the latter, since that is the thing we have been working on. Of course, the Syrians will speak for themselves about it, but I think it is fair to say that they are hardly enthusiastic about the agreement that Lebanon and Israel have worked out. Now, procedurally, as I understand it, what has to happen is that Lebanon—which brought a copy of a draft agreement as of, I think late Tuesday, [52] here and discussed it with them—will, after Lebanon acts on the agreement, show them—although that's up to Lebanon—the actual agreement as it has been finally shaped up. Then, Lebanon will have the negotiation with the Syrians about Syrian withdrawal and with the PLO about PLO withdrawal. My guess is that these will be very difficult negotiations, but this is okay. At least from my experience in the Middle East, nothing happens easily, so no one expected that this one would be. On the other hand, at least in my judgment, there are great incentives built into this situation for people in the end to go along with it, but that's only my judgment. At any rate, no doubt the Lebanese and the Syrians will be discussing this matter, and we have said that we are ready to help as we can. President Assad gave me his assurance that I, or the appropriate U.S. representative, will always be welcome here to do that. So that's where it stands.

The Lebanon–Israel Negotiation

. . . . . .

The warfare that we saw last summer on our television screens was only the culmination of many years of bloodshed and turmoil in Lebanon. Lebanon is a beautiful country, with a proud and capable people who have long played a productive role in the economy of that part of the world. The Lebanese have had their internal political difficulties—but the delicate political balance within Lebanon was shattered during the 1970's largely by the involvement of external military forces—the PLO, the Syrians, and the Israelis.

The war in Lebanon last summer taught its own kind of lesson. There was a profound yearning, particularly in Lebanon, to turn the aftermath of that tragedy into the beginning of something better. Out of chaos came hope. Last July and August the United States, represented by Ambassador Philip Habib, President Reagan's special emissary, negotiated a ceasefire in Beirut and the withdrawal of PLO fighters from the Beirut area. United States Marines took up positions around Beirut to provide a sense of security.

Then, a new government in Lebanon, headed by its impressive young President, Amin Gemayel, set as its first priority the restoration of a strong central government exercising full sovereign control over all of its territory. Lebanon sought the withdrawal of all external forces from the country. Israel sought reassurance that Lebanese territory would not become again a staging ground for terrorist attacks on the cities, towns, and farms of northern Israel.

Last December, negotiations began between Lebanon and Israel on the withdrawal of Israeli forces and the creation of a new relationship between Lebanon and Israel. Lebanon thus became the second Arab State, after Egypt, to engage in direct negotiations with Israel.

Again, the United States played a pivotal role. Phil Habib, assisted by Ambassador Morris Draper, shuttled back and forth and worked with the parties to encourage and support an agreement. After 4 months of talks, much progress had been made, but the negotiations were stalemated over a number of key issues. At the end of April it became clear that more impetus was needed, to force the pace of decisions and resolve the issues that remained. President Reagan decided it was time for me to go out there. I did, and I spent about 10 days shuttling between Beirut and Jerusalem to hammer out the final compromises.

It was clear to me when I got there that both sides wanted a solution. Many people had doubts that Israel really wanted to withdraw from Lebanon; in fact, both sides were negotiating in good faith over issues that were objectively difficult. Both sides knew that a solution was necessary. As I said in a dinner toast in Jerusalem, the issues "have been debated, analyzed, pored over, agonized over. Now is the time to resolve them. As the Bible tells us, to every thing there is a season. There is a time to debate and a time to decide. Now is the time to decide. . . . [54] And the risks of failure are far greater than any of the risks of an agreement. . . ." [55]

It was an extraordinary experience for me on the personal level. The Government and people of Israel, who have yearned so long for acceptance and for security, and the Government and people of Lebanon, who have yearned for an end to a decade of horror and destruction, behaved throughout 2 weeks of intense negotiation with consummate dignity and graciousness. So much was at stake for their countries, yet they treated me and my colleagues with the greatest of courtesy and friendship throughout. And they did not shrink from hard decisions.

A week ago today, the Israeli Cabinet announced its acceptance in principle of the agreement as it then stood, which Lebanon had already accepted.

It was a victory for statesmanship on both sides.

The agreement provides for withdrawal of Israeli forces, which is the essential first step toward Lebanon s goal of withdrawal of all external forces. At the same time, Lebanon and Israel have agreed to security arrangements in the southern part of the country which support Lebanon's ability to carry out its strong intention to keep the area free of terrorist activity. In addition, there are provisions looking toward the improvement in mutual relations which both sides desire, reflecting the shared objective of living in peace side-by-side as neighbors.

The agreement has many technical provisions, of course, but its real meaning is much more than technical:

—It offers hope that Lebanon, after more than a decade of civil war and external interference, will recover its sovereignty, independence, and security.

—It offers hope that the international boundary between the two countries will be a border of peace, security, and friendly relations.

—It proves once again in the Arab-Israeli conflict that negotiations can achieve results.

As you may know, Israel is not prepared actually to withdraw its forces until Syrian and the remaining PLO forces also leave Lebanon. There will be a negotiation between Syria and Lebanon on the subject of Syrian withdrawal. I know Amin Gemayel well enough to know that he will vigorously defend Lebanon's sovereign right to determine its own future. He and his colleagues are showing courage and statesmanship, and they deserve wholehearted American support. When Lebanon makes its sovereign decision, with backing from the main constituent groups in the Lebanese national consensus, that decision will command considerable moral authority.

Syria too, is a proud country, and it has legitimate security concerns with respect to Lebanon. I was able to tell President Assad that the purpose of my mission was to start the process of restoring Lebanon's sovereignty over all its territory, and withdrawing all external forces, which would enhance the security and well-being of all of Lebanon's neighbors. The Israeli-Lebanese agreement was a necessary first step, fully consistent with the security of all countries in the area.

The Syrian Government, too, treated us all with great courtesy. I know that Syria—like Lebanon—will make its own sovereign decision on an issue so important to it. Both Syria and the United States regard a renewal of contacts and improved relations as in the mutual interest. And all parties will realize, I am sure, that the risks if the withdrawal process fails are greater than the risks of completing it.

We are in touch with all the concerned countries, and we will try to assist as desired by the parties.

What we have already achieved, as I said before, is the essential first step. The American people can be proud of what is, in essence, their accomplishment. They can be proud of the Marines whose presence around Beirut gives the people of Lebanon such a sense of assurance and confidence in the future.

There are risks in any diplomatic effort; there have been tragedies, such as the bombing of our Beirut Embassy. But nothing significant is ever accomplished without risks, and sometimes sacrifice. Americans are not a timid people. In the past generation this country has made an enormous contribution to the world's peace, stability, and well-being. Thus we are being true to our heritage and to our moral responsibility. If those who attacked our Embassy thought they could intimidate the United States and derail our efforts, they were grossly mistaken.

Syrian Refusal To Receive Ambassador Habib

. . . . . .

Q. John, do you have anything to say about Syria's apparent refusal to allow Philip Habib to return to Damascus to deal with Syria's participation in the withdrawal from Lebanon?

---

[58] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State. John Hughes, Department of State Spokesman, conducted the briefing which began at 12:14 p.m.

A. It is true that the Syrian Government has said that it does not want to receive Ambassador Habib at this particular time. We continue to believe that dialog is the way to advance the cause of peace. The Syrian attitude regarding Ambassador Habib's visit is certainly not in the spirit we hoped to have. We remain ready to engage in the dialog.

Syrian Withdrawal As the Next Step in the Peace Process

. . . . . .

[Q.] Would you be willing to speak a little bit more about the situation as it affects Syria? After all, it is now the next main issue on the agenda.

Also, do you see this as a maneuver to bring the Soviet Union into the peace process of the Middle East?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Here is the way I see the Syrian question, and as you correctly point out, that is the next step. We've taken a step. I think it is a very important step in a number of dimensions, and I'd like to come back to that. But at any rate, insofar as Syria is concerned, our strategy has been, all along, to keep getting Syria—and to the extent we can, the PLO—on the record as saying that as Israel withdraws, they will withdraw. In the Fez Declaration—probably not the most popular document in the world with this group—when you look through it, it seems pretty much to say that Syria should withdraw and the PLO should withdraw, I think the words are, "in the light of Israeli withdrawal," or something like that. [60] So that's a marker.

Syria has made statements to various people, including to me personally, in the form of the Foreign Minister, that they would withdraw as Israel withdraws. They have made that statement to the Lebanese directly, as recently as at the Nonaligned Conference in New Delhi, which was about 6 weeks ago, or something of that kind. And the PLO the same. So there are a lot of statements that have been made.

It may be that they felt that Israel would never agree to withdraw so they could blithely make these statements, and their card would never be called. A lot of people felt that. I might say, one of the things that this agreement establishes, whatever else happens, that those who have said that Israel would never withdraw, well, they don't have a leg to stand on any more. They have signed on the dotted line that Israel will withdraw on conditions considered reasonable by an Arab country, and given the endorsement by the full Parliament of that country. [61] So the first point on Syria is that they have made statements.

The second point is this: We have felt that the best basis on which to go forward with Syria is first to get the agreement between Lebanon and Israel completely nailed down—signed, sealed, and delivered, so to speak. And, insofar as Lebanon is concerned, to have it endorsed, not only by the President and the Negotiating Committee, which technically had the authority just to go ahead, agree, and be done with it, but the President, I think wisely, decided, first of all, to make the most influential Moslem in Lebanon, the Prime Minister Wazzan, a very fine person, chairman of the negotiating group. When I was in Lebanon countless hours and days, leafing through this agreement, discussing this word, and that paragraph, and so on, that Prime Minister was right there the whole time. He stuck with it, and in the end, while there are a lot of things in the agreement he didn't care for, he said, "All right, I accept this agreement. I support this agreement." He said it publicly. "I will work in good faith to have it implemented."

So the President, I think, had that key person there in the negotiating sessions. Then, that paid off in the sense of that support. He carried that through; got unanimous support of his Cabinet. Then, he took it to the Lebanese Parliament and got unanimous support in the Parliament. So our feeling was—and we had this advice as we went around prior to the agreement and talked with our friends in the Arab world that was their advice: Let it be visible that this agreement is something that the Government of Lebanon, supported by the broad sweep of the confessional groups in Lebanon, not just the Christians and so on, support. That lays down a certain marker, so that's been accomplished now.

The Syrians, I think it is fair to say, did everything they could think of to prevent that from happening. They tried to get the Lebanese Parliament not to vote in favor of the agreement, and they lost that one. They lost that badly. They subjected people to a lot of tough talk.

I said to one of the people I was talking with when he reported to me on a high-level conversation, I said, "Did you feel like your life was threatened?" He said, "Yes, I sort of felt that way." But it's a rough game that people play out there. So that's the next step.

Many people have asked me, "What is the Soviet Union saying to Syria?" and so on. The answer that I've given, and it's an accurate answer, "I don't know what the Soviet Union is saying to Syria."

I know that the Soviet Union has put high-powered weapons there; I know that the Soviet Union is manning those weapons; they have a physical manpower presence in Syria. I know what the Soviet Union has said publicly about the Israeli-Lebanese Agreement. They have denounced it. That's their attitude. But I say, to me, Syria is a proud country, an independent country, and in the end, it is up to Syria to decide for itself what it wishes to do: they are Syrian troops that have to withdraw. And so the nexus of that discussion needs to be between Lebanon and Syria; and there are a lot of legitimate questions to be discussed between those two countries about Syrian withdrawal, but that's where the action should be. And as far as we're concerned, that's where we're putting it, and we have said to the Lebanese that we're willing to be helpful as we can in working on it with them.

Prepared Statement and Testimony by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Veliotes) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, June 2, 1983 (Extracts) [62]

Assessment of Arab Response to Israel–Lebanon Agreement

. . . . . .

First, let me turn to Lebanon and our efforts to implement the Agreement between Lebanon and Israel, concluded May 17, with the assistance of Secretary Shultz after many months of negotiations between the two states conducted with the good offices of Ambassadors Habib and Draper.

For many years, Lebanon has endured much suffering and turmoil, riven by internal factionalism and beset by outside forces. The entry of Israeli troops into Lebanon last June added a new urgency to the need to resolve the Lebanese problem, and subsequent negotiations produced the May 17 Agreement.

The Agreement reinforces the policy which the United States has pursued toward Lebanon for many years: we support the restoration of Lebanon's sovereignty throughout its territory, a strong, stable Lebanese central government, and security for Israel's northern border. History has proved repeatedly that Lebanon can realize these goals and gain peace only if all foreign forces, Israeli, Syrian and PLO and others, withdraw from that beleaguered nation.

The Agreement was an important step toward attainment of these goals for Lebanon, and we can be proud of this example of U.S. leadership and diplomacy. It proves again the point that we so urgently hope other states in the region will recognize: negotiations, if patiently and persistently pursued, can succeed in moving the area towards peace and stability.

The essential elements of the Agreement are that Israel has agreed to withdraw all of its forces in the context of a simultaneous withdrawal of Syrian and PLO forces; the state of war is terminated; the border between the two countries is declared inviolable; and the territories of both states cannot be used for attacks on the territory of a third state.

By providing arrangements for withdrawal of Israeli forces from southern Lebanon in a way that will restore Lebanese sovereignty and protect the security of Israel's northern border, the Agreement is a major step toward peace and national reintegration for Lebanon, and, we hope, toward a wider process of reconciliation in the region. It is therefore vital that Syria and the PLO also agree to withdraw their forces soon, so that Israel will withdraw and Lebanon will finally have a chance to bind its wounds and run its own affairs.

The Government of Syria has thus far opposed the Agreement and has not yet agreed to withdraw the 50,000 troops it now has in Lebanon. This is disappointing, of course. Syria has stated publicly on several occasions in the past that it was willing to withdraw its forces when the Government of Lebanon indicated they were no longer needed. The Arab League Summit at Fez last fall also addressed the matter of Syrian withdrawal in light of Israeli withdrawal. We hope that Syria, on reflection, will meet this commitment.

We recognize that Syria is a proud country and has legitimate security concerns in the area. But we are convinced that these can best be protected by withdrawal of Syrian and Israeli forces from Lebanon. The status quo leaves large scale Syrian and Israeli forces face-to-face in the Bekaa Valley, and Israeli forces 25 miles from Damascus. The danger of confrontation and renewed hostilities in this dangerous and volatile situation. By miscalculation or otherwise, must not be underestimated. No one's interest would be served by new tragedy.

We are encouraged that a large number of Arab states have either supported the Lebanon-Israel Agreement or have supported Lebanon's right to decide for itself what is best for Lebanon. Only a few—like Libya—have joined Syria in rejecting the agreement. It is our strong hope that Syria will ultimately decide it does not wish to bear the onus for standing in the way of Israel's withdrawal from a neighboring Arab state and that Syria's interests will be served by supporting Lebanon's right to full sovereignty over its own country. The dialogue on these issues continues.

I realize that Americans are concerned about Lebanon, not only because the crisis there threatens the peace of the entire region, but because U.S. Marines remain deployed in Beirut, together with French, Italian and British forces, with the Multinational Force. The MNF, which is serving in response to Lebanon's request, is providing valuable back-up to the efforts of the Lebanese Government to preserve peace and order in the Beirut area as it works to extend and assure its authority. We expect the MNF to continue this role in the near term. It is not possible to predict how long Lebanon will need the MNF for this valuable support role. Lebanon's request of some time ago for expansion of the MNF is still on the table. But all the troop contributors have agreed that no decision on the issue can be made until Israeli, Syrian and PLO withdrawals are underway. The Lebanon-Israel Agreement, which deals with the situation in southern Lebanon, makes no reference to the MNF.

The Agreement does, however, envisage a continued role for UNIFIL, the United Nations peacekeeping force, when the Agreement is implemented. It foresees that the presence of UNIFIL will assist the Government of Lebanon in reassuring Palestinian civilians located in the Sidon and Tyre areas in southern Lebanon of their safety. We believe this reassurance could be an inducement for the departure of PLO forces who remain in the northern and eastern parts of the country.

UNIFIL has performed an important service in Lebanon over the years in helping the Lebanese Government protect its sovereignty and territorial integrity. The United States supports a continued role for UNIFIL. Not only in the South as envisaged in the Agreement, but elsewhere in Lebanon in response to the needs of the Lebanese Government. Of course, it will be up to Lebanon, working with the UN Security Council, to develop an appropriate mandate for UNIFIL in the future.

Before turning to another topic. Let me say a word about the attack on our Embassy in Beirut on April 18 that shocked and outraged people everywhere and took the lives of 17 Americans and over 40 Lebanese employees and bystanders. I want to emphasize that we are thoroughly investigating that incident to ensure that we are doing all that we can to protect against recurrences of such savage acts against our diplomatic establishments. We have, over the years, devoted great efforts to securing our embassies against terrorism. However, we have learned to face the fact that drastic defensive measures to make our embassies invulnerable to attack would make it impossible for them to carry out the public functions they must perform. American embassies cannot be fortresses, and American officials abroad cannot be shielded from all danger if they are to do their jobs.

. . . . . .

MR. HAMILTON. Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

The commander of the Marine peacekeeping contingent [63] said that he thought the Marines would have to be there for roughly 15 months more, and that after that period, Lebanon would be able to handle things for themselves.

Do you agree with that assessment?

MR. VELIOTES. I certainly don't quarrel with it, sir.

MR. HAMILTON. Is it reasonable for us to anticipate that the Marines will have to be there roughly another 15 months?

MR. VELIOTES. I would think so.

MR. HAMILTON. What is the likelihood that we will have to increase the number of the Marines or the scope of their responsibilities?

MR. VELIOTES. Well, sir, the mission of the Marines I do not see changing. The MNF is there as a presence, not to engage in law-and-order activities, but as a backup and reassurance for the growing Lebanese capability to do this peacekeeping, law-and-order function, itself.

As far as additional numbers, there has been no change on this, I think, since the last time we met. There has been some preliminary discussion by the Government of Lebanon about the possible desirability of increasing the numbers. But this has always been understood by the various contributing countries to be in the context of a different situation—when the foreign forces are withdrawing, and the Lebanese Government is extending its control.

MR. HAMILTON. There have been a lot of reports about the prospects of a clash between the Israelis and the Syrians militarily in Lebanon. What is your assessment of that situation?

MR. VELIOTES. Well, the prospect we have to face realistically is always there—the possibility is there. There are large numbers of Syrian and Israeli troops in Lebanon. The latest estimates are about 50,000 Syrians, maybe 20,000 Israelis. At one checkpoint, I believe, they are 300 meters from each other. When you have a situation like that, there is danger. And, as you know, in the last 10 days, there was a dramatic increase in tensions. Fortunately the tension seems to have subsided somewhat.

. . . . . .

MR. LANTOS. How would you evaluate the performance of Saudi Arabia in responding to the plea of our Secretary of State, our Secretary of Defense, to persuade the Syrians to recognize that we have an opportunity for a peaceful breakthrough in the area?

MR. VELIOTES. I am sure the committee is aware of the public Saudi statement on the Lebanese situation. [64] It is a carefully crafted statement which endorses the right of the Government of Lebanon to make difficult decisions while stopping short of support for the agreement itself. And I think you will have noticed that the majority of the Arab countries has taken a stand like that. Only the Libyans have taken—

MR. LANTOS. But the vast majority of them do not have the leverage with the Syrians that presumably the Saudis have.

MR. VELIOTES. Yes, individually, you are correct, sir.

Now Saudi Arabia gave its support and encouragement to our efforts to negotiate a withdrawal agreement between Israel and Lebanon. And let me say for the record that before the Secretary went out, our Arab friends were telling us that American credibility now in the area really depended upon our demonstrating that Israel was prepared to withdraw from Lebanon. Fortunately, we got to Jerusalem and found virtually an open door in that respect. But nevertheless, we were told this was terribly important, we must understand that.

MR. LANTOS. Did that come as a surprise to you, Mr. Secretary?

MR. VELIOTES. That the Israelis did not want to stay in Lebanon and create the North Bank and link in their water system to the waters of the Litani; no, not at all. But there was a conventional wisdom that had grown up, sir, as you know.

I might say that if you wanted to make a fortune about April 20 last year, you could have laid bets around the Arab world about the Israelis withdrawing from the Sinai, because you had the same view.

The Secretary met with the assembled ambassadors in Cairo, and got the message to them to reinforce our views in the countries that they were associated with, the Arab countries.

So that was our aim, that was our goal, and it was achieved.

Now, the Saudis supported our effort. They took the unusual step of issuing a public statement along the lines that I described. And the Saudis are engaged in this manner in keeping the lines of communication open amongst the parties, to try to find a way for the Lebanese and the Syrians to reach an agreement that would allow Lebanon to be truly free.

Now, for them to be most effective, they do things very quietly, and they move in their own manner, in their own political culture. We are in close consultation with the Saudis. We very much appreciate not only their efforts, but their goals.

The Saudi effort has to be seen in the context of what I said earlier, about the general attitudes of the Arab mainstream.

There is a discomfort with the agreement, for a lot of the logical reasons the committee is aware of. But only Libya, to the best of my knowledge, has joined Syria in actual rejection.

So there is an Arab League resolution stemming from the Fez summit which endorses Syrian withdrawal in light of Israeli withdrawal, that has been interpreted for us by those who drafted it as meaning simultaneous.

But to conclude on this, the Saudis are being helpful.

Accomplishments of the Israeli-Lebanese Agreement

. . . . . .

From the outset, our objective in those negotiations was straightforward. We sought to restore Lebanese sovereignty and ensure Israeli security. We recognized ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz said, "The Kingdom is not for the Agreement nor is it against it." (Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: Middle East & Africa, May 20, 1983, p. C3) that these were not separate objectives. A stable, sovereign Lebanon and a secure Israel are two sides of the same coin. The threat to Israel does not come from the Lebanese people but from those external forces still camped on Lebanese soil. It follows that a peaceful Lebanon, free of all external forces and sovereign over all its territory, will be a major contribution to Israeli security.

The agreement as worked out between Lebanon and Israel calls for an end to the state of war. It calls for the two states to recognize each other's right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries. Moreover, it provides a basis for a more harmonious relationship between those two countries in the future.

The agreement satisfies the crucial concerns of both sides. From Lebanon's perspective, the agreement is the first step toward the withdrawal of all outside forces and the restoration of its independence and sovereignty. It is no secret that Lebanon would have preferred immediate and unconditional Israeli withdrawal. Reality dictated, however, that Israeli withdrawal could not be achieved in that way.

For Israel, the agreement contains security arrangements designed to ensure against the return of outside forces and to prevent the renewed use of Lebanese territory for hostile actions against Israel. It is no secret that Israel would have preferred early warning stations in Lebanon and other aspects of a residual presence until such time as it was clear the northern border was secure. Yet again, reality dictated that agreement could not be achieved on that basis.

The solution is a workable one which does not infringe on Lebanese sovereignty, but still allows Israel on a periodic basis to satisfy itself that its border remains secure. A pragmatic solution taking full account of the reality of the situation and springing from the idealistic notion that a negotiated agreement was possible.

As you are all aware, the next step in Lebanon is agreement by the Government of Syria to withdraw its forces from that country as well. As we have already seen, this will not be easy. The Syrians have their own legitimate security interests in Lebanon. They have made known their misgivings regarding the agreement. The immediate task is to begin the process of convincing Syria that the withdrawal of its forces from Lebanon is in Syria's interests. Obviously, the durability of the agreement, despite pressures to the contrary, will be an important factor in this equation. Syria must also calculate the risks and advantages to its security of withdrawing or refusing to withdraw its forces. We hope and believe that Syria will decide that its interests in Lebanon are best served through negotiated arrangements to achieve the withdrawal of all external forces from that country.

The Middle East cannot be isolated from Great Power politics, and Lebanon is a case in point. The Soviet Union is in no hurry to lend support to the Israeli-Lebanese agreement, both because it represents a success for American diplomacy and because its successful implementation would constitute a major step toward stability in the area. The Soviet Union is therefore playing a negative role. This is no secret—it is all over the Soviet press. We would welcome a more constructive Soviet stance. Syria, however, is a proud and independent country which we believe will make its own decisions. The primary danger of Soviet obstructionism in this instance lies in the volatility of the situation on the ground and the difficulty of controlling events should hostilities again erupt, even if by accident. We trust that the Soviet Union is as aware of this danger as we are and will be taking its own steps to help defuse the situation.

I might note that Syria, despite its current position, has its own incentives for cooperating with the Lebanese Government. First, the vast majority of other Arab States support Lebanon's right to conclude its agreement with Israel. Second, as a practical matter, Israel will not withdraw unless Syria and the PLO do as well. Does Syria wish to be responsible for the continued Israeli occupation of South Lebanon? Third, Syria has an obvious interest in playing a key role in the broader peace process, an interest it cannot credibly pursue in any constructive way if it insists on frustrating a Lebanon settlement.

U.S. Interpretation of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act

I am pleased to sign into law S. 639, the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983. [67] This Act authorizes the appropriation of urgently needed economic and military assistance for Lebanon. The funding authorized by this Act will greatly assist in promoting the economic and political stability of that country, and support the international effort to strengthen a sovereign and independent Lebanon.

Section 4(a) of the Act confirms this administration's announced intention with respect to congressional authorization concerning any future substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon. As indicated in its legislative history, that section does not prevent the initiation of such actions, if circumstances require it, while Congress is considering a request for statutory authorization; nor, of course, is it intended to infringe upon the constitutional authority of the President as Commander in Chief, particularly with respect to contingencies not expected in the context of the multinational effort to strengthen the sovereignty and independence of Lebanon.

U.S.-Syrian Discussions on the Israeli-Lebanese Agreement

Our time here has been, first of all, very pleasant. We had dinner last night with the Foreign Minister and his wife and then this morning, the Foreign Minister and I and our delegations talked for about an hour and a half, I think, and then we met with President Assad around 10 o'clock until whenever we broke up a little after 3. The content of our discussion, I think, could be summarized in three points.

First of all, we discussed the Israeli-Lebanon agreement in great length, and we did not find very much to agree about in our analysis of that agreement. Second, we agreed on the great importance of a sovereign, free and independent Lebanon with a strong sense of Government as something that both countries feel is very desirable. Third, we agreed to stay in touch and to consult with each other about how we might help together to attain that objective. And to that end, we all undoubtedly will establish a little working group to help sort out what we may be able to do to help in that regard.

That's a very short summary of a long discussion, but I think it covers the essential parts. Do you agree with that, Mr. Minister? Thank you.

Assurances to Lebanese President Gemayel of U.S. Support for Lebanon

THE PRESIDENT. It's a great pleasure to welcome our friend, President Gemayel, to the White House again. We've had excellent talks today covering many vital concerns of both our countries. During his first visit here, 9 months ago, [75] President Gemayel and I discussed the principles upon which United States policy toward Lebanon is based: The full withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon; support for a strong central government capable of asserting its authority over all of Lebanon; and security for Israel's northern border.

Today I've reaffirmed these principles to President Gemayel. A united sovereign and independent Lebanon, free of all foreign forces is the legitimate aspiration of the Government and the people of Lebanon and a goal shared by the people of the United States.

Our talks today focused on the next steps in securing Lebanon's independence. We admire the courage and wisdom demonstrated by the Lebanese Government during its negotiations that resulted in an agreement for the departure of Israeli forces. The United States remains firmly committed to the earliest possible resolution of the conflict in Lebanon.

This morning President Gemayel and I have gone over the difficult agenda and have agreed on next steps which we should take together to set this process in motion and carry it through. And I have today designated Robert McFarlane, currently my Deputy Assistant for National Security Affairs, as my personal representative in the Middle East. In that role, he will succeed Philip Habib, who must return to his business and academia duties. Phil has set a high standard in bringing us through eight months of difficult negotiations to the situation we face today and he will be sorely missed.

After further consultation here in Washington next week, Bud McFarlane and his team will depart for the Middle East within 10 days. I'm happy to have had this opportunity to confer with President Gemayel once again. I'm impressed with the progress that he and the Government and people of Lebanon have made in rebuilding their country. It's my belief that energy and perseverance will triumph in the end. And as I told President Gemayel, we do not lack for either. Lebanon can count on our support.

U.S. Opposition to the Partition of Lebanon

. . . . . .

Q. Sir, the Lebanese President said this past week that the Israeli partial withdrawal in Lebanon amounted to de facto partition of that country. Do you agree?

THE PRESIDENT. I—no, I am very hopeful that if this partial withdrawal takes place that it will be recognized and admitted to be, by the Israelis, as one phase of their agreement to withdraw. If they withdraw in a phased withdrawal, it certainly will give us a better case for breaking the roadblock that has been established by Syria and persuading them to keep their original promise that when others withdrew they would withdraw. The—I can't answer as to whether that is the way that this is going to be perceived, or whether the Israelis will admit to it or not, but I will be talking in a couple of days with the two Ministers who are here from Israel, [77] and about this very thing.

But if this is a phased withdrawal, I think there is fear if there is simply withdrawal to another line and then a digging in and fortifying along that line, that this would be what it looks [like] Syria is doing and that is simply trying to partition Lebanon, reduce Lebanon, and grab off some territory themselves, but with the agreement that's been signed between Lebanon and Israel, I don't think Israel has that in mind.

Q. Sir, what would happen if Lebanon is partitioned? Would it be that awful?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I just believe that the people of the country have a right to determine their own destiny, choose their own government, and if it was partitioned, it would be occupation by other countries and, yes, I think that is awful. We set out to help Lebanon after all these years of strife regain sovereignty of its own land, protection of its own borders, and we're helping in every way we can to bring that about.

U.S. Confidence in Israel's Partial Withdrawal As First Step Toward Full Withdrawal

Four weeks ago President Reagan reaffirmed his commitment to three fundamental goals in Lebanon—the earliest possible withdrawal of all foreign forces; the extension of Lebanese sovereignty throughout its territory; and that Lebanon shall not again become a source of hostile actions against Israel. [79] The agreement concluded between Israel and Lebanon on May 17 is an important step toward achievement of these goals. The President directed that U.S. efforts be renewed in a mission to the Middle East headed by Ambassadors Robert McFarlane and Richard Fairbanks.

Since that time Ambassadors McFarlane and Fairbanks have traveled extensively throughout the region undertaking intensive talks with Arab and Israeli leaders. Several conclusions have emerged from these talks.

First and foremost is the solid foundation of support in the Arab world and in Israel for the principles of full withdrawal and full authority for the Lebanese Government. Equally clear is the enormity of the task the Lebanese Government faces in seeking to strengthen the consensus among the diverse confessional groups in Lebanon which is so essential to the reconstruction and revitalization of the Lebanese economy and the establishment of political stability. It is clear that President Gemayel is committed to these goals.

In its efforts the Government of Lebanon will soon face an opportunity to restore stability and extend the process of reconstruction and consensus building to the districts of Alayh and Shuf as the Government of Israel withdraws its forces from these areas. [80] This move by Israel is the first in a process of withdrawal envisaged in the May 17 agreement. In recent weeks some have questioned the motives underlying this withdrawal by Israel saying that it presages a permanent partition of Lebanon. We are convinced that the Israeli Government is committed to the full withdrawal of its forces in Lebanon. In this regard it is instructive to note official Israeli statements such as the following:

> "It is the policy and the intention of the Government of Israel to withdraw from the whole of Lebanon and that the redeployment of our forces along the Awwali line is only part of that total withdrawal. (and further)
> "It is our firm desire to see a strong central government restoring its authority over the whole of Lebanon and maintaining security throughout its 10,452 square kilometers; thus, all allegations regarding Israeli intentions of bringing about a partition or division of Lebanon are completely baseless and totally without foundation."

We are confident that further Israeli withdrawal will take place as efforts continue to secure the concurrent withdrawal of PLO and Syrian forces.

The United States pledges its best efforts to help create conditions which will allow these withdrawals to take place at the earliest possible moment.

Within this context, the Governments of Israel and Lebanon will coordinate the smooth and orderly return of responsibility in the Alayh–Shuf areas. Concurrently, efforts by the Government of Lebanon to strengthen the consensus will continue so that stability and reconstruction can take hold.

We call upon Syria and the PLO for a corresponding process of withdrawal so that Lebanon can be restored as a unified, sovereign, independent country.

Letter From President Reagan to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), August 30, 1983 [81]

The Death of Two U.S. Marines

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On September 29, 1982, [82] I reported to you concerning the introduction of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon to participate in the Multinational Force (MNF) requested by the Government of Lebanon. The presence of this Force was designed to facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority, and thereby further the efforts of the Government of Lebanon to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence that had tragically recurred. I directed this deployment pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander-in-Chief of the U. S. Armed Forces.

We have periodically provided Congress with updated information on the activities of these forces and on the circumstances of their deployment in Lebanon. In light of recent events, I am providing this further report on the deployment, in accordance with my desire that Congress continue to be informed on this matter, and consistent with Section 4 of the War Powers Resolution.

On August 28, sporadic fighting between Lebanese Armed Forces and various armed factions took place in South Beirut; from time to time during the course of this fighting, positions in the vicinity of the Beirut airport manned by U.S. Marines of the MNF came under small-arms fire (without injury to U.S. personnel), and this fire was returned. On August 29, fighting erupted again. Marine positions came under mortar, rocket, and small-arms fire, with the result that 2 Marines were killed and 14 wounded. In addition, several artillery rounds fell near the U.S.S. Iwo Jima (an amphibious support vessel lying offshore), with no resulting damage or injuries. As contemplated by their rules of engagement, U.S. Marines returned fire with artillery, small arms, and, in one instance, rocket fire from a helicopter gunship. There were additional exchanges of fire earlier today, August 30, without injury to U.S. personnel.

Later today, a cease-fire came into effect in the area in which the Marines were deployed, and firing on Marine positions ceased. Diplomatic efforts are underway to extend this cease-fire. In the meantime, U.S. forces will be prepared to exercise their right of self-defense should such attacks recur.

I believe that the continued presence of these U.S. forces in Lebanon is essential to the objective of helping to restore the territorial integrity, sovereignty, and political independence of Lebanon. It is still not possible to predict the duration of the presence of these forces in Lebanon; we will continue to assess this question in the light of progress toward this objective.

I will keep the Congress informed as to further developments with respect to this situation.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

situation in Lebanon, a land that has known too much bloodshed and violence for too long.

As we all know, there has been widespread fighting recently throughout Beirut and its suburbs. At present, we're advised by the Lebanese central authorities that effective measures are being taken to restore order. We all pray that they will be successful.

An historic problem in Lebanon has been to find a formula for reconciling the various communal and confessional groups. President Gemayel has been working hard to do just that throughout his tenure in office. Today, with his Council of Ministers, he issued a call for key Lebanese leaders to join in a dialogue aimed at constituting a new national approach to reconciliation and unity.

The Government of the United States firmly supports this effort, consistent as it is with President Reagan's firm policy of support for an independent Lebanon, free of all foreign forces with appropriate security arrangements for Israel's northern border. We intend to help President Gemayel in his new initiative in every way possible, through our own efforts and through cooperation with our partners in the Multinational Force—France, Italy and Great Britain.

—We call upon the international community in general, and in particular on Syria, which has the largest army in Lebanon, to respect and support this process.

—We will continue to provide training and support for the Lebanese armed forces.

—We will continue our active diplomatic engagement through Ambassadors McFarlane and Fairbanks as we did earlier through Ambassadors Habib and Draper.

—And we will continue to maintain our support for the Multinational Force and for the United States Marine component of that force. Let no one doubt that if attacked, the Marines will take care of themselves with vigor.

Our goals have been clearly stated on many occasions. We will continue to work energetically to achieve those goals.

The recent outbreak of fighting in recent days in Lebanon has been tragic. It must be brought to an end. That will not be easy. We must recognize that fact, but we must also recognize the importance to the world as a whole of a secure and peaceful Lebanon. Determination, patience and strength of will are required in the weeks and months ahead.

The problems of Lebanon, important in their own right, are at the same time a part of the greater question of peace for all the Middle East. President Reagan addressed himself to that broader issue a year ago on September 1.

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of State (Shultz), September 9, 1983 (Extract) [84]

"It's Up to the Lebanese Armed Forces To Take Control of the Situation"

. . . . . .

Q. On Lebanon, first, after the Israeli invasion we had a U.S. mediator there. Then we had as a result of the mediation, 1,200 Marines there. Then we had as a result of the Marines getting in difficulty, 2,000 more Marines and a naval task force offshore. Now, we've had firing from the naval force in order to protect the men who are now on the ground. It seems like step by step, the United States is becoming militarily involved in the Middle East in a way in which we never have in recent years anyway. How do you look at this train of circumstances and what do you see as the way in which the flow can be turned in the other direction? How long and how deeply are we prepared to become involved in the situation which obtains in that country?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We are there in all of the roles that you identified in an effort to be helpful and at the invitation of the Government of Lebanon now with our armed force. Their role is a role of stabilization and peacekeeping. As we've stated, we'll defend ourselves—the Marines will defend themselves and we'll support those Marines. And the other MNF forces feel the same way. Our concept is and the way the mission is stated is it's up [to] the Lebanese armed forces to take control of the situation as I believe they have in greater Beirut and our presence and the presence of our partners can help them do that in a whole variety of ways. It probably boils down to helping them that those who think they may get somewhere by roughing us up are experiencing the fact that we will defend ourselves and we're capable of doing that and so are the French and so are the others. Now, having said all that obviously the situation in Lebanon is in very considerable turmoil and while we've had some successes in our diplomacy and in our effort, we're very far from where we would like to be. So it's a tough row to hoe and not only there but in the Middle East diplomacy generally, but the United States has been at it a long time and we'll continue to work at it. There are one or two promising developments that I don't even entertain in the back of my mind but still there are some things that are on the plus side but at the same time you can't help but concentrate on the situation at hand and many of the developments in the Shouf and the Aleyh regions are—they're hard for us to do anything about but they are very hard to contemplate, too, that these groups that get isolated and are subject to widespread killings and there have been several incidents of that and more are threatened.[85] That's very difficult but I think that's fundamentally up to the Government of Lebanon to come to grips with their own internal situation and to the extent that we can help them do that and help them get stability where they can attain it and help to get others to stop stirring it up, well, that's all the good and I think worthwhile and I think it's something we should measure up to.

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Veliotes) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 13, 1983[86]

The Marines' Promotion of U.S. Policy Goals for Lebanon

It is a privilege to appear before the committee again, sir. I would like to introduce all of my colleagues at the table with me: The legal adviser, Davis Robinson, is to my right; and, as you have already noted, we have General Kelley and Adm. Jonathan Howe, who is Director of the Office of Politico-Military Affairs.

To begin, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments to put the subject of today, which is Lebanon and, more specifically, the role of the marines, the presence of the marines, in a policy context.

First let me read you the principles which underlie our policy toward Lebanon. Let me repeat them. You already stated them: The withdrawal of all external forces; a sovereign Lebanon under a strong central authority, dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout the territory; and security for Israel's northern border.

These principles have not changed in the past several years. They are a constant of our policy. They also form the basis of the May 17 agreement between Israel and Lebanon.

In your opening statement, sir, you noted the importance of the American people understanding what were the American national interests in Lebanon. Our goal is to promote the peace and stability of Lebanon, a key country on the borders of Israel and Syria. This peace and stability is good for Lebanon and we believe it is good for the entire area.

Conversely, a Lebanon which is at war with itself, which is subject to the perpetual conniving of foreign forces, which is occupied by foreign forces, is going to be a perpetual source of instability in the area. This is a tragedy for the people of Lebanon and, beyond that, it will be a major problem until it is resolved with respect to moving forward more broadly on the peace front.

Our marines are in Lebanon to promote our policy goals for Lebanon, which are intimately related to our hopes and expectations for a broader peace in the area. The role of the marines is very much on all of our minds, particularly in the period of the most recent past, when we suffered our first fatalities.

Let me emphasize that our marines are part of a multinational force [MNF].[87] Our allies, the British, French, and Italians, are committed to our fundamental goals in Lebanon. We share the commitment to a strong Lebanon and we have all rededicated ourselves to supporting the constitutionally elected Government of Lebanon.

The MNF continues to provide great essential psychological support for the government and its armed forces, and this contributes as well to the greater security of Beirut.

We mourned the casualties suffered by our marines and our MNF partners. This is indeed a tragedy for the forces who were there to contribute to peace in Lebanon and in the area.

The President is determined to take every possible measure to defend our contingent. We have moved to increase the number of marines offshore available to the MNF if necessary.

Now, the underlying premise under which the MNF was deployed to Beirut remains valid: Lebanon is worth saving, for the reasons that I described earlier, and the MNF is playing an important role in that effort. We and the other participants in the MNF are determined to afford our military personnel the best possible protection while they are there.

The MNF has performed magnificently. We can all be proud of their role and show our support for the marines.

The Lebanese Armed Forces are performing better than some expected and predicted. The army is together as a unit, suffering casualties as a unit. This is a very important development and it may mean that at long last the Lebanese can move forward on the road of national reconciliation, which is essential.

We should note that the army has done a very professional job, making good use of the training and equipment provided by U.S. assistance, which has been approved by the Congress.

Now, the politics of Lebanon are very complex. It has a history of power struggle and violence, but for many years the country thrived because political rivalries were overcome, negotiated out, and a delicate balance was maintained.

We strongly encouraged President Gemayel to persevere in his current effort to engage all of the leaders of Lebanon's communities in a dialog on political unity. We hope to work constructively with all the Lebanese toward a better future with restored political balance.

Now, we are not naive in this view. The difficulties are recognized. But it has worked in the past and it can work again.

One ingredient that will be essential to ultimate success is the negotiated withdrawal of all foreign forces. That is not going to be easy, but this is an achievable goal. Ambassador McFarlane is leading our efforts and he is doing a remarkable job under the most difficult conditions.

Now, at the current time achieving a cease-fire is essential as the first step toward moving along the path that the Government of Lebanon has chosen, the path of political reconciliation. We have had help in working with the Government of Lebanon in trying to achieve this cease-fire. The Saudis have been very active. This is a matter of public record. The Jordanians, Egyptians, and others have been very supportive of our efforts.

Ambassador McFarlane flew to Saudi Arabia yesterday, where he is discussing the latest iteration of a cease-fire proposal. He will then have to move on to seek the support of other parties. I do not know exactly where he will go next.

Now, this will not be an easy task. As we all know, in the Damascus bazaar there is a road whose name is The Street Called Straight. Unfortunately, negotiations in the Middle East rarely follow that path.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Rules of Engagement for the U.S. Contingent to the Multinational Force

Q. Mr. President, your administration, however, seems to be in a bit of an untenable position of claiming that Marines in Lebanon aren't involved in hostilities even though four of them have been killed.[89] What is your definition of hostilities in this kind of a situation?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, again, since this is all part of the things that are being negotiated I am a little hard put to comment on that question. Let me say that the term "imminent hostilities" which is incorporated in the War Powers Act seems to be some, or there seem to be some legal disagreements about the technicalities and the meaning of that. There is no question but that there is danger, but then this had to be anticipated in the very sending in of the multinational force. There are four countries represented there.[90] We sent a force in, not to engage in combat, but to lend the stability and an order when the foreign forces in Lebanon would withdraw and then the Lebanese Government for the first time in 8 years would set out with its own Armed Forces to reestablish its control over its territory and its borders, but this force would be behind, but with the factional fighting that for 8 years has been going on, we were aware that that was not exactly sending them on a vacation.

Q. Mr. President just changing the subject to Lebanon itself, we are told that by next Friday the battleship New Jersey will be off the coast of Lebanon. Does this indicate an escalation and are we heading for a small war?

THE PRESIDENT. No. That is not our intention and our mission has not changed, the mission that I described earlier of being a stabilizing force there as we try to, or as Lebanon tried to reinstate itself as a sovereign nation with control of its own territory. No. We have no intention of enlarging forces. We have no intention of—

Q. What is the mission of the New Jersey?

THE PRESIDENT. We have found in this danger that I described before as we all know that in the factional fighting that is going on which is aided and abetted by the Syrians, who are definitely influenced by the Soviet forces in their country now, by Palestinians, PLO, who have come back in after having been ousted from Lebanon, and there have been direct assaults upon the multinational forces. We have taken casualties. We have had fatalities. So have our allies and I have given orders that the Marines are going to be able to protect themselves. We're not asking them to sit there—

Q. And that includes, if necessary, firepower from the New Jersey?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. And we have already on one occasion as you know used naval gunfire to silence the guns that were shooting at our men.

. . . . . .

Q. Can I go back to the question of military force. You said you are prepared to have the Marines defend themselves. Are you prepared to let the Marines leave their defensive positions for instance and operate with the Lebanese Army if necessary?

THE PRESIDENT. No. That has never been a part of our consideration. They are in areas as are the military men of the other nations, designated areas, positions and no, we have not suggested that they involve themselves because that would be involving them in the combat that is going on. No. They are to defend themselves.

Q. Mr. President, have you thought about how much more military force you are prepared to use in Lebanon and under what circumstances?

THE PRESIDENT. Whatever is necessary to protect our men.

. . . . . .

Q. It seems that Lebanon has turned into such a festering sore that we have almost even forgotten about the entire peace plan.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, but remember the situation when we started. Remember the forces that were fighting there, the Israelis against the PLO that were entrenched in the heart of the city, the hundreds and hundreds of civilian casualties that were taking place. We now have an agreement, a pact between Lebanon and the Israelis. They have made one phase of withdrawal and have promised and assured us that they are going to leave Lebanon.

Now, at that time, Syria had said that it, too, would leave, that when everyone left they would leave. Then came the Syrian reversal in which they now deny or refuse to leave and are insisting on control in the sense over another sovereign nation, Lebanon.

There was the assassination of Gemavel, the brother of the president, the president who had been elected president and now we have the new president. So what has happened is the bulk of the conflict that we are having is the kind of disorder that began 8 years ago in Lebanon when the various factions, the Druse, the Phalangists, each one of whom, these separate groups created their own militia, their own armed force and now what had not been anticipated with Syria promising to get out was not only their reversal but now their backing and promoting of the Druse, and the Phalangists in all of this fighting and in their resistance to the Lebanese armed forces who are trying to restore order.

Testimony by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, September 21, 1983 (Extracts) [91]

Executive-Congressional Compromise on Lebanon and Restatement of U.S. Objectives

Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of this committee, I welcome this chance to talk with you about our objectives in Lebanon and about the importance President Reagan attaches to cooperating with the Congress in pursuit of these objectives.

The challenge in Lebanon is a challenge we face together, as a Nation. The issues are not partisan issues. At stake are goals and principles of American foreign policy

[91] Source: Statutory Authorization Under the War Powers Resolution—Lebanon: Hearing and Markup Before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 2–7, 12. The Secretary was testifying in response to H.J. Res. 364 and H.Res. 315. The former was introduced on September 20, and was intended to invoke the War Powers Resolution in regard to the U.S. military presence in Lebanon. Secretary Shultz made essentially the same statement in testimony that day at a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing on the War Powers Resolution.

on which I dare say there is a broad measure of consensus.

Whatever legitimate differences there may be over tactics or prerogatives, our leadership in the world is clearly impaired if the President and the Congress attempt to conduct two different foreign policies. We must work together to meet our common, national responsibility or else our common, national interests in the world will suffer.

In the last 15 years, there have been instances of deadlock between our two branches of Government which resulted in harm to our foreign policy, and human tragedy. The President is determined that this will not be such a case.

This is the spirit in which we approach this problem, and I am heartened by the similar spirit I have seen in the Congress. As President Reagan said yesterday, we support the bipartisan leadership agreement that has been reached.[82] This agreement, in my view, serves the national interest.

Let me explain the administration's view of what is at stake in the Middle East, and in Lebanon; what our diplomacy is attempting to accomplish there; and why the presence of our Marines has been of enormous importance.

Our policy in the Middle East: It is almost 10 years since the October 1973 war, and for the past decade the United States has been vigorously and almost continuously engaged in Middle East diplomacy.

Given our strong moral and political commitment to Israel and our many strong friendships in the Arab world, we have always perceived that a negotiated solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict was in the national interest of the United States.

Israel and its Arab neighbors deserve to live in peace and security; the Palestinian people deserve a just solution to their legitimate rights and aspirations; all the nations of the region deserve a future free of external intervention or superpower confrontation.

The road to peace is long and hard, and we have no illusions about it. But we can be proud of the role our country has played in bringing about many significant steps toward peace in the past 10 years.

Just over a year ago, President Reagan addressed himself to the broader questions of Middle East peace in a major initiative, which offered—and still offers—the most practical and workable and hopeful basis for negotiation. Anyone in the Middle East who truly seeks a just, secure, and comprehensive solution to the conflict will have to turn in the direction of the President's initiative, firmly grounded as it is in the Camp David Accords and U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

The crisis in Lebanon cannot be isolated from the larger Middle East crisis. It involves many of the same parties concerned with the broader issues of Middle East peace. It involves similar questions of security, respect for sovereignty, and peaceful settlement of disputes.

To advance toward a peaceful solution in Lebanon will contribute to the broader peace process; setbacks in Lebanon will make the broader effort that much harder.

Our objectives and policy in Lebanon: Our objectives in Lebanon have, from the beginning, been essentially threefold: The withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon; a sovereign independent Lebanon dedicated to national unity and able to exercise control throughout its national territory; and security for Israel's northern border, so that the inhabitants of northern Israel can live in safety and without fear of artillery and rocket attacks.

These objectives are not changing. They are, and have been, a constant of our policy. The latest outbreak of fighting should not cause us to lose sight of them.

Lebanon is a proud and beautiful country, whose people have contributed much to the world. Yet it has also had a complex and turbulent history. The roots of enmity in that country go very deep indeed.

[82] On September 20, President Reagan informed reporters at the White House that, "While I have substantial reservations about parts of this resolution—reservations which I made clear to the leadership—I am pleased that this agreement among the congressional leadership supporting our presence and policies in Lebanon has been reached, and I would be willing to sign the proposed resolution, while expressing my reservations, if it is passed in the form that has been presented to me this morning." For text of his statement, see Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, September 26, 1983, p. 1280. One of the issues in dispute was the duration of the Marines' participation in the multinational force. The President wanted 18 months.

Nevertheless, for many years Lebanon thrived because political rivalries were accommodated and a delicate balance maintained. Our country, too, suffered a tragic civil war, but we survived and overcame it.

The people of Lebanon remember a happier time when their nation was a dynamic, progressive, and prosperous democracy. The yearning for peace, too, runs deep in Lebanon.

With the end of the terrible ordeal of Beirut last summer and the election of President Amin Gemayel shortly thereafter, it appeared that Lebanon would get a second chance after all.

Almost all of Lebanon's many confessional groups pledged their loyalty to their new leader and seemed ready to bury their differences in the name of political and economic renewal. War damage was quickly being removed from Beirut and reconstruction seemed well underway.

To consolidate this hopeful beginning, it was clear that Lebanon had, as a matter of top priority, to see to the withdrawal of all non-Lebanese armed forces from its soil. Whatever indigenous barriers to national reconciliation the Lebanese may face and however prepared they may be to overcome them if given a chance, that process can never really get underway so long as Lebanon remains occupied by foreign armies, foreign paramilitary forces, and foreign terrorist groups.

The United States responded favorably to the request of the Lebanese Government—and of many of our Arab friends—to help Lebanon and Israel reach an agreement that would be a first step toward this objective. Israel was prepared to withdraw, and Lebanon was willing to negotiate an agreement that also met Israel's legitimate need for security on its northern border.

After lengthy negotiations, and with a great deal of good will on both sides, Lebanon and Israel reached such an agreement on May 17.

In parallel with this effort, we put our weight behind President Gemayel's movement toward political accommodation of Lebanon's many confessional groups.

On August 31, President Gemayel, with his council of Ministers, issued a call for key Lebanese leaders to join in a dialog on a new national approach to reconciliation and unity. He has made clear his willingness to broaden the base and composition of his Government to reflect a true sharing of power.

This is a policy we have strongly urged, supported, and assisted, and we have no doubt of President Gemayel's sincerity. Ambassadors Robert McFarlane and Richard Fairbanks have devoted considerable time and effort to this enterprise, as has Saudi Arabia.

The problem, of course, has been Syria. The two tracks of Lebanon's policy—foreign troop withdrawal, and national reconciliation—have both been blocked by Syria, which has been heavily rearmed by the Soviet Union since Syria's defeats in battle last summer.

No one questions Syria's legitimate security concerns with respect to Lebanon. But Syria, unlike Israel, has been unwilling to negotiate with Lebanon over how to reconcile its security concerns with Lebanon's sovereign right to follow its own path.

The question arises whether Syria's aim is to assure its security or assure its domination of Lebanon:

Syria now has the largest army in Lebanon, but it has refused to negotiate the withdrawal of its forces, reneging on repeated pledges that it would do so once the Israelis did.

Syria has persisted in this course even in defiance of the Lebanese Government's formal requests at the beginning of September to Syria, the PLO, and the Arab League that all external forces withdraw. Israel has stated its unwillingness to withdraw totally as long as Syrian forces are there; thus Syria is in the ironic position of keeping Israeli forces in Lebanon.

Syria is also permitting the reentry of armed Palestinian groups into the Aleyh/Shuf area in violation of the agreements reached through Ambassador Habib's mediation last year.

At the same time, Syria is using its leverage within Lebanon to obstruct the process of national reconciliation. Indeed, Syria has instigated political opposition within Lebanon and armed several factions engaged in military actions against the legitimate Government.

Therefore, the immediate focus of our diplomacy, conducted by Ambassadors McFarlane and Fairbanks, is a cease-fire between the various groups in Lebanon. Saudi Arabia has been actively pursuing the same goal.

Jordan, Egypt, and other friendly Arab countries have been very supportive of these diplomatic efforts.

The outcome of this negotiation, as of any negotiation, will depend on the balance of forces. Those who seek to improve their position by force will probably not agree to a cease-fire until they run up against a stalemate on the battlefield.

This brings me to the military situation, and to the role of the multinational force now in Lebanon, which includes, as you know, approximately 1,200 U.S. marines on the ground in the Beirut area.

One year ago, President Reagan dispatched these marines to participate in the multinational force requested by the Government of Lebanon.

The presence of this force was designed to help insure the Lebanese Government's sovereignty and authority; it was also intended to further that Government's efforts to assure the safety of people in the area and to end the violence that had tragically recurred in the massacres of Sabra and Shatila.

British, French, and Italian forces are serving alongside our marines, and thus the multinational force is a truly multinational cooperative effort. Its task is a peacekeeping mission, not a warfighting mission.

Its job is not to take sides in a way, but, on the contrary, to help provide a sense of security for the legitimate Government of Lebanon as it pursues its national sovereignty and national unity.

Most of the key confessional groups and friendly Arab countries supported this role for the multinational force when it was sent to Lebanon, and they continue to support this role.

Now the multinational force is under challenge by those apparently determined to prevent an internal political accommodation. The President has augmented U.S. naval support forces offshore and has authorized U.S. forces to exercise their right of self-defense should attacks on them continue. Our multinational force partners have taken similar or other measures to assure security and self-defense.

We are concerned that key strategic positions in the vicinity of Beirut, which are vital to the safety of our marines, of other American military and diplomatic personnel, and to the security of Beirut, have recently come under attack.

We have responded to these attacks in order to protect our personnel, and will continue to do so. General Kelley will be able to discuss the military situation in greater detail should you have questions about it.

A cease-fire, as I have suggested, will come about only when all parties conclude it is in their interest.

Our strategy in Lebanon is to help create conditions that will make it in everyone's interest to help produce a kind of equilibrium which will encourage a cease-fire, a political accommodation, and ultimately the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

We are seeking to build a structure of stability on the following pillars:

The first element is political negotiations to bring about national reconciliation within Lebanon, to ease or resolve the internal rivalries and mutual suspicions that are at the heart of Lebanon's agony. The United States has strongly supported this endeavor. We are also concerned for the safety of the Palestinian civilians in Lebanon.

The second element is diplomacy to organize international support for the legitimate Government of Lebanon, for its efforts at reconciliation, and for a cease-fire. The United States is actively engaged in this effort.

In the military dimension, the primary responsibility rests on the Lebanese Armed Forces, which have acquitted themselves well. We have helped train and equip these forces, and we are pleased that these forces have been reconstituted to take into account the confessional balance in Lebanon. An army that would be more than adequate for its mission of keeping order once foreign forces were removed, however, is now understandably under severe pressures because it is under assault by forces protected, armed, and encouraged by Syria. It is the external, non-Lebanese involvement that is enormously exacerbating the problem.

Israel continued to have influence with many groups in Lebanon, and has an interest in encouraging national reconciliation and stability. Events north of the Awwali River must be of concern to it, since its long-term security cannot but be affected by Syrian and PLO dominance of the rest of Lebanon.

The multinational force, including our marines, provides an added measure of stability in the overall equation, as I have described.

Our marines, or the multinational force as a whole, cannot tip the balance of forces alone—and it is not their mission to do so. But their presence remains one crucial pillar of the structure of stability.

As a former marine, although I would have to say there is no such thing as a former marine, I will not allow anyone to cast doubt on how formidable even this small number of marines can be.

They are an important deterrent, a symbol of the international backing behind the legitimate Government of Lebanon, and an important weight in the scales. To remove the marines would put both the government, and what we are trying to achieve, in jeopardy.

This is why our domestic controversy over war powers has been disturbing. The uncertainty about the American commitment only weakens our effectiveness; doubts about our staying power can only cause the aggressors to discount our presence—or to intensify their attacks, in hopes of hastening our departure.

An accommodation between the President and Congress to resolve this dispute will help dispel those doubts about our staying power and strengthen our hand.

The executive and legislative branches, as you know, have important differences of principle with respect to the War Powers Resolution.

The executive branch has traditionally had questions about the requirement of congressional authorization for Presidential disposition of our armed forces, both in light of the President's Commander in Chief power and on practical grounds.

Congress, of course, has had a different view. We could not expect to resolve this basic difference definitively now, but the administration has been prepared to consider practical proposals that enabled us to protect our common, national interest in Lebanon without prejudging our respective positions on the basic issue of principle.

In this regard, we are gratified that an agreement has been reached among the bipartisan leadership of the Congress to introduce and seek to enact a resolution authorizing the continued presence and mission of the U.S. peacekeeping forces in Lebanon.

As the President stated yesterday, although he has substantial reservations about parts of this resolution, he would be willing to sign the proposed resolution while expressing those reservations.

We are especially pleased that the proposed resolution not only supports our policies in Lebanon, but now enables us to advance our national interests on the solid bipartisan basis that has been the traditional hallmark of American foreign policy.

What is at stake in Lebanon: At stake in Lebanon are some basic principles of international law and international morality that have wider relevance for American foreign policy:

At stake is a small country's right to decide for itself how to achieve its sovereign objectives, free from outside pressure, threat, or blackmail.

At stake is the principle that international disputes should be settled by peaceful means, not by the use of threat of force.

At stake also are some concerns that affect our national interest and the security of our friends and allies. If American efforts for peaceful solutions are overwhelmed by brute force, our role is that much weakened everywhere.

Friends who rely on us will be disheartened, and will be that much less secure. Moderates in the Arab world whom we are encouraging to take risks for peace will feel it far less safe to do so.

The Soviet Union's efforts to disrupt our diplomacy will have scored a victory; radical and rejectionist elements will be strengthened. The cause of peace and justice will have suffered a setback. Israel's security on its northern border will be weakened.

What we are doing in Lebanon is right. There are risks involved, but any important undertaking involves risks. If we want the role and influence of a great power, we have to accept the responsibilities of a great power.

Many millions of people around the world look to us as the strongest defender of freedom, justice, and peace; we cannot walk away from responsibilities without paying a moral and political price.

I prefer to look at it positively. After all the experience of the last 15 years, nothing would give more reassurance and hope to all our friends in the world than to see the President and Congress work in harmony, united behind a strong and purposeful national policy. This is our opportunity now. We cannot afford to let it slip away.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

. . . . . .

[MR. HAMILTON.] . . . The second question I have is: What are the implications of a withdrawal of the marines? You spoke to this, to some extent, in your statement. I would like you to spell it out in detail because this is going to be the crux of the debate.

There will be those who will want to withdraw immediately and those who will want to withdraw in 6 months' time. They will be opposing those who support the 18-month period.

I would like you to spell out, as carefully as you can, what the implications are of a withdrawal of the marines immediately or, say, within 6 months' time.

What are the implications with regard to the negotiations? What are the implications with regard to our position in the Middle East? What are the implications for Israel? What are the implications for our strategic situation worldwide?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. That is a very good question. It is an important matter for everyone to consider.

The simplest and first thing that I think you have to keep in mind is that when the world sees that when America sends its forces to perform a legitimate mission asked for by the legitimate government involved and it does so and then the minute some trouble arises we turn tail and beat it, I think that sends a gigantic message around the world that is very undesirable and is totally incompatible with our role as a defender of freedom and justice around the world and as a great power with interests around the world.

I think that is the first thing to keep in mind on just immediate withdrawal. It is inconceivable to me that we would do that. I am sure the President would not do that. But it would have that kind of consequence.

As far as the implications of a Soviet-Syrian dominated Lebanon are concerned, with the PLO brought back into Beirut and elsewhere throughout Lebanon, I think that would be a major setback for peace in the Middle East, generally. It would be a major setback to the objective of stability and peaceful conditions in northern Israel, and it would, therefore, constitute a major problem in that regard.

So, those are some answers to your question. I tried to spell this out in greater detail in my opening statement.

Letter From President Reagan to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), September 27, 1983 [93]

Support For Compromise Resolution on U.S. Forces in Lebanon

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I know you were as gratified as I with Sunday's announcement [94] of a cease fire in Lebanon. While there were many things that contributed to the cease fire, it is my belief that your agreement to advance the compromise resolution on war powers [95]—and the favorable action by the Foreign Affairs and Foreign Relations Committees—were particularly important. At a crucial point, your agreement and the supporting committee actions expressed a commitment to bipartisanship in U.S. foreign policy. Please accept my thanks.

Let me also take this opportunity to clarify an issue with respect to the interpretation of the compromise resolution. The compromise resolution refers to the requirements of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act; [96] I gather that a question has arisen as to the Executive Branch's understanding and intention in this regard. My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act: [97] It would be my intention to seek Congressional authorization—as contemplated by the Act—if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. armed forces in Lebanon.

In addition, regarding the Administration's intentions with respect to the 18-month time period, I can assure you that if our forces are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period, it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms.

Again let me thank you for your support for the compromise agreement. I believe its prompt enactment will only further improve the chances for the stable peace we seek in Lebanon.

Sincerely,

RON

[95] According to a September 26, 1983, report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee:

"This resolution is the reflection of a delicate compromise, carefully constructed in recognition of the firmly-held positions of both the legislative and executive branches. However, the Committee believes that the resolution is fully consistent with, and supportive of, the constitutional role of Congress recognized in the War Powers Resolution. As our former colleague Jacob Javits—the principal Senate author of the War Powers Resolution—expressed it in a statement provided to all Members prior to the markup:

"The Administration and the Congress have each gained a major point in the proposed compromise on the War Powers Resolution. Congress has established the proposition that it may set the clock running under the resolution even if the President does not trigger it by giving the appropriate notice under the proper section of the resolution when U.S. troops are deployed abroad into hostilities or the imminent threat of them. The President has gained the point that for the situation in Lebanon the authority Congress gives him to continue their involvement must be by joint not concurrent resolution, thereby, requiring the President's signature. This compromise avoids a constitutional crisis at this juncture. Though it may not settle the issue, it is an important step along the way." Signing Into Law, Though With Reservations, the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution

I am pleased to sign into law today S.J. Res. 159, the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution. [99] This Resolution provides important support for the United States presence and policies in Lebanon, and facilitates the pursuit of United States interests in that region on the bipartisan basis that has been the traditional hallmark of American foreign policy. In my view, the participation and support of the Congress are exceedingly important on matters of such fundamental importance to our national security interests, particularly where United States Armed Forces have been deployed in support of our policy objectives abroad. I am grateful to those of both political parties who joined in the expression of resolve reflected by the enactment of this Resolution, and especially to the bipartisan leadership of Senate Majority Leader Baker, House Speaker O'Neill, House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Zablocki and Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Percy.

The text of this Resolution states a number of congressional findings, determinations, and assertions on certain matters. It is, of course, entirely appropriate for Congress to express its views on these subjects in this manner. However, I do not necessarily join in or agree with some of these expressions. For example, with regard to the congressional determination that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983, I would note that the initiation of isolated or infrequent acts of violence against United States Armed Forces does not necessarily constitute actual or imminent involvement in hostilities, even if casualties to those forces result. I think it reasonable to recognize the inherent risk and imprudence of setting any precise formula for making such determinations.

However, complete accord on such debatable issues is less important than the process that has taken place and the bipartisan policy goals that have been articulated. We must not let disagreements on interpretation or issues of institutional powers prevent us from expressing our mutual goals to the citizens of our Nation and the world. I therefore sign this Resolution in full support of its policies, but with reservations about some of the specific congressional expressions.

There have been historic differences between the legislative and executive branches of government with respect to the wisdom and constitutionality of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution. That section purports to require termination of the use of United States Armed Forces in actual hostilities or situations in which imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances unless Congress, within 60 days, enacts a specific authorization for that use or otherwise extends the 60-day period. In light of these historic differences, I would like to emphasize my view that the imposition of such arbitrary and inflexible deadlines creates unwise limitations on presidential authority to deploy United States Forces in the interests of United States national security. For example, such deadlines can undermine foreign policy judgments, adversely affect our ability to deploy United States Armed Forces in support of these judgments, and encourage hostile elements to maximize United States casualties in connection with such deployments.

I believe it is, therefore, important for me to state, in signing this Resolution, that I do not and cannot cede any of the authority vested in me under the constitution as President and as Commander-in-Chief of United States Armed Forces. Nor should my signing be viewed as any acknowledgment that the President's consti-

[99] On September 28, the House of Representatives adopted H.J. Res. 364 by a vote of 270 to 161. The following day, the Senate passed S.J. Res. 159 by a vote of 54 to 46. On that same day, the House concurred in the slightly different Senate version. This was the first invocation of the War Powers Resolution. tutional authority can be impermissibly infringed by statute, that congressional authorization would be required if and when the period specified in section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution might be deemed to have been triggered and the period had expired, or that section 6 of the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution may be interpreted to revise the President's constitutional authority to deploy United States Armed Forces. Let me underscore, however, that any differences we may have over institutional prerogatives will in no way diminish my intention to proceed in the manner outlined in my letter of September 27, 1983, [1] to achieve the important bipartisan goals reflected in this Resolution.

Indeed, I am convinced that congressional support for the continued participation of United States Forces alongside those of France, Italy, and the United Kingdom helped bring about the recent cease-fire and the start of the reconciliation process in Lebanon. The security and the stability of the Beirut area and the successful process of national reconciliation are essential to the achievement of United States policy objectives in Lebanon, as stated in the Resolution. It is my fervent hope and belief that this reaffirmation of the support of the executive and legislative branches for the Government of Lebanon and for our partners in the Multinational Force will promote a lasting peace and hasten the return home of our Armed Forces.

The Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution

JOINT RESOLUTION

Providing statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued United States participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East;

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

(4) progress toward national political reconciliation in Lebanon is necessary; and

(5) United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the War Powers Resolution.

(b) The Congress determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983. Consistent with section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, the purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

(c) The Congress intends this joint resolution to constitute the necessary specific statutory authorization under the War

Powers Resolution for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CONTINUED PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 3. The President is authorized, for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, to continue participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, subject to the provisions of section 6 of this joint resolution. Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. As required by section 4(c) of the War Powers Resolution, the President shall report periodically to the Congress with respect to the situation in Lebanon, but in no event shall he report less often than once every three months. In addition to providing the information required by that section on the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving United States Armed Forces, such reports shall describe in detail—

(1) the activities being performed by the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(2) the present composition of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, including a description of the responsibilities and deployment of the armed forces of each participating country;

(3) the results of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(4) how continued United States participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is advancing United States foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and

(5) what progress has occurred toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanese groups.

STATEMENTS OF POLICY

SEC. 5. (a) The Congress declares that the participation of the armed forces of other countries in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is essential to maintain the international character of the peacekeeping function in Lebanon.

(b) The Congress believes that it should continue to be the policy of the United States to promote continuing discussions with Israel, Syria, and Lebanon with the objective of bringing about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and establishing an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(c) It is the sense of the Congress that, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this joint resolution and at least once a year thereafter, the United States should discuss with the other members of the Security Council of the United Nations the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon. An analysis of the implications of the response to such discussions for the continuation of the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be included in the reports required under paragraph (3) of section 4 of this resolution.

DURATION OF AUTHORIZATION FOR UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 6. The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the eighteen-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this resolution unless the Congress extends such authorization, except that such authorization shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

(1) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) the assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(3) the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area; or

(4) the withdrawal of all other countries from participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

CONGRESSIONAL PRIORITY PROCEDURES FOR AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) Any joint resolution or bill introduced to amend or repeal this Act shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, as the case may be. Such joint resolution or bill shall be considered by such committee within fifteen calendar days and may be reported out, together with its recommendations, unless such House shall otherwise determine pursuant to its rules.

(b) Any joint resolution or bill so reported shall become the pending business of the House in question (in the case of the Senate the time for debate shall be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents) and shall be voted on within three calendar days thereafter, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(c) Such a joint resolution or bill passed by one House shall be referred to the committee of the other House named in subsection (a) and shall be reported out by such committee together with its recommendations within fifteen calendar days and shall thereupon become the pending business of such House and shall be voted upon within three calendar days, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(d) In the case of any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress with respect to a joint resolution or bill passed by both Houses, conferees shall be promptly appointed and the committee of conference shall make and file a report with respect to such joint resolution within six calendar days after the legislation is referred to the committee of conference. Notwithstanding any rule in either House concerning the printing of conference reports in the Record or concerning any delay in the consideration of such reports, such report shall be acted on by both Houses not later than six calendar days after the conference report is filed. In the event the conferees are unable to agree within forty-eight hours, they shall report back to their respective Houses in disagreement.

Approved October 12, 1983.

Denunciation of the Bombing of Marine Headquarters

I'm not going to take any questions this morning because we're going right into meetings on the events that have taken place on this tragic weekend. [5]

But I would like to make this statement: I know there are no words that can express our sorrow and grief over the loss of those splendid young men and the injury to so many others. I know there are no words also that can ease the burden of grief for the families of those young men.

Likewise, there are no words to properly express our outrage and, I think, the outrage of all Americans at the despicable act, following as it does on the one perpetrated several months ago in the spring that took the lives of scores of people at our Embassy in that same city, in Beirut.

But I think we should all recognize that these deeds make so evident the bestial nature of those who would assume power, if they could have their way and drive us out of that area, that we must be more determined than ever that they cannot take over that vital and strategic area of the earth or, for that matter, any other part of the earth.

Thank you.

Statement by the President's Principal Deputy Press Secretary (Speakes), October 23, 1983 [6]

"We Will Not Yield To International Terrorism"

The President held extensive meetings today with his senior advisers to consider the United States response to the deliberate and heinous acts of international terrorism in Beirut against American and French forces. These forces are present to assist a peaceful settlement of the Lebanese crisis; this settlement is essential to regional and world peace. These attacks were clearly designed to weaken our determination and to disrupt the efforts of the Government of Lebanon to regain control and sovereignty over the country. One thing is clear: those who sponsor these outrages believe that they can intimidate the Government of Lebanon, its people, and their friends in the international community. They are wrong. We will not yield to international terrorism because we know that if we do, the civilized world will suffer and our values will be fair game for those who seek to destroy all we stand for.

The President has directed that General P. X. Kelley, Commandant of the Marine Corps, depart for Beirut to undertake a complete review of ways to provide better protection for the Marine contingent in Lebanon. We also intend to respond to this criminal act when the perpetrators are identified. The President is consulting closely with our MNF allies and the Lebanese Government. Our actions will be resolute and consistent with stated policies and objectives.

The President is communicating with our MNF partners and the Government of Lebanon. He is stressing that we remain determined to pursue our stated objectives in Lebanon which are to ensure that Lebanon can be restored as an independent and sovereign nation free of all foreign forces and free to reconstitute a national consensus. We and the Government of Lebanon remain committed to the process of national reconciliation and an accommodation of the legitimate interests of all the Lebanese people. We have stressed to President Gemayel the necessity of persevering in his courageous decision to broaden the political base and composition of his government, and we will assure that he can do so without surrendering to those who reject political solutions and seek to impose their will by violent means.

Transcript of an Interview With the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), October 23, 1983 (Extracts) [7]

Reaffirmation of the Marines' Mission in Lebanon

. . . . . .

WILL. Mr. Secretary, there does however, seem as this episode today underscores rather less peace today than when the peacekeeping forces went in. Can you tell us what objective 1,300 Marines—military objective and how 1,300 Marines at an airport contribute to peace in Lebanon?

A. You have to bear in mind what the original mission was and the original mission hasn't changed but it certainly has become more difficult. I don't argue with that for a moment with you. The original mission was to interpose a multinational peacekeeping force that could give confidence to the troops who would be withdrawing from Syria (Lebanon) from very close combat with each other under agreements that we hoped to work out. Now

[7] Source: Department of Defense files. Weinberger was appearing on the ABC program, "This Week With David Brinkley". The other interviewers were George Will and Sam Donaldson, both of ABC News.

Syria has refused to sign any agreement despite the fact that the Lebanese Government has requested it and that many of the Arab governments have requested it. Israel did agree to withdraw and has withdrawn part way but they will only go all the way when the others withdraw. The PLO would presumably follow the Syrians but since the Syrians won't agree to withdraw the situation remains, as you say, very difficult and unresolved.

But the mission remains the same. This group of Marines and this multinational force including the French who've also suffered a grievous blow today, they weren't to go out and conquer Lebanon or to destroy all the forces in Lebanon. They were to give confidence and to bring about a situation in which the occupying forces would withdraw—Israeli; PLO; Syrians and all the rest and that still remains the mission and it still dictates the size and composition of our force.

DONALDSON. Mr. Secretary, why were the security barriers no stronger than they were this morning so that a pickup truck can penetrate to that building in the Beirut airport?

A. Security barriers were the same kind that you have in any sort of building in an area open to the public and occupied by the public. This is one of the regular buildings that has been used in the administration of the airport which from time to time is open. And this truck drove right straight through a Marine guard post, it drove through a fence and it drove into the lobby of the building. Now if anybody is willing to kill themselves in the setting-off of a dynamite explosion, it obviously makes a very difficult task to stop. Exactly the way it was in World War II when the Kamikaze pilots were willing to dive right into the carriers.

. . . . . .

WILL. But given how heavily and increasingly the Syrians appear to be dependent on the Soviet Union, is it not in Syria's, therefore the Soviet Union's interest, for the United States to be bogged down there just as they are now?

A. Well the whole involvement of the Soviet Union in Syria adds another complicating and extremely unwelcome and very dangerous factor in the equation. It is another reason why we should persist in our efforts to secure peace by an unoccupied, sovereign Lebanon that's strong enough to accomplish that and we're doing quite a lot of that in ways that are publicized much. And that's in the enormous strengthening and reequipping of the Lebanese Armed Force, which is not a major factor in the equation. But the fact that the Soviets are there and the fact that they're pouring enormous military resources into Syria and the fact that this seems to be encouraging Syria not to withdraw and not to fulfill the commitments they made earlier to withdraw, certainly adds to the danger. But it also is a very significant reason why we should not simply turn our backs on our commitment. This is not to say that we can't search for ways to fulfill that commitment in ways that may render the Marines far less vulnerable and then put them in a better defensive position than they are at present.

DONALDSON. Mr. Secretary, it is possible that we could fulfill that commitment if we withdraw the Marines to the naval force that's just off the coast?

A. That's possible, yes. The naval force has enormous fire power—the New Jersey's perhaps the most powerful single ship in the world. A carrier battle group is there and it is possible to reinforce that and have a very large amount of fire power that would be ready to be used to ensure that withdrawal of foreign forces if they ever can—the Syrians ever will sign these agreements and put all of the factors and all of the forces together then that is one of the ways. The Marines themselves would not leave the area, but this is only one of the options that we're talking about.

Statement by President Reagan, October 24, 1983 [8]

"The United States Will Not Be Intimidated by Terrorists"

Good afternoon. And given what has happened in Lebanon, I've put aside the remarks that I was prepared to give here today. And I'd like to read you this statement.

Yesterday's acts of terrorism in Beirut which killed so many young American and French servicemen were a horrifying reminder of the type of enemy that we face in many critical areas of the world today—vicious, cowardly, and ruthless. Words can never convey the depth of compassion that we feel for those brave men and for their loved ones.

Many Americans are wondering why we must keep our forces in Lebanon. The reason they must stay there until the situation is under control is quite clear. We have vital interests in Lebanon and our actions in Lebanon are in the cause of world peace. With our allies England, France, and Italy we're part of a multinational peacekeeping force seeking a withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and from the Beirut area while the new Lebanese Government undertakes to restore sovereignty throughout that country. By promoting peace in Lebanon, we strengthen the forces for peace throughout the Middle East. This is not a Republican or a Democratic goal but one that all Americans share.

Peace in Lebanon is key to the region's stability now and in the future. To the extent that the prospect for future stability is heavily influenced by the presence of our forces, it is central to our credibility on a global scale. We must not allow international criminals and thugs such as these to undermine the peace in Lebanon. The struggle for peace is indivisible. We cannot pick and choose where we will support freedom. We can only determine how. If it is lost in one place, all of us lose. If others feel confident that they can intimidate us and our allies in Lebanon, they will become more bold elsewhere. If Lebanon ends up under the tyranny of forces hostile to the West, not only will our strategic position in the Eastern Mediterranean be threatened but also the stability of the entire Middle East including the vast resource areas of the Arabian Peninsula.

In conjunction with our multinational force partners, we're trying—taking measures to strengthen the capabilities of our forces to defend themselves. The United States will not be intimidated by terrorists. We have strong circumstantial evidence linking the perpetrators of this latest atrocity to others that have occurred against us in the recent past, including the bombing of our Embassy in Beirut last April.

Every effort will be made to find the criminals responsible for this act of terrorism so this despicable act will not go unpunished.

The Situation in Lebanon

I am sorry to have to be here in such tragic circumstances, but I also appreciate the opportunity to come here to discuss our policy in Lebanon in the wake of yesterday's events.

This outrage perpetrated against our forces is a brutal reminder, as the President said yesterday, of the bestial nature of those elements in the Middle East that will take over if we are not steadfast and strong.[10]

I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the courage and sacrifice of our French ally, as well as to offer my personal sympathy to the families of all those who perished, American and French.

Let me say a few words about the broader issues at stake, and then about the situation in Lebanon.

The Stakes in Lebanon

We are in Lebanon because the outcome in Lebanon will affect our position in the whole Middle East. To ask why Lebanon is important is to ask why the Middle East is important—because the answer is the same.

The United States is involved in the quest for peace in the Middle East because it is a region of vital strategic and economic importance for the free world, because it is an arena of competition between the United States and the Soviet Union, because we have a deep and abiding commitment to Israel and an interest in strengthening the trends of moderation in the Arab world, and because our role of leadership in Middle East diplomacy is a reflection of America's responsibility as a world leader.

The crisis in Lebanon cannot be isolated from the broader Middle East crisis. Indeed, that has been the heart of Lebanon's tragedy in the past 15 years. The contest in Lebanon involves many of the same parties that figure in the broader Middle East drama: moderate elements that yearn to settle their differences peacefully, and radical elements that both preach and practice hatred as a matter of policy. The issues at stake in Lebanon are therefore some of the same issues at stake in the search for Middle East peace: questions of security, of respect for national sovereignty, and the viability of peaceful solutions.

At stake in Lebanon is the fate of the second moderate Arab country to negotiate a major agreement with Israel. I should not have to elaborate on what it would mean for the overall peace process, and for Israel's long-term security, if the assault on this moderate government should succeed. Indeed, this is a major reason why that assault is taking place.

At stake is the right of a small country like Lebanon to decide for itself how to achieve its sovereign objectives free of outside pressure, threat, or blackmail. This is a basic principle of international law and international morality that is vital not only to the future of the Middle East but to the kind of world we want to live in over the remainder of this century.

If America's efforts for peaceful solutions are overwhelmed by brute force, our role in the world is that much weakened everywhere. Friends who rely on us will be disheartened and will be that much less secure. Moderates in the Arab world whom we are encouraging to take risks for peace will feel it far less safe to do so. Israel's security will ultimately be weakened.

If we are driven out of Lebanon, radical and rejectionist elements will have scored a major victory. The message will be sent that relying on the Soviet Union pays off and that relying on the United States is a fatal mistake. This is, of course, the opposite of the message that we want to convey in our foreign policy.

If we are driven out of Lebanon, it will be a major blow to the American position in the Middle East. If we want the role and influence of a great power, then we have to accept the responsibilities of a great power. If we as Americans decide we do not want the role and influence of a great power, then I shudder to think what kind of world of anarchy and danger our children will inherit.

Our Policy in Lebanon

Let me turn now to the situation in Lebanon.

Our goal in Lebanon is a political settlement between the government and the various confessional groups, aiming at a broader-based government that can extend its sovereign authority throughout the country. In these circumstances we envisage the withdrawal of all foreign forces, as well as security arrangements to assure the security of Israel's northern border. This process of political accommodation is an urgent task. It should be a priority responsibility of Lebanon's leaders and Lebanon's people. It is also one of our high priorities.

One step toward this goal was the May 17 agreement between Lebanon and Israel. It provides a framework for cooperation between Lebanon and Israel and it offers the only existing arrangement for assuring Israeli withdrawal while addressing the basic problem of border security that created the Lebanese crisis in the first place. We will continue to defend this agreement and we look to the day when it will be implemented.

Our goal is a political solution, not a military solution. Yet the presence of our Marines has been a crucial pillar of the structure of stability that is needed to make a political solution possible. Our strategy is built on several such pillars:

—Our Marines are part of a multinational peacekeeping force, including the forces of our British, French, and Italian allies. These units symbolize the broad international support for the legitimate Government of Lebanon.

—Backing up our Marines is a powerful offshore naval force, which has fired in defense of the Marines when they have come under fire. Our allies also have naval assets in the Eastern Mediterranean, and have used them.

—In the military dimension, the primary responsibility rests on the Lebanese Armed Forces, which we helped to train and equip. The Army has proven to be a brave and effective fighting force, and is getting stronger by the day. It is more than a match for its Lebanese opponents; its difficulties have come when it was under assault by forces protected, armed, supported, and encouraged by Syria.

—The Lebanese Government has the support of moderate Arabs, which can only be strengthened by a successful effort of national reconciliation.

—Israel, too, remains a key factor in Lebanon, and we need its constructive efforts in support of the Lebanese Government and the process of reconciliation. Israel has leverage with some of the confessional groups, and we hope it will use this leverage in the direction of encouraging political accommodation.

Syria and its surrogates, of course, have been obstructing both our efforts to get foreign forces out and our efforts to promote political accommodation. No one questions Syria's legitimate security concerns with respect to Lebanon. But Syria, unlike Israel, has been unwilling to negotiate with Lebanon over how to reconcile its security concerns with Lebanon's sovereign right to decide its own future. Instead, Syria has declared a kind of "Brezhnev doctrine," whereby countries in its orbit have no sovereign right to make any decisions that displease it.

We achieved a cease-fire on September 26, however, by demonstrating that there were limits beyond which we could not be pushed. The achievement of this cease-fire showed that we have the assets to maintain a stable balance in Lebanon so that the government's opponents cannot steamroll the political negotiations. We must maintain that balance. Pulling our Marines out or reducing their number would only undercut the balance and undermine the chances for an equitable political outcome. This is not President Reagan's policy. The bipartisan support shown in the congressional joint resolution on the War Powers issue was an important contribution, dispelling doubts about our staying power and strengthening our hand.

Responsibility for the Bombing

A question I am sure is on your minds is, who is responsible for this bombing outrage?

I can say to you now only that we are still sifting the evidence, most of which is from before the bombing, and therefore only circumstantially related to the event.

I can also read you some press reports of some interesting reactions to yesterday's bombing:

—The President of the Iranian Supreme Court issued a statement yesterday saying that the "Muslim people" of Lebanon have "dealt with the United States and France in such a way that they have learned their lesson not to embark on aggression and attacks on oppressed nations."

—A Syrian newspaper—part of Syria's state-controlled press—contained a reference to the bombings of our Marine and French soldiers which attributed the two actions to the so-called "Lebanese nationalist resistance."

Both Iran and Syria, of course, deny any responsibility for the bombing attacks.

Since we don't yet know who is directly responsible for the attack, it would not be fruitful to speculate. But there is a broader point to be made. It is not difficult to detect who are the enemies of peace in Lebanon.

The enemies of peace in Lebanon are the enemies of peace in the Middle East, and it is not a coincidence that these elements have been bitter opponents of the Multinational Force in Lebanon of which our Marines are a part:

—Syria, which seems determined to make Lebanon once again a satellite or province of "Greater Syria."

—the Soviet Union, which arms Syria with the most sophisticated weapons and encourages its hegemonistic policies, and —Iran, the regime of fanatics with which we have had earlier experience.

Iranian elements in Lebanon operate from behind Syrian lines and are allied with Syria. Syria must bear a share of responsibility for any Iranian actions in Lebanon whether or not Syria knew of any specific terrorist plans. Likewise, the Soviet Union, even though its relations with Iran are strained, has encouraged Syria and contributed to the climate of violence and intimidation which obtains in Lebanon. And the Soviets have been bitterly opposed to the presence of the Multinational force.

The Soviet Union, Syria, and Iran: That should tell you something about what is going on in Lebanon, why it is a part of something much larger than Lebanon, and why we have a stake in the outcome.

As the result of our deliberations yesterday and today, the President has decided on a series of steps:

—He has ordered the immediate replacement and strengthening of our Marine contingent in Beirut, so that there is no gap in the performance of our mission.

—General P. X. Kelley, Commandant of the Marine Corps, has gone to Beirut to study the security situation of our Marines and to make urgent recommendations on ways of improving it. General Trainor can discuss these matters with you in more detail.

—We are continuing an intensified intelligence effort to identify the perpetrators of Sunday's massacre.

—I will travel to Europe by the end of this week to consult urgently and intensively with the Foreign Ministers of our MNF partners, Britain, France, and Italy.

—Ambassador Richard Fairbanks, who was the partner of Ambassador McFarlane in our recent diplomatic efforts in Lebanon, will be in Geneva to lend support and impetus to President Gemayel's efforts at national reconciliation.

—We are sending a high-level mission to Israel next week to review with our Israeli friends the situation in Lebanon as well as broader issues of Middle East security.

President Reagan is determined that we will not be driven out of Lebanon by the enemies of peace. We will stay and we will carry out our mission. Many millions of people around the world look to the United States as the strongest defender of freedom and peace. We cannot walk away from such responsibilities without paying a moral, political, and strategic price.

U.S. Responsibilities in Lebanon

My fellow Americans, some 2 months ago we were shocked by the brutal massacre of 269 men, women, and children, more than 60 of them Americans, in the shooting down of a Korean airliner. [12]

Now, in these past several days, violence has erupted again, in Lebanon and Grenada. In Lebanon, we have some 1,600 Marines, part of a multinational force that's trying to help the people of Lebanon restore order and stability to that troubled land. Our Marines are assigned to the south of the city of Beirut, near the only airport operating in Lebanon. Just a mile or so to the north is the Italian contingent and not far from them, the French and a company of British soldiers.

This past Sunday, at 22 minutes after 6, Beirut time, with dawn just breaking, a truck, looking like a lot of other vehicles in the city, approached the airport on a busy, main road. There was nothing in its appearance to suggest it was any different than the trucks or cars that were normally seen on and around the airport, but this one was different. At the wheel was a young man on a suicide mission. The truck carried some 2,000 pounds of explosives. But there was no way our Marine guards could know this. Their first warning that something was wrong came when the truck crashed through a series of barriers, including a chain-link fence and barbed wire entanglements. The guards opened fire; but it was too late. The truck smashed through the doors of the headquarters building in which our Marines were sleeping and instantly exploded. The four-story concrete building collapsed in a pile of rubble.

More than 200 of the sleeping men were killed in that one hideous, insane attack. Many others suffered injury and are hospitalized here or in Europe.

This was not the end of the horror. At almost the same instant, another vehicle on a suicide and murder mission, crashed into the headquarters of the French peacekeeping force, an eight-story building, destroying it and killing more than 50 French soldiers.

Prior to this day of horror, there had been several tragedies for our men in the multinational force, attacks by snipers and mortar fire had taken their toll. I called bereaved parents and/or widows of the victims to express on behalf of all of us our sorrow and sympathy.

Sometimes there were questions. And now many of you are asking: Why should our young men be dying in Lebanon? Why is Lebanon important to us?

Well, it's true, Lebanon is a small country, more than 5 1/2 thousand miles from our shores on the edge of what we call the Middle East. But every President who has occupied this office in recent years has recognized that peace in the Middle East is of vital concern to our Nation and, indeed, to our allies in Western Europe and Japan. We have been concerned because the Middle East is a powder keg; four times in the last 30 years, the Arabs and Israelis have gone to war. And each time, the world has teetered near the edge of catastrophe. The area is key to the economic and political life of the West. Its strategic importance, its energy resources, the Suez Canal, and the well being of the nearly 200 million people living there—all are vital to us and to world peace. If that key should fall into the hands of a power or powers hostile to the free world, there would be a direct threat to the United States and to our allies.

We have another reason to be involved. Since 1948, our Nation has recognized and accepted a moral obligation to assure the continued existence of Israel as a nation. Israel shares our democratic values, and is a formidable force an invader of the Middle East would have to reckon with.

For several years, Lebanon has been torn by internal strife. Once a prosperous, peaceful nation, its government had become ineffective in controlling the militias that warred on each other.

Sixteen months ago, we were watching on our T.V. screens the shelling and bombing of Beirut which was being used as a fortress by PLO bands. Hundreds and hundreds of civilians were being killed and wounded in the daily battles. Syria, which makes no secret of its claim that Lebanon should be a part of a greater Syria, was occupying a large part of Lebanon. Today, Syria has become a home for 7,000 Soviet advisors and technicians who man a massive amount of Soviet weaponry, including SS-21 ground-to-ground missiles capable of reaching vital areas of Israel.

[12] The reference is to the September 1 Soviet shooting down of a Korean Airlines plane.

A little over a year ago, hoping to build on the Camp David Accords which had led to peace between Israel and Egypt, I proposed a peace plan for the Middle East to end the wars between the Arab States and Israel. It was based on U.N. Resolutions 242 and 338, and called for a fair and just solution to the Palestinian problem, as well as a fair and just settlement of issues between the Arab States and Israel.

Before the necessary negotiations could begin, it was essential to get all foreign forces out of Lebanon and to end the fighting there. So, why are we there? Well, the answer is straight-forward: to help bring peace to Lebanon and stability to the vital Middle East. To that end, the multinational force was created to help stabilize the situation in Lebanon until a government could be established and a Lebanese army mobilized to restore Lebanese sovereignty over its own soil as the foreign forces withdrew. Israel agreed to withdraw as did Syria, but Syria then reneged on its promise. Over 10,000 Palestinians who had been bringing ruin down on Beirut, however, did leave the country.

Lebanon has formed a government under the leadership of President Gemayel. And that government, with our assistance and training, has set up its own army. In only a year's time, that army has been rebuilt. It is a good army composed of Lebanese of all factions.

A few weeks ago, the Israeli army pulled back to the Awali River in southern Lebanon. Despite fierce resistance by Syrian-backed forces, the Lebanese army was able to hold the line and maintain the defensive perimeter around Beirut.

In the year that our Marines have been there, Lebanon has made important steps toward stability and order. The physical presence of the Marines lends support to both the Lebanese Government and its army. It allows the hard work of diplomacy to go forward. Indeed, without the peacekeepers from the United States, France, Italy, and Britain, the efforts to find a peaceful solution in Lebanon would collapse.

As to that narrower question—What exactly is the operational mission of the Marines? The answer is, to secure a peace in Beirut, to keep order in their sector, and to prevent the area from becoming a battlefield. Our Marines are not just sitting in the airport. Part of their task is to guard that airport. Because of their presence, the airport has remained operational. In addition, they patrol the surrounding area. This is their part—a limited, but essential part—in the larger effort that I've described.

If our Marines must be there, I'm asked, why can't we make them safer? Who committed this latest atrocity against them and why?

Well, we'll do everything we can to ensure that our men are as safe as possible. We ordered the battleship New Jersey to join our naval forces offshore. Without even firing them, the threat of its 16-inch guns silence those who once fired down on our Marines from the hills. And they're a good part of the reason we suddenly had a cease-fire. We're doing our best to make our forces less vulnerable to those who want to snipe at them or send in future suicide missions.

Secretary Shultz called me today from Europe, where he was meeting with the Foreign Ministers of our allies in the multinational force.[13] They remain committed to our task. And plans were made to share information as to how we can improve security for all our men.

We have strong circumstantial evidence that the attack on the Marines was directed by terrorists who used the same method to destroy our Embassy in Beirut. Those who directed this atrocity must be dealt justice. And they will be. The obvious purpose behind the sniping and, now, this attack was to weaken American will, and force the withdrawal of U.S. and French forces from Lebanon. The clear intent of the terrorists was to eliminate our support of the Lebanese Government, and to destroy the ability of the Lebanese people to determine their own destiny.

To answer those who ask if we're serving any purpose in being there, let me answer a question with a question. Would the terrorists have launched their suicide attacks against the multinational force if it were not doing its job? The multinational force was attacked precisely because it is doing the job it was sent to do in Beirut. It is accomplishing its mission.

Now, then, where do we go from here? What can we do now to help Lebanon gain greater stability so that our Marines can come home? Well, I believe we can take three steps now that will make a difference. First, we will accelerate the search for peace and stability in that region. Little attention has been paid to the fact that we've had special envoys there working, literally, around the clock to bring the warring factions together. This coming Monday [14] in Geneva, President Gemayel of Lebanon will sit down with other factions from his country to see if national reconciliation can be achieved. He has our firm support. I will soon be announcing a replacement for Bud McFarlane who was preceded by Phil Habib. [15] Both worked tirelessly, and must be credited for much if not most of the progress we've made.

Second, we'll work even more closely with our allies in providing support of the Government of Lebanon, and for the rebuilding of a national consensus.

Third, we will ensure that the multinational peacekeeping forces, our Marines, are given the greatest possible protection. Our Commandant of the Marine Corps, General Kelley, returned from Lebanon today and will be advising us on steps we can take to improve security.

Vice President Bush returned just last night from Beirut and gave me a full report of his brief visit.

Beyond our progress in Lebanon, let us remember that our main goal and purpose is to achieve a broader peace in all of the Middle East. The factions and bitterness that we see in Lebanon are just a microcosm of the difficulties that are spread across much of that region.

A peace initiative for the entire Middle East, consistent with the Camp David Accords and U.N. Resolutions 242 and 338, still offers the best hope for bringing peace to the region.

Let me ask those who say we should get out of Lebanon: If we were to leave Lebanon now, what message would that send to those who foment instability and terrorism?

If America were to walk away from Lebanon, what chance would there be for a negotiated settlement producing a unified democratic Lebanon?

If we turned our backs on Lebanon now, what would be the future of Israel? At stake is the fate of only the second Arab country to negotiate a major agreement with Israel. That's another accomplishment of this past year, the May 17th Accord signed by Lebanon and Israel.

If terrorism and intimidation succeed, it will be a devastating blow to the peace process and to Israel's search for genuine security. It won't just be Lebanon sentenced to a future of chaos. Can the United States, or the free world, for that matter, stand by and see the Middle East incorporated into the Soviet bloc? What of Western Europe and Japan's dependence on Middle East oil for the energy to fuel their industries? The Middle East, as I've said, is vital to our national security and economic well-being.

Brave young men have been taken from us. Many others have been greviously wounded. Are we to tell them their sacrifice was wasted? They gave their lives in defense of our national security every bit as much as any man who ever died fighting in a war. We must not strip every ounce of meaning and purpose from their courageous sacrifice.

We're a nation with global responsibilities. We're not somewhere else in the world protecting someone else's interests. We're there protecting our own.

I received a message from the father of a Marine in Lebanon. He told me, "In a world where we speak of human rights, there is a sad lack of acceptance of responsibility. My son has chosen the acceptance of responsibility for the privilege of living in this country. Certainly in this country one does not inherently have rights, unless the responsibility for these rights is accepted." Dr. Kenneth Morrison said that while he was waiting to learn if his son was one of the dead. I was thrilled for him to learn today that his son Ross is alive and well and carrying on his duties in Lebanon.

Let us meet our responsibilities. For longer than any of us can remember, the people of the Middle East have lived from war to war with no prospect for any other future. That dreadful cycle must be broken. Why are we there? What a Lebanese mother told one of our Ambassadors, that her little girl had only attended school 2 of the last 8 years. Now, because of our presence there, she said her daughter could live a normal life. With patience and firmness, we can help bring peace to that strife-torn region—and make our own lives more secure. Our role is to help the Lebanese put their country together, not to do it for them.

Testimony by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, November 8, 1983 (Extract) [16]

Explanation of the Decision Not To Use Israeli Medical Facilities

. . . . . .

MR. ADDABBO. Two questions have occurred to me as chairman of the committee.

One, relative to the security at and around the barracks; is it normal to have that many men stationed in one barracks in a zone of hostility, as they were?

The second question is why were the injured men, following the terrorist attack, flown all the way to Germany and not to the most available hospital, such as the hospitals in Israel? The question has been raised as to why the injured were flown such a great distance, rather than utilizing hospitals closer to the scene.

SECRETARY WEINBERGER. Well, Mr. Chairman, on the first question, as far as why there were so many in the building, you have to bear in mind that the principal threat until the time of this attack was rocket-propelled grenades, mortars, small arms fire, and automatic weapons. This is the kind of thing that is best guarded against by getting inside a reinforced concrete structure and this happened to be one of the very few whole standing buildings.

I think you have been in Beirut, and seen the terrible damage in all the various areas. This was a new and modern building that was undamaged. It was a building that bore out the commander's decision to put the marines inside, because nobody has been injured or wounded by this type of fire since occupying it. Obviously in hindsight, having that many men in the building when it blows up means that you have a very terrible loss of life. I believe General Kelley can develop at greater length the reasons why the threat seemed to be, and indeed was, from the kind of fire that I have described.

On the hospitalization, as they say, I am glad you asked that question because we have had a great deal of misinformation about that. I would like to provide a chronology, if I could, for a few moments and then be glad to take any additional questions.

I first heard about this terrible tragedy about 1:30 a.m. Sunday morning within moments after it happened—and throughout the rest of that night.

The only medical information we had at that time was the terrible loss of life. I think the first estimate was something like 40, which gives you a rough idea of how little was known immediately, and that the wounded were being evacuated as quickly as possible.

Somewhere around 11 a.m., I guess, roughly 10 hours or so after the tragedy, Defense Minister Arens of Israel telephoned me and offered his condolences for this terrible thing and said, is there any help we can give? If there is, be sure and call on us. That means a number of things, including hospitalization. "We would be very glad to offer use of our hospitals in Tel Aviv or anywhere else."

I thanked him very much and told him that was a very generous and welcomed offer and that I would immediately pass it on to the commander. I talked to General Vessey who in turn got in touch with the European Command that has the direct command authority over the area. My later understanding, I didn't hear it right then, was that everybody was extremely grateful, but that they did have adequate hospital and evacuation facilities.

You asked about the distances and the speed. The wounded were evacuated by fixed wing aircraft from the airport and taken directly to hospitals on Cyprus which had been previously agreed to with the British, and many were treated at that hospital. Others were taken by helicopter directly to the ships and then evacuated to Germany.

The flight to Haifa, the hospital there, had to be by helicopter, and would have taken much longer than getting the people by fixed wing aircraft to Cyprus. In any event it was, the commander's decision. Obviously, as I am sure you can appreciate, I do not direct which squad fires which bullets, nor do I direct which doctor treats people away from Washington. That is obviously left to the commander.

There was never at any time, Mr. Chairman, and I would certainly like to get this point on the record unequivocally, any suggestion that we should not use an Israeli hospital for political reasons. That is absolute nonsense. As I described on the air, it is a total lie. Yet, it is a story which surfaced within a couple of days, and I'd like to repeat is totally and completely wrong. We did, however, ask the Israelis for some body bags, a very grisly item, but necessary for this kind of thing, which they furnished within an hour, and again, was much appreciated.

I wrote Minister Arens the next day thanking him very much for his offer and telling him that the advice I had was that it was not necessary, but it was much appreciated. So the evacuation continued to either Cyprus or to Germany.

One thing you have to bear in mind, of course, which we tend to forget, and that is, that you cannot evacuate anybody if they are not in stable condition. So a lot of people could not be evacuated immediately because they were in no condition. To the best of my knowledge, and we have researched this other part of the misinformation that has been floating around, only one person died while being evacuated. Incidentally that was a person given zero chance of being saved at the time he was airlifted out. There is no question it was a terrible tragedy, but it shouldn't be made worse by, frankly, a lot of lies.

Now the other thing that I think we should bear in mind, just as a kind of footnote, is that last Friday there was a similar incident that killed a great many Israeli soldiers in the Sidon area. [17] We heard of it within a few hours after it happened and I telephoned Mr. Arens, and again expressed the same kind of condolences he had. I told him we deeply regretted this incident and offered any kind of assistance that would be helpful to him, including hospitalization.

He thanked me very courteously and said that it was very much appreciated, but they could take care of their own in their nearby facilities, but that they did appreciate our offer.

Now, oddly enough, there hasn't been one word in the paper either about that offer or his refusal. His refusal was not based on political reasons, but on the adequacy of his own facilities. Our reaction, was that it was not a refusal at all . . . [18] it was a statement that if the commanders needed it they would surely use it.

Statements by President Reagan and Lebanese President Gemayel, December 1, 1983 [22]

U.S. Talks with President Gemayel

THE PRESIDENT. It's been my great pleasure to once again welcome our friend, President Gemayel, to Washington. President Gemayel symbolizes Lebanon's hopes for unity, peace and stability—goals for which all of us are working so hard and for which many Americans and many more Lebanese have sacrificed their lives.

We admire President Gemayel's personal courage. We applaud his determination to free his country of all foreign forces and to reunite the Lebanese people. Lebanon once shined as a—like a jewel in the sun. And America will do what it can to support Lebanon's efforts to restore her tranquillity and independence.

To this end, we stand by the May 17 agreement as the best and most viable basis for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon. And once again, I appeal to the other external forces to leave Lebanon.

I was particularly impressed by the initiative that President Gemayel took in calling for national dialog. Today, he and I have discussed his programs for national unity. And, Mr. President, your efforts to broaden the base of your government, bringing in Lebanon's many communities, will do much to rebuild a stable and pros-

The two Presidents spoke at 1:25 p.m. to reporters on the South Portico of the White House following their meeting, which was attended by other officials, including Vice President Bush, Secretary of State Shultz, and Donald Rumsfeld, the President's Personal Representative in the Middle East, in the Oval Office. perous Lebanon. It will do much to restore confidence in the future. It will do much to stop the loss of so many innocent lives.

President Gemayel has already achieved a measure of success through the effective leadership that he demonstrated during the first round of reconciliation talks in Geneva. Yet, there is still a long way to go, and Lebanon can count on our help. Our Marines, along with our allies in the multinational force, are in Beirut to demonstrate the strength of our commitment to peace in the Middle East. And I know you agree with me, Mr. President, that the American people can be proud of the job that our Marines are doing.

Their presence is making it possible for reason to triumph over the forces of violence, hatred and intimidation. My special representative for the Middle East, Don Rumsfeld, returned recently from his first round of meetings in the region. He'll be returning to the area soon and will be working directly with President Gemayel to arrange foreign troop withdrawals and to pursue Lebanese national reconciliation.

We're delighted to have you with us today, Mr. President, and we wish you Godspeed on your return home.

PRESIDENT GEMAYEL. Mr. President, I want to thank you and the American people to whom we, in Lebanon, owe so much.

This is my third visit to Washington and probably the most important because of the intensity of the crisis in Lebanon and the region. Yet, I'm confident that actions, properly conceived and executed at this time, can result in dramatic movement towards stability, security, and peace.

Today, we explored, as partners, the best ways and means not to merely implement agreement, but going beyond the letter of the law to set up the most appropriate mechanism and conditions for the achievement of our common interests and policy objectives. We found ourselves in full agreement on the necessity of withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon and the full restoration of the Lebanese sovereignty and exclusive authority over all of Lebanon's territory within its internationally recognized borders. This, and this alone, will put an end to the continuing tragedy which is now engulfing not only Lebanese, but Americans in Lebanon as well. Hence, it is imperative for us all to break the cycle of violence which has been preventing the people for the past decade from exerting their divine and natural right of self-determination and the shaping of a free modern society in full social and economic partnership.

I found in Washington full comprehension of the fact that leading Lebanon out of the present impasse is not only a question of justice and right, but also a matter of common interest both for its neighbors and the United States.

I view our discussions today with a sense of pride and accomplishment. And I'm gratified by President Reagan's commitment, and the support of the American people. I look forward, with hope, that actions taken as a result of our discussions, fortified by the courage and vision of the American and Lebanese people will result in peace in Lebanon and the entire region.

Review of U.S. Talks With President Gemayel

President Gemayel and I and many people working with us have talked a great deal about the situation in Lebanon. We've reviewed the situation extensively from Tripoli on down through the south. We have, I think, imparted to ourselves a genuine sense of urgency about the need to work on these problems, so that we impart a sense of concern on the one hand but confidence on the other that these efforts that we're going to make will work. We, of course, see this visit as part of a process which has been going on for a year or so now and at the same time, we have felt that as we approach the development of a strong working partnership that has been forged here—that we will give somewhat more structure to these efforts by creating a committee on military matters and a committee on economic matters that will essentially take in the things that are ongoing and give them somewhat more structure and coherence in their work.

We've discussed, of course, the military situation. President Gemayel has brought forward to our military some additional suggestions which are being reviewed and are being discussed extensively and at the same time, we've talked a great deal about the economic and financial problems in Lebanon. We have reaffirmed the importance of the basic objectives that we have talked about now for some time and which President Reagan has insisted upon, particularly focussing on the importance of withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and of course, we want to see the emergence of a broadly based strong central government in Lebanon with appropriate security arrangements all around.

As we work toward those broad objectives, we also have identified a number of concrete intermediate things that we feel are important to do and we are making plans to carry them out—put them into operation. We want to see if the siege can be lifted and we want to see that happen to a besieged village.[24] We want to look to the question of greater civil authority in all occupied areas so those are examples of many things we have discussed that represent immediate steps.

So, a thorough review of the situation, a sense of urgency, a reaffirmation of our basic objectives, the provision of some additional structure in the manner in which we are working, a close examination of the content—the important content of key issues and focussing and continuing focussing on the many intermediate steps represents the description of what has taken place in this visit and out of it, speaking at least on my own part, I have a renewed sense of confidence that we are going to succeed in Lebanon.

U.S. Air Strike in Lebanon

THE PRESIDENT. Good afternoon. For some time now, we have been flying regular and routine reconnaissance flights with unarmed planes in Lebanon as a part of the protection and defense of our forces there. We notified the Syrians of this some time ago, assuring the planes were unarmed; this was purely for reconnaissance. There have been some instances of firing at those planes now and then from unknown sources. But early yesterday, two such reconnaissance missions were fired upon by literally hundreds of anti-aircraft and a combination of surface-to-air missiles which were coordinated in several sites by the Syrians. Early today, we responded to this unprovoked attack by striking back at those sites from whence had come the attack.

We don't seek hostilities there. Our mission remains what it was: to help stabilize the situation in Beirut until all the foreign forces can be withdrawn and until the Government of Lebanon can take over the authority of its own territory. But we are going to defend our forces there. And this was the reason, or the purpose of the mission earlier today.

Q. Are you going to negotiate to get the two pilots back? Are there two lost or unaccounted for?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. We've had this report that two of the pilots, or the crew of one plane—two planes were shot down of ours. The pilot, as you know, was rescued that landed outside of that area. Two inside. I don't have any further word except that we are attempting to negotiate their release.[26]

There have been rumors or reports of some kind of the loss of one. But we have no substantiation of that.

Q. Are we at war with Syria? Do you fear a military confrontation with Syria at this point?

THE PRESIDENT. Do we fear a military confrontation with Syria? Well, I think that's the wrong word. The question is wrong. We don't want such a thing, we don't desire it. But—and I think this will answer your question over here at the same time about if it happens again, will we fire back—we haven't fired at anyone unless it has been to return fire against attacks made upon our forces.

Yes, if our forces are attacked, we will respond. We're going to defend our personnel that is there.

Address by President Reagan, December 10, 1983 [27]

U.S. Pursuit of Peace in Lebanon

My fellow Americans, I'd like to talk to you today about the deep desire we all share to bring peace to Lebanon. These past several weeks have brought bitter tragedy and sorrow to all of us. The loss of even one of our splendid, young Americans is an enormous price to pay.

The number of dead and wounded is a terrible burden of grief for all Americans. It's unimaginably more so for the families who have lost a father, husband, a son, or a brother. Their deaths are testimony to the savage hatreds and greedy ambitions which have claimed so many innocent Lebanese lives.

The human toll in Lebanon is staggering. Lebanon's losses since 1975 would be comparable to the United States losing ten million of its citizens. What conceivable reason can there be for this wanton death and destruction?

Lebanon's suffering began long before a single Marine arrived. In the early 1970's, many thousands of Palestinians entered Lebanon. Lebanon's fragile political consensus collapsed and a savage civil war broke out.

The Palestinians also had a military—the armed PLO. Trained in terrorist tactics by Soviet-bloc nations and Libya, the PLO joined the civil war and attacked Israeli targets, villages and schools across the border, between Lebanon and Israel.

In the midst of all this, Syria was asked to intervene and stop the civil war. In the process, it occupied a large part of Lebanon. However, Syria did nothing to control terrorism against Israel's northern border. Israel decided to neutralize the PLO, and in June 1982 mounted a full-scale invasion across the border. This resulted in another major round of fighting between Syria, the PLO and Israel. Shelling and bombing pounded Beirut. Thousands more died.

We negotiated a cease-fire and then joined the multinational force at the request of the Lebanese Government to make possible the peaceful separation of the forces. This is the second time in 25 years that we have come to support the Lebanese Government in restoring peace.

In 1958, President Eisenhower used a bipartisan congressional resolution to send 8,000 American soldiers and Marines to Lebanon. [28] When order was restored, our military came home. But in 1958, there were no occupying foreign armies and there was no Soviet presence in Syria.

prisoner when their plane was shot down in an attack upon Syrian installations north of the Beirut–Damascus highway. Navy Commander Edward T. Andrews was rescued when his plane was also downed.

[28] The reference is to H.J. Res 117, P.L. 85-7, March 9, 1957; for text, see 71 Stat. 5. The Marines landed on July 15, 1958.

Today, there are more than 7,000 Soviet military advisers and technicians.

In September 1982 I offered a plan to bring peace to the region. It called for a just solution to the Palestinian problem as well as a reasonable settlement of issues between the Arab states and Israel.

Success in Lebanon is central to sustaining the broader peace process. We have vital interests in the Middle East which depend on peace and stability in that region. Indeed, the entire world has vital interests there. The region is central to the economic vitality of the Western world. If we fail in Lebanon, what happens to the prospects for peace, not just in Lebanon, but between Israel and her neighbors and in the entire Middle East?

Once internal stability is established and withdrawal of all foreign forces is assured, the Marines will leave. But because we care about human values for ourselves, so must we be concerned when freedom, justice and liberty are abused elsewhere. That is the moral basis which brought our Marines to Lebanon.

We have acted with great restraint despite repeated provocations and murderous attacks. Our reconnaissance flights have only one purpose, and the Syrians know it: to give the greatest possible protection to our troops. We will continue to do whatever is needed to ensure the safety of our forces and our reconnaissance flights.

The peace process is slow and painful, but there is progress which would not have been possible without the multinational force. Last May with our help the Governments of Lebanon and Israel negotiated an agreement providing for the withdrawal of Israeli forces. In September when the Israelis pulled back their forces from the Shuf Mountains near Beirut, Lebanese attempts to extend their authority into this area were met by violent opposition from forces supported by Syria. We will redouble our diplomatic efforts to promote reconciliation and achieve withdrawal of all foreign forces.

At a recent meeting in Geneva all the Lebanese parties agreed to recognize the present government as the legitimate representative of the Lebanese people. Talks have begun to broaden the base of the government and to satisfy the legitimate grievances of all the people.

My special envoy, Ambassador Don Rumsfeld, has returned to the region and will continue trying to move the peace process forward on all fronts. Lebanon's agony must end.

Today is the 35th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Lebanese people are struggling for their human rights. We call upon everyone involved to give that birthright back to the Lebanese.

Until next week, thanks for listening, and God bless you.

U.S. Support For the U.N. Plan To Evacuate Arafat's Forces From Tripoli

Q. Do you have anything today on the PLO evacuation, the Israeli displeasure with that, and the Israeli complaint on the U.N. flags on the evacuating vessels?

The Arabs have worked out an arrangement whereby Arafat would depart Tripoli by ship. Arafat has asked that the ships fly the U.N. flag. We went along with this decision. Report Prepared by the Departments of State and Defense, December 12, 1983 [31]

Lebanon Report on U.S. Participation in the Multinational Force

U.S. Foreign Policy Interests Served by U.S. Participation in the MNF

The Government of Lebanon (GOL) requested the return of the Multinational Force (MNF) to the Beirut area following the tragedy of Sabra/Shatilla. The presence of the MNF was requested specifically to facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area and thereby to further efforts of the Lebanese Government to assure the safety of persons in the area and to bring an end to the violence. The MNF remains in Lebanon to help provide the Lebanese Government and Lebanese communities an opportunity to reach agreement on broadening the government and to negotiate the withdrawal of foreign forces. The presence of U.S. forces is a critical part of a shared effort with our Western allies—the British, French, and Italians—in the Multinational Force. They are as committed as we to assisting the Lebanese to restore peace and stability to their country. The presence of this Multinational Force further symbolizes Western support for Lebanon's efforts not only to withstand external pressure but to enter serious negotiations with Syria on troop withdrawals. Premature withdrawal of the MNF would damage seriously the international credibility of the United States and its partners and call into question the resolve of the West to carry out its responsibilities to help the free world defend itself. Such action would certainly bring about a return to full scale hostilities in Lebanon and regional instability threatening vital U.S. interests.

Situation in Lebanon: Level of Fighting and Status of Ceasefire

On September 26, 1983, a ceasefire for the Beirut and nearby mountain areas (the Shuf) became effective among the Lebanese Government, the Druze, the Shia, and the Syrian Government. Saudi Arabia and the United States played major mediating roles in achieving this agreement. The ceasefire agreement of September relates only to the Shuf and Beirut. It does not apply to the situation in Tripoli, an area outside the purview of the MNF, in any case. On October 23, two suicide truck bombs destroyed U.S. and French MNF buildings killing almost 300 soldiers. The French Air Force responded on November 16 to the attack in an airstrike on Iranian positions in the Bekaa. The Israeli Air Force conducted a series of airstrikes against chiefly Palestinian positions in the Shuf and Bekaa in response to the November 4 truck bombing of IDF Headquarters in Sidon. On December 3, U.S. reconnaissance planes were fired on by Syrian anti-aircraft guns and surface-to-air missiles. The United States responded to this attack with airstrikes on the offending positions on December 4. These strikes were limited in nature, proportionate to the attack on our reconnaissance planes, and designed to prevent further such attacks. Our reconnaissance flights and their protection are necessary to ensure the solely on humanitarian grounds. That same day, the President of the Security Council indicated, after consultation with the members of the Council, that the Secretary-General had that body's support. Five Greek ships, escorted by French naval units, evacuated 4,000 of Arafat's forces from Tripoli on December 20, 1983. See U.N. documents S/16194, Statement by the Secretary-General at Security Council consultations held on December 3, 1983; S/16195, Statement by the President of the Security Council on December 3, 1983; and S/16228, Report of the Secretary-General in pursuance of Security Council Resolution 542 (1983), December 21, 1983.

[31] Source: Department of State files. The report was prepared by the Secretaries of State and Defense consistent with Section 4 of the Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution. The report was transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., and to the President pro tempore of the Senate, Strom Thurmond, on December 14, 1983.

safety of the MNF in Lebanon. They had no other purpose. Two aircraft were lost, one airman killed and one captured. On the same day, heavy shelling from the Shuf onto Marine positions killed eight Marines and wounded two.

There have been virtually daily violations of the September 26 ceasefire in the Shuf and Beirut areas. The Security Arrangements Committee, established by the ceasefire agreement of September, continues to meet virtually every day and attempts to resolve the disputes sparking the ceasefire violations. The level of fighting changes from day to day, depending on the degree of success of continued efforts of the Security Arrangements Committee to resolve problems. The flareups usually do not last for more than a few hours; continuous fighting has not lasted for over one day since the September 26 ceasefire. Some of the firing has been directed at Marine positions at the airport, which has been closed since December 1. It is not possible at this time to predict the duration or course of the intermittent fighting.

Responsibilities, Activities, and Composition of the MNF

Under its mandate, the MNF provides an interposition force at agreed locations, constituting a multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) in the Beirut area. This presence facilitates the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area and thereby furthers the efforts of the Lebanese Government to assure the safety of persons in the area. The MNF is not authorized to engage in combat, but may exercise the right of self-defense.

The MNF is currently composed of the following units which perform the functions indicated at the request of the Lebanese Government. Their precise functions within the MNF mission have varied over time and continue to be subject to adjustment in light of changing circumstances:

—One U.S. Marine Amphibious Unit stationed at Beirut Airport as an interposition force which also provides security forces at U.S. diplomatic facilities in Beirut;

—Two interposition Italian battalions in southwest Beirut which also help protect the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps;

—Two French battalions serving as an interposition force in and near the port of Beirut;

—One British motorized company serving as an interposition force east of the Beirut airport.

In addition, each participant in the MNF has naval and air support forces in the region.

MNF Military Casualties

The following military casualties have occurred since the MNF deployment to Beirut in September 1982:

	Killed in Action	Wounded in Action	Captured
U.S	250	121	1
Italy	2	18
France	75	56
UK	0	1

Efforts to Reduce the MNF

Our strategy to reduce and eventually eliminate the MNF begins with our diplomatic effort to encourage reconciliation among Lebanese factions, expand Lebanese Government control over the territory of Lebanon, and create circumstances that will lead to removal of all foreign troops from Lebanon. The option of replacing the MNF by another type of international peacekeeping force at an appropriate time is also being kept open. As the program of national reconciliation and extension of Lebanese governmental authority progresses, the need for a foreign multilateral presence will be reduced and the MNF can be reduced and eventually eliminated. It is still not possible to predict the duration of the presence of these forces; we will continue to assess this question in the light of progress toward the objective of national reconciliation and establishment of Lebanese Government control.

Contributions to Lebanon by MNF Members

In addition to their contributions of troops to the MNF, members of the MNF are providing military and economic assistance to Lebanon. The United States is providing $150 million in 1983/84 in economic assistance. France has offered $125 million in 1983/84, mostly in commercial credits, while Italy is providing $142 million in soft loans over the next 3–4 years. The United Kingdom has provided $3 million, but it and the others are channeling additional contributions to Lebanon through the European Economic Community. Prime Minister Craxi of Italy has proposed additional economic support for Lebanon as an incentive to rapid progress in the reconciliation process. The United States has strongly supported this initiative.

The United States is also providing $117.5 million in 1983/84 in military loans for military equipment and training as part of our concerted effort to reconstitute the LAF and make it a strong arm of the central government's authority. Reprogramming of additional funds is being contemplated. Italy is discussing the provision to Lebanon of military equipment. France has provided 30 AMX tanks, 40 APC's and 10 light helicopters.

The United States and Lebanon agreed on December 2 to establish economic and military committees to provide additional structure to our bilateral discussions on these issues.

Progress in Training Lebanese Armed Forces

Strengthening the LAF remains an essential element of our Lebanon policy. Although the LAF has not yet attained the desired level of proficiency, it performed well during the August/September combat. The LAF is at least as effective now as it was prior to the heavy fighting. Although it is impossible to be precise as to target dates, particularly in view of intermittent resumption of fighting, we believe the LAF is significantly improving its capabilities to meet its responsibilities to assist the GOL to expand its control and authority.

Programs to improve leadership at middle levels and to enhance recruitment and retention of qualified personnel are underway. The LAF has not had trouble absorbing increased equipment shipments provided by the United States and other countries. Current U.S. efforts focus on training and possible support of an expanded helicopter program. We have completed a survey of Lebanese Air Force requirements, and are considering ways to support an expanded helicopter program through pilot training and perhaps maintenance assistance. To date, the GOL has financed its substantial re-equipment program through a combination of credits and its own resources. Continued fighting in Lebanon and the scope of the program may require the GOL to seek increased credits, perhaps at concessional rates.

Progress Toward National Reconciliation

The Lebanese Reconciliation Committee, which was provided for in the September ceasefire agreement, met in Geneva under President Gemayel's chairmanship from October 31–November 5. The agenda had been prepared for the conference a week previously in a one-day meeting of representatives of the government and the factional leaders. The conferees themselves achieved an important measure of personal reconciliation at Geneva and were able to reach a compromise on the first item of the agenda, which was the Arab character of Lebanon. The conference participants also agreed on a method for excluding divisive debate on the May 17 Lebanon–Israel Agreement from the conference, permitting the conference to adjourn its first session in an atmosphere of cordiality and a sense of purpose rather than with the acrimony that was so widely predicted. It is significant that the conference left behind a subcommittee to continue discussion of internal political reforms. That subcommittee has produced a draft agreement which would form a basis for further national reconciliation efforts. President Gemayel, in his discussions in Washington on December 1 and 2, rededicated himself to making rapid progress on the important issue ensuring a wider representation of Lebanese communities in the political process.

Progress in Negotiations Toward Political Settlement

In addition to the efforts already described relating to national reconciliation, President Gemayel, in his discussions in Washington in December, agreed on the need to expand government control throughout the areas not occupied by foreign forces. He further agreed that political accommodation and negotiation would be a necessary part of this process. President Gemayel has undertaken to proceed rapidly in this direction, and the U.S. will be providing its diplomatic support and assistance to this essential goal. It was also confirmed in the Washington discussions with President Gemayel that he will pursue vigorously efforts to engage Syria in discussions to achieve Syrian troop withdrawals. Israel has already agreed to withdraw in the May 17 Lebanon–Israel Agreement. We have encouraged Lebanon to continue its discussions with Israel designed to facilitate the reestablishment of government control throughout Lebanon. Ambassador Rumsfeld, the President's new personal representative for Middle East negotiations departed for the area on December 6 for intensified discussions of issues related to a political settlement.

Explanation of the Circumstances Under Which the Marines Might Withdraw From Lebanon

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, you said last Saturday in your radio address[34] that you would keep the Marines in Lebanon until that country had internal stability. Sir, that country—respectfully—has never had internal stability. Isn't that the kind of open-ended commitment that will mean many more Marines' dying, and years and years of an American involvement there?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I think we're making more progress than appears on the surface. And the original goal was the withdrawal of the foreign forces and, then, the reinstitution of the Government of Lebanon and helping them, as we have, to train and raise a force in which they can assume control over their own territory. The multinational force, they felt, was absolutely necessary, and they still feel that way, to be able to do some maintaining of order as they would then have to move out toward their borders once the foreign forces have gone. Now, this is still the goal, still the thing that we're trying to do.

In Geneva, there was progress made where even those who were opposing each other within the country, the opposing factions, recognized the Gemayel government and agreed upon that government. Now, the thing of the multinational force, what I'm trying to say is, there are two ways in which they could be withdrawn. One of them would be if we achieve our goal. The second would be, of course, if there was such a collapse of order that it was absolutely certain that there was no solution to the problem. There would be no reason for them to stay there.

Q. Are you saying, then, that you would consider withdrawing the Marines if it appeared that the Gemayel government could not extend its authority beyond Beirut and could not create some kind of solution?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we're getting into hypotheticals now of what the situation—I'm simply saying that if there was a complete collapse and there was no possibility of restoring order, there would be no purpose in the multinational force.

Let me call to your attention that it's not just us, that all of the nations of the multinational force, within a matter of days recently, have reaffirmed their determination that the mission is sound and that we're all going to stay there.

Clarification of the U.S. Withdrawal Policy

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, last week you said that if there is complete collapse you will pull the troops out of Lebanon. [36] Did you mean that if Gemayel fails to put together a broad viable government that you would pull out, or can you clarify? And I would like to follow up.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I can clarify, Helen. [37] Actually I was asked a hypothetical question about whether there were any other circumstances other than achieving our goal by which the Marines might leave or the whole multinational force, and I tried, I guess I tried to give a hypothetical answer to that and maybe a bad choice of words.

I simply meant that the only thing I—and I don't foresee this—but the only thing I could think of, other than achieving our goal, would be if perhaps that government and the forces that he's dealing with in trying to broaden the government, if there should be a complete change of course to the place that we were no longer asked to be there, that they were going in a different direction than the one that brought us in in the first place at their request, then I suppose that would be a reason for bringing them out. But, I wasn't trying to send anyone a message or anything. I was just trying to say, well, yes, you can't say there isn't any other by which they wouldn't come out.

Q. Mr. President, you said earlier tonight that you would not send American soldiers or Marines into a situation where they could not fight back. Haven't we sent them into a role in Beirut, a political, a diplomatic role as peacekeepers where they do not have adequate safeguards against terrorism?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't know what you call, adequate safeguards against terrorists, or what we would call it. You know anytime that you—and particularly in a place like that where even innocent civilians in the street are mowed down simply because snipers want to shoot someone—it's been that kind of a scene. It's that kind of a thing that we're trying to resolve on behalf of the innocent people there who want to live in peace like the rest of us.

Sometime I'm going to impose on you and read some of the letters that I get from people in Lebanon who tell us what life would be like if the multinational force wasn't there, and what it has meant in their lives as individuals living in the midst of that kind of brutality and bloodshed. And I was under no illusion, and I have to tell you that I have discovered for myself that the hardest thing you'll ever have to do in this job is give an order that puts some of those wonderful young men and women in our military uniforms in places like that. But in the interest of our own national security and in the interest of overall peace, some of these things have to be done.

The Middle East is a tinderbox. It is the one place that could start a war that no one wanted because of its importance, particularly to the free world and to our allies. And we can't just turn away and say if we don't look, it will go away. And this all started because of our determination to try and bring about peace between those factions that have been for so long warring with each other; the moderate Arab States again and the progress that we've made. There was a refusal on their part to even acknowledge the right of Israel to exist as a nation. So therefore there could be no negotiation. Anwar Sadat, God rest his soul, broke out of that mold, and we have peace between two countries, and the territory of the Sinai has been returned to Egypt by Israel. And they are at peace with each other.

Our goal was to see if we couldn't find more leaders and more governments that would become Egypts, in a sense, in settling their disputes and having peace.

And today the very fact that there is an indication that they are willing and prepared to negotiate differences indicates that they no longer are holding that position of refusing to let Israel exist.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, within days of your inauguration in 1981, you vowed that Americans would not be held hostage again. Well, the Syrians are holding Airman Lieutenant Robert Goodman, and say they won't release him until the Marines leave Lebanon. Do you consider Lieutenant Goodman a hostage? And what efforts are underway to secure his release?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we have believed for a long time that the settlement there must be—in this whole area—must be political. And I should have said this earlier, in my answer before about the history of this Lebanese situation. But we've had Ambassadors there from Phil Habib, Ambassador McFarlane and, now, Don Rumsfeld, because we're determined that there is a possibility. And it is the only way. You cannot—this can't be settled by force. And it is going to be settled that way.

And Ambassador Rumsfeld has been in Damascus. He has met with the Syrians.[38] Certainly, that is very high on the agenda. The Syrians claim that he's a prisoner of war. Well, I don't know how you have a prisoner of war when there is no declared war between nations. I don't think that makes you eligible for the Geneva Accords.

But, yes, we want that young man back. And, as I say, we're not missing anything, any possibility in trying to bring to terms these various factions so that we can achieve the goal of restoring order, a broader-based government in Lebanon acceptable to more of the people, those that are presently hostile to this government, and the foreign forces back to their own borders.

Q. But, sir, is the Lieutenant, Goodman, in your opinion a hostage? And do you think the Syrians will use him as a bargaining chip?

THE PRESIDENT. I doubt that very much. I really do. The—in the sense of holding it up for trading something or other, no, I don't believe so.

But I'm sorry that he is there. And I'm glad he is alive. But we're going to make every effort to get him back as quickly as possible.

Statement and Remarks by President Reagan, December 27, 1983 (Extracts) [39]

Response to the Findings of the Long Commission

I received the report of the Long Commission [40] last Friday [41] and have reviewed it thoroughly. The report draws a conclusion that the United States and its military institutions are by tradition and training inadequately equipped to deal with the fundamentally new phenomenon of state-supported terrorism. I wholeheartedly agree.

The thrust of the history of this country is that we've recognized a clear distinction between being at peace with other states and being at war. We have never before faced a situation in which others routinely sponsor and facilitate acts of violence against us while hiding behind proxies and surrogates which claim—they claim they do not fully control.

Now, this problem is not unique to Lebanon. We've seen the ugly manifestation in Kuwait, [42] the terrorist bombing in Rangoon, [43] the senseless murder of Turkish diplomats, [44] the attack on the Pope, [45] the bombing of our own Capitol, [46] and on the streets of London. [47]

In the days ahead we need to systematically redevelop our approach to this problem, recognizing that the worst outcome of all is one in which terrorists succeed in transforming an open democracy into a closed fortress. Now, one fact, though, is already obvious. The problem of terrorism will not disappear if we run from it. This is not to say that we're not working as urgently as possible to create political conditions in Lebanon that will make it possible for us to remove our forces. But we must not delude ourselves into believing that terrorism will vanish on the happy day that our forces come home.

For terrorists to be curbed, civilized countries must begin a new effort to work together, to share intelligence, to improve our training and security, and our forces to deny havens or legal protection for terrorist groups, and, most important of all, to hold increasingly accountable those countries which sponsor terrorism and terrorist activity around the world.

The United States intends to be in the forefront of this effort. For the near term, corrective action is being urgently taken to insure the maximum possible security of our forces. Nearly all the measures that were identified by the distinguished members of the Commission have already implemented—or have already been implemented, I should say—and those that have not, will be very quickly.

The Commission report also notes that the mission of the Marines is extremely difficult, and with this too there can be no dispute. We recognized the fact at the beginning and we're painfully mindful of it today. But the point is that our forces have already contributed to achievements that lay the foundation for a future peace, the restoration of a central government, and the establishment of an effective national Lebanese army.

We do not expect Utopia, but I believe that we're on the verge of new progress toward national reconciliation and the withdrawal of foreign forces.

And let me finally say that I have soberly considered the Commission's word about accountability and responsibility of authorities up and down the chain of command. And, everywhere, more should be done to anticipate and prepare for dramatic terrorist assaults. We have to come to grips with the fact that today's terrorists are better armed and financed, they are more sophisticated, they are possessed by a fanatical intensity that individuals of a democratic society can only barely comprehend.

I do not believe, therefore, that the local commanders, on the ground, men who have already suffered quite enough, should be punished for not fully comprehending the nature of today's terrorist threat.

If there is to be blame, it properly rests here in this Office and with this President. And I accept responsibility for the bad as well as the good.

In this holiday season, our minds are drawn, more than ever, to the Middle East. And while the violence of this region has been the cause of much of our anguish—certainly over the recent years, it is, also, worth recalling that the three great religions of the modern world have their roots in this ancient and austere soil.

From this paradox, we can take hope. And I intend to bend every effort to ensure that those who died in this tragedy can claim as their ultimate legacy the mantle of peacemaker over this troubled and vital land.

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, do you welcome Jesse Jackson'[48] trip to Syria to try and win the release of Lieutenant Goodman?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I would like to have some better understanding of what is contemplated there, because, sometimes, efforts of this kind can be counterproductive.

We are doing everything we can, and working as completely as we can, diplomatically, to bring about his release. And it's possible that, sometimes, someone with the best of intentions could change the balance unfavorably.

Libyan Complaint Before the Security Council

Upon instruction from my country, I have the honour to request Your Excellency to call an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the deteriorating situation near the Libyan shores that could jeopardize the security and peace of the region and the world.

This situation which rose from the provocative military actions of the United

Libya's Threat to Its Neighbors

. . . . . .

MR. DONALDSON. Mr. Secretary, it's reported that the President has ordered the return of the four AWACS planes sent to Egypt. Can you tell us about that, and what is the threat at the moment from Libya toward the Sudan? [3]

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, as far as we know, the threat that was clearly present has receded. I don't want to go into all of the ins and outs of it, but I think the net of the whole thing is, as your broadcast brought out, that the President of the United States acted quickly and decisively and effectively, and at least for the moment, Khadaffi is back in his box where he belongs.

MR. DONALDSON. For the moment. What are the plans for the future? What can be done to keep Khadaffi in that box and to keep him from trying to break out again?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, of course, there is a long history of reprehensible behavior on the part of Khadaffi. Perhaps you remember the murders in the Munich Olympics and who harbored and gave asylum to those who conducted the murders, and this is just one among a great many things that he has done, both in terms of destabilizing his neighbors and in various other ways.

So I expect that he will continue to cause trouble, and our approach, I think, is to let him see that his options are limited and we know what's going on and to conduct ourselves accordingly.

MR. DONALDSON. Well, you say his options are limited. Is one of the lessons the President wants out this week that Khadaffi will not be allowed to cause trouble? Are you really serving notice to Khadaffi in Libya that he's not to try to destabilize his neighbors?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, we certainly oppose these destabilization efforts, have consistently over a period of several administrations, and will continue to do so. I think that it's apparent that Khadaffi's actions are not at all appreciated by his neighbors. After all, it's interesting that the OAU meeting under his leadership never took place. Why? Not because of us, but because of the attitude of his neighbors toward him and his behavior.

MR. BRINKLEY. Mr. Secretary, your Assistant Secretary for African Affairs has an essay or an article published today in which he says Khadaffi is trying to destabilize about half the countries in North Africa. That could keep us pretty busy if we are going to try to contain him.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I think the fact of the matter is that people are pretty well onto him, and it isn't that we have to do everything; other people, too, have identified the nature of the problem he presents, and so I think that he has been pretty well contained and he'll continue to be so, and it isn't just the United States that's involved or aware.

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) Before the U.N. Security Council, February 22, 1983 [4]

U.S. Rejection of the "False and Malicious Charges" of the Libyan Government

Mr. President, I have, today, addressed the following letter to you for circulation as an official document in the Security Council:

"The Government of the United States rejects the false and malicious charges of the government of Libya and calls the attention of the Council to yet another example of a threat to international peace and security posed by the policies of the Libyan Government.

"Furious that its plans for illegal, violent action were frustrated, the Government of Libya comes now to the Security Council with lying complaints against the United States. In fact, the United States committed none of the acts charged by the Government of Libya.

"The United States dispatched no offensive aircraft into the region, violated no Libyan airspace. As a matter of fact, neither the U.S. Carrier Nimitz nor its aircraft entered waters or airspace claimed by Libya on the days in question, although we have every right to enter these international waters, recognized as such under international law. We also have every right to conduct, under appropriate circumstances, training exercises with friendly governments.

"The United States affirms its rights under international law and the Charter of the United Nations and intends to exercise them.

"Naturally, the Government of Libya would prefer that no obstacles—however legal—be interposed to its plots and expansionist projects. But peace-loving nations cannot accommodate Libya's designs on its neighbors.

"In calling attention to Libya's false charges, the United States notes that such lies mock the serious work of building international peace, just as Libya's repeated efforts to interfere in the affairs of its neighbors destroys security in the region."

Mr. President, the United States did not seek this confrontation in the U.N. Security Council with the Government of Libya, but we welcome the opportunity thus presented to put facts on the record (not the fabrications of Colonel Qadhafi's spokesman) and to assign responsibility for this grave threat to international peace and security where that responsibility belongs.

I speak, of course, of the Government of Qadhafi's Libya. And I wish to put this threat, which seems for the moment to have receded, in the context of Libyan-sponsored worldwide terrorism and adventurism directed against its neighbors—indeed, throughout northern, eastern, and central Africa. This pattern of lawless expansionism constitutes a continuing threat to the peace and security in the region and beyond.

My government and the American people have never sought, and do not now seek any confrontation with the government or people of Libya. We have never engaged, and do not now engage in any acts of provocation. But we are deeply sensitive to threats to international peace, to our own security, and to the security and national independence of Libya's neighbors. And let there be no doubt: we will respond as appropriate to Libyan threats.

Briefly, I wish to recall the salient events that led to this situation.

Last Friday, February 18, official Sudanese radio announced the discovery of a Libyan-backed coup plot against the government of President Jaaffir Nimeiri. It announced the apprehension of Libyan-sponsored dissidents and infiltrators. It also reported that the Government of Sudan had been closely watching concentrations of Libyan bombers and fighters in southeast Libya close to the Sudanese and Egyptian borders.

---

[4] Source: U.S. Mission to the United Nations Press Release 13-(82), February 22, 1983. The Security Council met on February 22 and 23, 1983, to consider the Libyan complaint, but took no action on it.

This concentration of Libyan aircraft had been of particular concern to the Sudanese. In view of the successful steps which the Sudan has now taken to deal with this latest Libyan effort to destabilize one of its neighbors, we are now able to put the spotlight of world attention on events in the region.

We follow Qadhafi's irresponsible incursions into the affairs of his neighbors closely and with deep concern. We have been aware for some time of his efforts directed against President Nimeiri. We were also aware of the concentrations of Libyan aircraft which were of concern to the Sudanese and Egyptians. Because of the situation, we moved up the date of an AWACS training exercise which had already been scheduled about a month hence, and sent our AWACS and tanker aircraft into Egypt. We have also had U.S. naval forces deployed in the eastern Mediterranean. Their presence in international waters sometimes seems to have a deterring effect on Libyan adventurism in the region.

The desired result seems to have been achieved at least for the present. The statement on Sudanese radio, and yesterday's statement by the Sudanese Assembly, speak for themselves. We can be reassured by the bold and decisive manner in which the Sudanese dealt with the threat of Libyan expansionism.

Fortunately, Mr. President, the most recent threat has receded. But the pattern of Libyan misconduct is longstanding.

Colonel Qadhafi conducts a virulent, hostile foreign policy which respects the territorial integrity, national independence, right to peace and security and self-determination of no one. Because of a relative lack of conventional military power, Colonel Qadhafi has tried to accomplish his goals through a combination of economic and military aid to radical governments; bribery of officials; help to international terrorists by providing sanctuary, funds, weapons, planning; assassination of exiled opponents, and planned assassination of target-government officials; and assistance to guerrilla groups working to overthrow established governments.

The Qadhafi regime has been engaged in these activities almost since it took power. For example, in 1972, Libya provided sanctuary to the perpetrators of the Munich Olympics murders. Qadhafi also gave refuge to the terrorists who held hostages at the 1975 Vienna OPEC meeting. Libya has been used as a "safe" area in which terrorist groups have planned acts to be committed in many of Europe's capitals. The infamous "Carlos" has operated out of Libya over several years. The weapons found on the French terrorists Breguet and Kopp had been sold to the Libyan Army. It was their release which Carlos demanded.

Assassination has been an important Libyan tool, and the proof of Libya's utilization of this tool is not hard to come by. The 1980–81 murders of a dozen exiled Libyans, primarily in Western European capitals, have been reported by the international press in detail. Less widely known are a 1975 plot to murder the Prime Minister of a neighboring country; plans to kill American Ambassadors in several Middle Eastern countries and at least one European capital; and a November 1981 attempt to plant explosives in the American Embassy Club in Khartoum, which explosives were concealed in stereo speakers designed to detonate on a Saturday evening when scores of people would have been present and killed.

A major facet of Libyan foreign policy has been and remains subversion and destabilization of independent governments in the Middle East, Africa and elsewhere. Chad has been a recent principal victim of the aggressive policy of Libya. Currently, Libyan intentions toward Chad are a major concern. Colonel Qadhafi has brought large numbers of Chadian followers to Libya, trained and equipped them and is moving them into the northern parts of Chad. Other efforts to increase its own strength in that area are underway. Most disturbing was the mid-January deployment of a dozen Libyan SU–22 ground-attack fighters to the Aouzou Airbase in northern Chad, apparently in preparation of a Libyan option to provide air cover to an assault by dissidents and infiltrators against the Chadian Government and Chadian-held population centers. A Libyan team of approximately 80 "advisers" in another African republic may be assisting anti-government Chadians there. Libya has a long record of training guerrillas, supplying weapons, plotting subversion and destabilization of its North African neighbors.

In the Horn of Africa, Libya continues to try to overthrow the governments of Sudan and Somalia. A number of Libyans are in Ethiopia advising Somali and Sudanese guerrillas. Libyan aircraft and ships continue to train guerrillas and to supply arms, ammunition, explosives and matériel to the Somali Salvation Front and to Sudanese rebels. Also, Libya's deliveries of increasingly advanced weapons to warring tribes in the Sudan have contributed to death and violence in that region.

Elsewhere, Libya delivers military equipment and is involving itself increasingly, for example, in this hemisphere, always on behalf of military dictatorships, always opposed to democratic regimes and movements.

Mr. President, that is the pattern of Libyan misconduct, worldwide. It constitutes, as I have said, a grave threat to international peace and security. The culprit in this proceeding is identified beyond any reasonable doubt or question.

Mr. President, what has happened to Libya may happen to other states, the representative of Libya has suggested. I should like to say that we hope so. We hope that what happened to Libya will happen to other states. We hope that all states with aggressive designs on their neighbors will be discouraged by the lawful response of others and thus to desist in their unlawful plans. My government rests its case on the factual record—and its adherence to the principles of the U.N. Charter, in the cause of international peace and security.

Thank you.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Schneider) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, April 28, 1983 (Extract) [5]

U.S. Policy Toward Libya

. . . . . .

Libya. Thus far in this statement, I have discussed our ties to Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia. But there is another player on the North African Littoral—Qadhafi's Libya—to which I shall now briefly turn.

Our relations with Libya are poor. We regret this and look forward to the day of their improvement, which we desire. Our differences with Libya are not primarily bilateral. They result from Tripoli's actions in support of international lawlessness, terrorism, and subversion. The Brazilian intercept of a Libyan arms shipment to Central America is the most current example. The steps we have taken bilaterally regarding Libya—for example, export controls, prohibition against importing Libyan crude oil into the United States and passport invalidation—are fundamentally defensive. They are the direct result of Qadhafi's misuse for subversive ends of the money he earned here with Libyan oil and of the threat Libyan policies pose to the safety of U.S. citizens in Libya.

The United States has strong interests in a stable, viable international system. It is these interests which Libya's policies attack on all fronts. I shall not take the time of this committee to recite yet again the long list of Libyan misdeeds with which you are only too familiar. I do want to affirm, however, that beyond the latest example already cited, Qadhafi's aborted attempt in February to overthrow the Government of Sudan was very real and that this administration is proud to have been able to make a timely and effective contribution to Sudan's defense.

Unfortunately, these destructive Libyan policies have not changed. They contribute notably to the problems of North Africa, the Sahel, the Horn of Africa, and beyond. The day Tripoli abandons them and rejoins the international system, we shall be found ready to improve relations with it.

Proclamation by President Reagan, December 22, 1983 [6]

Imports of Petroleum and Petroleum Products

The Secretary of Energy has advised me that no purpose is currently served by the existing system of licensing of imports of petroleum and petroleum products. The Secretary of Energy also recommends that I retain the current prohibition on imports of Libyan crude oil into the United States, its territories and possessions, which was adopted in Proclamation No. 4907, [7] on the ground that such imports would be inimical to the United States national security. The Secretary further recommends that he continue to monitor imports of petroleum and petroleum products in order to be able to advise me as to the need for further action, as appropriate, under Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, as amended. [8]

I agree with the recommendations of the Secretary of Energy.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, RONALD REAGAN, President of the United States of America, by the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, as amended (19 U.S.C. 1862), do hereby proclaim that:

Section 1. Proclamation No. 3279, [9] as amended, is revoked.

Sec. 2. The Secretary of Energy shall continue to monitor imports of petroleum and petroleum products and shall, from time to time, in consultation with the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and such other federal agencies as he deems appropriate, review the status of such imports with respect to the national security. The Secretary shall inform the President of any circumstances which in his opinion might indicate the need for further action by the President under Section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act.

Sec. 3. (a). No crude oil produced in Libya may be imported into the United States, its territories or possessions.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury may issue such regulations and interpretations as he deems necessary to implement this section.

Sec. 4. The Secretary of Energy may continue to consider requests for refund of fees paid under Proclamation No. 3279, as amended, if such requests were filed with the Secretary prior to the effective date of this Proclamation. Any such requests shall be considered in accordance with the previously applicable provisions of Proclamation No. 3279, as amended, and implementing regulations thereunder.

Sec. 5. The revocation of Proclamation No. 3279, as amended, shall not affect the authority of any federal department or agency to institute and conduct any administrative, civil or criminal audit, investigation or proceeding based on any act committed or liability incurred while that Proclamation was in effect.

Sec. 6. The revocation of Proclamation No. 3279, as amended, shall not affect the presently applicable tariff rates for imports of petroleum and petroleum products, as reflected in the Tariff Schedules of the United States, Schedule 4, part 10.

Sec. 7. This Proclamation shall be effective immediately.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-second day of December, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and eighth.

Chapter 12. South Asia

A. Regional Policies and Developments

Document 401

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Schaffer) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, April 27, 1983 [1]

Foreign Assistance Request for South Asian Countries in Fiscal Year 1984 and Supplemental Request for Pakistan in Fiscal Year 1983

I am pleased to have the opportunity to appear before the Committee to explain the administration's proposed foreign assistance program for South Asian countries in FY 1984 and the request for supplemental assistance for Pakistan in FY 1983.

U.S. economic and security assistance to these countries serves several broad and interrelated purposes. They revolve around a core of fostering orderly progress in the region. Our development assistance has helped sustain and enhance the relatively high level of political stability in South Asia, stability which is dependent on and conducive to continued economic growth. Our assistance to Pakistan reflects its position as a frontline state resisting Soviet expansionism which threatens the entire region.

Let me now turn individually to the countries of South Asia:

Pakistan. A strong and secure Pakistan is a key element in our policy of promoting peace and stability in the Southwest Asia/South Asia region. A stable Pakistan, one of the world's largest Islamic states, can serve as an anchor to this strategically vital area. Pakistan has been crucial to efforts to prevent the Soviets from consolidating their position in Afghanistan and to bring about their eventual withdrawal. Our assistance programs there, which both bolster Pakistan's economic development and security and symbolize firm U.S. support for the country, have been vital in making it possible for Pakistan to adopt and maintain its courageous posture on Afghanistan despite Moscow's pressure.

Our assistance program is also designed to meet additional goals in our relationship with Pakistan. We believe that a program of support which enhances Pakistan's sense of security may help remove the principal underlying incentive for the acquisition of a nuclear weapons capability. In addition, our program of economic assistance also supports the Pakistan Government's efforts to suppress opium poppy production and contributes to the economic development and political stability of the country.

The Reagan administration, like the Carter administration before it, has specifically reaffirmed the continued applicability of the 1959 Agreement of Cooperation between the United States and Pakistan [2] to underline our commitment to support Pakistan's security and territorial integrity. The 1959 Agreement commits the United States to take "such appropriate action" as may be mutually agreed upon with Pakistan in the event of communist aggression. Our commitment is given both real and symbolic shape through our 6-year program of security and economic assistance and through our willingness to contribute to Pakistan's military modernization program.

Schaffer prepared this statement for the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations and Related Agencies.

[2] For text of the Agreement of Cooperation between the United States and Pakistan, signed at Ankara, March 5, 1959, see 10 UST 317.

On the economic side, Pakistan's need for quick disbursing balance of payments and project aid is being met through our ESF program. In project assistance, the emphasis is on health care and family planning, agriculture and rural development, and narcotics control. Emphasis has also been placed on locating development projects in Pakistan's two most underdeveloped provinces, the Northwest Frontier Province and Baluchistan. Our projects for the most part span the life of the 6-year agreement. [3] For FY 1984 we are proposing for Pakistan $225 million in Economic Support Funds, $300 million in FMS, $57.4 million in PL 480, and $800,000 in IMET.

As you know, the administration was unable to provide the targeted level of FMS guaranteed loan assistance to Pakistan out of the second Continuing Resolution for FY 1983. [4] For that reason, we have requested an additional $75 million in FMS loan guarantees in our supplemental request. We believe that it is important that we make every effort to provide assistance at the agreed upon levels for two reasons.

First, on the basis of our 1981 understanding, the Pakistanis have undertaken obligations to U.S. defense contractors which, in FY 1983 alone, are in excess of $550 million. Second, a significant shortfall at such an early stage of our program would make more difficult our effort to build a credible relationship with the Government of Pakistan, a relationship we require if we are to accomplish our overall strategic objectives.

We recognize that the military modernization program being undertaken by Pakistan will improve the capability of Pakistani forces to meet perceived threats from all directions. Given the lingering suspicions on both sides of Pakistan's border with India, some feared that the modernization program could exacerbate tensions between the two countries and damage our own relations with India, notwithstanding our assessment that our assistance to Pakistan will not change to any significant degree the military balance between it and India. We have been gratified, therefore, that both Pakistan and India have been actively seeking to improve their bilateral relationship, and that Indo-U.S. ties have also become stronger over the past year.

India. During the past 2 years, the Indian leadership has begun to turn toward a more open, liberalized, and private sector orientation for the economy. Capitalizing on its sound credit rating, India has begun to borrow significantly on the commercial markets. With the assistance of a $5.7 billion IMF program, the Government is undertaking structural adjustment to improve its balance of payments situation, adjustment that includes more liberal import policies.

The administration attaches great importance to maintaining constructive relations with India and has sought ways to expand its dialogue with India and to work together more closely. Along with U.S. contributions to the World Bank, our aid program helps demonstrate our commitment to India's development. But foreign assistance comprises only one aspect of the multifaceted reflection of U.S. interests in India. Our trade relationship, for example, is of increasing significance to both countries. In response to a more attractive business climate in India and India's desire for industrial technology which we can provide, the administration and the Government of India are encouraging U.S. firms to take advantage of business opportunities there. The recent OPIC Mission to India has already resulted in plans for a dozen new joint ventures. [5]

Our proposed program for India in FY 1984 of $86 million in Development Assistance, $123 million in PL 480 Title II and $200,000 in IMET will continue to concentrate on agriculture, particularly irrigation, and nutrition. Perhaps the greatest achievement of our assistance program has been in the agriculture sector, which provides a livelihood for the vast majority of Indians and accounts for 40% of GNP. The United States in the mid-1960s helped India bring about its Green Revolution, which remarkably has resulted in near self-sufficiency in foodgrains today. As was demonstrated again last year when in the face of a bad monsoon India purchased commercially four million tons of U.S. wheat to replenish stocks, the food balance depends precariously on the vagaries of weather. By helping to expand and improve the irrigation system, we contribute to India's abiljty to produce enough food for its population, which continues to grow at a disappointingly high rate.

Bangladesh. Constituting approximately 10% of total foreign assistance to Bangladesh, U.S. bilateral aid continues to act as a catalyst in attracting foreign assistance from other donors. U.S. food and development assistance to Bangladesh has from the outset been designed to benefit a wide spectrum of the population. U.S. support of the Bangladesh Government's development strategy in such fields as family planning, agriculture, and rural development, is broad-based and aims at helping the rural poor who comprise the vast majority of the population. The people and Government of Bangladesh have by necessity placed great value on continued food and development assistance from the United States and other countries. Given the sheer magnitude of its needs and the ever-present population pressures upon its limited resources, one can only conclude that Bangladesh will not be able to dispense with foreign assistance within the foreseeable future.

Bangladesh has achieved a dramatic 43% increase in foodgrain production over the past decade and has established a viable foodgrain security system. On the other hand, one must note with disappointment that this often-ignored increase in foodgrain production has been offset by continued population growth.

U.S. and other donor assistance has encouraged Bangladesh's gradual transition from the statist economic philosophy which characterized the first five years of independence after 1971 to the present mixed economy approach which actively promotes expanded private sector participation in the development process. Gradually changing over the past decade from humanitarian relief to development assistance, U.S. economic aid to Bangladesh constitutes the major means by which we can further our two primary interests in that country: Economic development and political stability. Our proposed program for FY 1984 of $77 million in Development Assistance and $93 million in PL 480 is focussed on four major objectives: Encouraging family planning, increasing foodgrain production, generating rural employment, and augmenting the productivity of energy resources. In addition, the proposed $225,000 IMET program will both provide needed military skills and expose Bangladeshi officers to Western social and political values.

Sri Lanka. Since 1977, under the leadership of President Jayewardene, Sri Lanka has sought to use the dynamism of the private sector to accelerate economic development after years of virtual economic stagnation. We have applauded the Government's political courage in seeking to meet economic goals through market-oriented economic policies. These include: removing government controls, stimulating the private sector, providing production and investment incentives, reducing consumer subsidies, and encouraging foreign investment. With these policies and despite the world recession, deteriorating terms of trade, and the shock of higher oil prices, Sri Lanka has in recent years maintained an impressive rate of economic growth, has reduced unemployment, and has increased economic opportunity for its citizens. The reelection of President Jayewardene in October is widely interpreted as popular endorsement of his pragmatic, growth-oriented policies.

In the past 6 years the Sri Lankan Government has taken bold measures to reduce the welfare aspects of the country's economy, a politically difficult policy. To sustain support despite these measures and maintain popular backing for its market approach, it has had to demonstrate an ability to step up economic growth. Foreign aid makes a vital contribution to its ability to do this. It helps make possible the expansion of the economy, generation of employment, and opening of new lands for resettlement and development. Additionally, development projects undertaken with foreign assistance encourage the growth of private industry—e.g., construction—and demand for goods and services.

For FY 1984 we are proposing for Sri Lanka $40.3 million in Development Assistance, $31 million in PL 480, and $150.000 in IMET. Our assistance promotes our foreign policy objectives by creating an environment favorable to constructive and moderate policies, both foreign and domestic.

Nepal. U.S. economic assistance helps foster the development essential to preservation of Nepal's historic role as a stable independent state between India and China. During the more than 30 years of aid to Nepal, the U.S. focus has shifted from development of an elementary transportation infrastructure and education system to the current three core projects in resource conservation and utilization, integrated rural development and family planning/rural health care. These reflect shifts in the Government of Nepal's priorities, as well as successful completion of earlier projects.

For FY 1984 we are proposing for Nepal $13.5 million in Development Assistance, $1.5 million in PL 480 Title II for the World Food Program, and $95,000 in IMET. In addition, we are proposing a Special Foreign Currency appropriation of $1.1 million equivalent in excess Indian rupees for training and institutional development. These have been major emphases of U.S. programs and are now paying important dividends as the Government of Nepal plans and implements its development program. Nepal, however, is faced by continuing and severe constraints. The most notable are the destruction of forests and consequent ecological degradation, high population growth levels, and disappointing results to date from efforts to achieve real increases in agriculture.

In conclusion, I believe that we can take satisfaction from the achievements of the nations of South Asia and in the contribution our assistance has made in helping them tackle the enormous challenges they face. In this regard, these nations deserve our continuing support.

Statement by the U.S. Representative (Adamson) in the U.N. General Assembly Ad Hoc Committee on the Indian Ocean, July 22, 1983 (Extract) [6]

The Indian Ocean As a Zone of Peace

. . . . . .

My remarks today will be divided into essentially three parts. First, I should like to comment on document A/AC.159/L.51 placed before the committee by the distinguished representative of the Soviet Union. Second, I should like to address a subject that once again has figured prominently in our deliberations, namely the question of an Indian Ocean conference. Third, I should like to make some final observations on our work during this session and our work in the future.

The U.S. delegation has noted with interest document A/AC.159/L.51 introduced by the distinguished representative of the Soviet Union during our meetings this year and containing a three paragraph excerpt from Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko's address to the UNGA last fall. [7] We should like carefully to examine the Soviet statement, for it says much about the Soviet Union's approach to this committee's work. In doing so we are motivated in part as well by your suggestion, Mr. Chairman, [8] that delegations address doc-

General Assembly Resolution 2992 (XXVII) of December 15, 1972. As of July 1983 it consisted of 47 members (including the United States).

[7] U.N. document A/AC.159/L.51, February 1, 1983, contained three paragraphs on military activities in the Indian Ocean from the address by Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko before the U.N. General Assembly on October 1, 1982, which Soviet Representative Lev I. Mendelevich submitted to the Ad Hoc Committee on the Indian Ocean on January 31, 1983. uments other than those they themselves are associated with. Our comments will, we hope, also contribute to the eventual harmonization of views on fundamental issues related to a zone of peace that is so clearly required if this committee is to advance.

Turning now to document L.51, I should point out, first, that the excerpt says that the U.S.S.R. "can well understand the legitimate concern of the coastal states of the Indian Ocean over the expansion of the U.S. military presence there (emphasis added)." The word "coastal" would seem to exclude the hinterland states of the Indian Ocean, and for good reason from the Soviet point of view. The U.S.S.R. no doubt avoided reference to the hinterland because it would call attention to the Soviet military occupation of Afghanistan, recognized in the documentation of the committee as a hinterland state of the region. This selective use of the word "coastal" by the Soviet Union is thus employed to obscure the fact that the demonstrated threat to the security of the region comes from the Soviet Union, notably from its land-based forces.

Now, as regards the alleged expansion of U.S. military presence, I would state the obvious. All U.S. military activities in the region are fully consistent with the principles and purposes of the U.N. Charter, in particular article 51.[9] There is a clear distinction between naval forces deployed in conformity with normal international practices and land-based forces occupying a hinterland state of the Indian Ocean in violation of the most basic tenets of international behavior. I would add that changing international circumstances—notably the remarkable increase in Soviet expansionist activities in the region—were the primary factors which eventually forced the United States, however reluctantly, to assume a greater military role in the Indian Ocean area. It was these same Soviet activities that undermined the Soviet-American bilaterals of 1977–78,[10] which commenced at U.S. initiative.[11] We have made no secret of our naval deployments to the area, nor have we sought to conceal the fact that our relationships with many states have been deepened and strengthened in reaction to the increase in Soviet expansionist tendencies. To be more specific, I should note as we have before, that United States military personnel in the littoral and hinterland states of the region as defined in GA Resolution 33/68[12] in all capacities—peacekeeping contingents in the multilateral force and observers organization, all personnal at Diego Garcia, U.S. Marines providing security to our embassies in the region, U.S. defense attachés attached to our embassies, and military personnel assigned to administer security assistance programs with countries of the region—represent a minuscule fraction of less than 4% of the 135,000 Soviet troops currently committed to Afghanistan alone. It is obvious that none of these U.S. personnel are combat personnel.

Second, the Soviet statement accuses the United States of "thwarting the implementation of U.N. resolutions" on the matter of turning the Indian Ocean into a zone of peace. We have heard similar charges and innuendo from the Soviet delegation during this session. In this connection, I note the remarks of Vice President Bush when he addressed the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva on February 4, remarks which apply aptly to the attitude governing United States participation in the work of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Indian Ocean. He said that "the United States will do all that it can to create a foundation for enduring world Charter reads as follows: "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defense shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security." peace . . . but we will not hesitate, nor should we, to differ with approaches that are not sound . . . ." [13] Mr. Chairman, we have made known on a number of occasions, and will do so again today, our serious reservations about attending a conference to implement a zone of peace regime which is based on a faulty and obsolete concept—and at a time when Soviet forces continue to occupy Afghanistan in violation of international law and the most basic norms of international behavior. Far from thwarting the aims of the Committee, Mr. Chairman, the United States continues its participation in the work of the Ad Hoc Committee in a spirit of contributing to the creation of a viable zone of peace in the regime [region].

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I would like to recall that when voted upon in 1971, Resolution 2832 was supported by only 53 percent of the membership of the General Assembly, by a vote of 61 for, 0 against, and 55 abstentions. [14] Undeniably that vote reflected, and the debate record shows, that many nations had serious reservations about that resolution. The record of the United Nations relating to votes over the last three years on resolutions pertaining to the Soviet invasion and occupation of Afghanistan shows a much broader pattern of support among member states. The voting margins have remained consistently huge; last November 29 the vote on Resolution 37/37 was 114–21–14. [15] Yet it is none other then the Soviet Union itself which is thwarting the implementation of those resolutions.

Third, Mr. Chairman, in the first sentence of the third paragraph of the excerpt, the Soviet Foreign Minister calls "upon all states whose ships use the waters of the Indian Ocean to refrain from any steps that could complicate the situation in that region . . . ." Again, Mr. Chairman, and for good reason from the Soviet point of view, there is not a mention of calling upon those states who maintain large land-based military forces in the region to refrain from activities that would complicate the situation. About what situation are the Soviets so concerned to prevent complication, Mr. Chairman? Why, surely, it is the ability of the Soviet Union to project its military power into the region that Moscow does not want to see "complicated" in any way. For if we return to the world of reality rather than the picture of the world that the Soviet representative in this committee paints, we know that above all else, it is the projection of Soviet power into the area and notably the Soviet invasion and occupation of Afghanistan that has "complicated the situation" in the region, and, indeed, in the world.

Fourth, again in the third paragraph, the Soviet Foreign Minister calls upon states whose ships use the Indian Ocean to limit naval formations and not to hold military exercises there. Here again we see a Soviet emphasis on the high seas rather than land areas, in complete contradiction to the fact that the demonstrated threat to the region comes from the north, not the south, and from the land, not the sea. How self-serving, Mr. Chairman, for the Soviet Union to call for an end to military exercises in the Indian Ocean by stating that they would "complicate the situation." I might note in passing that this Soviet emphasis on the high seas rather than on land areas, in particular the hinterland, also suggests—contrary to the Soviet representative's contention yesterday—that there is still no consensus among us on the geographic scope of a zone of peace. [16]

The military exercises of the United States in the Indian Ocean region are limited in scope and are accomplished in full accord with international law and accepted norms of international behavior. Far from being designed to intimidate any littoral or hinterland state, the exercises are limited joint training exercises fully agreed to by the states participating. The only "situation" these exercises could conceivably "complicate", Mr. Chairman, are Soviet intentions to expand their military activities in the region unopposed.

Mr. Chairman, the Soviet call for limits on maneuvers in the region is coupled with a call for limits on the modernization of military facilities in the area. These are cynical devices which would allow the U.S.S.R. to make cosmetic concessions while limiting the capability of regional states for self-defense and preventing other states from maintaining a defensive military presence in the area—a presence that is imperative in light of the substantial and increasing Soviet land-based forces in close proximity to the Indian Ocean. We believe that the situation in the region will be improved not by such one-sided proposals but by agreement to conduct military activity only in conformity with international law and practice, respecting the sovereignty of regional states. This implies first and foremost a Soviet withdrawal of its troops from Afghanistan.

[16] The Soviet Representative apparently spoke at an informal meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Indian Ocean; there is no public record of a meeting on that date.

It is clear, then, after examination of the Soviet text that it is carefully worded to divert the attention of the committee from Soviet activities in the Indian Ocean region; the same could be said of Soviet statements during the present session.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to turn in greater detail to the views of my delegation on the advisability of convening a conference on the Indian Ocean in 1984.

The United States is deeply concerned that various conflicts in the Indian Ocean region have prevented the people of the region from fulfilling their profound desire for peace, security, and an environment in which they can pursue the most important things in life. We understand the view of some delegations in this committee that because the security situation in the Indian Ocean area is unsettled due to the situation in Afghanistan and other longstanding and unresolved conflicts in the region, a conference must be urgently convened to deal with the situation. For our part, we share the urgent desire of these delegations to find some way to resolve these particular conflicts promptly, and we are prepared to take all possible, constructive steps to that end. But we firmly believe that it is unrealistic to hope at this stage in our deliberations that an Indian Ocean conference, or a series of such conferences, could succeed in resolving the regional conflicts cited above, or in reaching general agreement on a zone of peace in the region.

By way of summing up on this point, I should note that Resolution 37/96 rightly underscores the necessity of work—in this committee, which is the appropriate forum—"on the necessary harmonization of views on the relevant issues" as a prelude to a conference.[17] It also emphasizes that the political and security climate in the Indian Ocean area bears importantly on the question of the early convening of the conference, and that the easing of tension in the area would enhance the prospect of success being achieved by the conference. These desiderata of the resolution simply indicate what would be required objectively, for a successful conference. And once these desiderata were met, the organizational and procedural preparations for a conference no doubt could be accomplished with dispatch. At the present stage, however, such preparations are plainly premature.

I should like to add a word here about the nature of this committee. I will be addressing themes already trenchantly developed today by several nonaligned delegations. Over the past year—indeed over the past several years—we have heard charges about "vicious circles" and "killing the committee." But as my remarks today and previously have I trust suggested, we believe the Committee has potentially important work to do. I will be elaborating on that in a moment. But allow me to say now that if the committee has at times been reduced to a vicious circle, if at times it has appeared dead, the blame for this attaches to none other than those who at every turn resist having the committee do serious substantive work in developing a commonly acceptable zone of peace concept. Whenever the committee has been on the verge of making headway in this direction, these delegations have thrown down obstacles in the committee's path. They have sought to turn the committee into a backwater that will focus on tangential matters; they have said that the committee itself is ill-equipped to negotiate a commonly acceptable zone of peace regime. We therefore believe that these delegations would do well to look in the mirror before leveling the charges I have alluded to. But we are nonetheless not without optimism. We take heart for example from the statement this afternoon by the distinguished representative of Pakistan, and I should like to thank him for the kind words he directed to me.[18] As I am about to describe, we think the committee has the possibility of productive work ahead. We cannot believe that a few delegations will forever keep us from turning to that work.

Coming now to the third part of my remarks, I should like to make some final observations on our work during this session and our work in the future. During this session, we have had some useful discussion, although the usual polemics have at times emanated from familiar quarters. Regrettably we have not been able to reach agreement on our report and notably on the recommendation to be included therein, although serious efforts have been made by delegations to make progress in these areas.

In the final analysis, we do not believe that agreement on most elements of our report should be difficult. As to the draft resolution which is to be embodied therein, I do not wish to take up the committee's time by repeating all the comments I made during our informal meeting on the afternoon of July 20.[19] However, I would like to repeat our thanks to the nonaligned delegations for having presented us with L.57[20] and to affirm again that we look forward to working with all committee members in developing a consensus resolution text as the basis for the committee's future work. I should as well like to reiterate our view that that consensus resolution should note the varied and generally useful exchange of views we have had in the committee; that it should also note the constructive efforts that have been made toward harmonizing differing approaches on fundamental issues, though much remains to be resolved; that it should request continuing efforts to achieve the necessary harmonization of views; and that it should urge that every effort be made, taking into account the foregoing and the evolution of the political and security climate, to accomplish the necessary conference preparatory work.

Success for an Indian Ocean conference, or a series of such conferences, requires that we must reach agreement on the fundamental principles which would underlie a zone of peace. In the absence of such agreement, nothing of substance could be accomplished and we all must recognize—as my comments on L.51 just suggested—that we have not reached such agreement despite efforts of delegations in this committee. No ingenious format for further conferences or conference work, would be able to conceal this basic lack of agreement. Indeed, without arriving at basic understandings in advance here in this committee, a conference would produce only further acrimony and contention at the expense of the goals of peace and security. It would be a step backward.

Moreover, it has been clear from the debate in the committee and from such documents as L.51 that some members wish to use a conference as a means of promoting solutions to regional problems which are not solutions at all and that these same members and others clearly wish to use a conference to impose security doctrines on which no agreement exists.

With respect to the utility of a conference to address and resolve regional conflicts, let us take the case of Afghanistan. It would of course be a giant step forward toward peace if a conference on the Indian Ocean could be used to bring about a withdrawal of Soviet troops which now occupy Afghanistan. Unfortunately, given the current attitude of the Soviet Union, there is no reason to believe that a conference on the Indian Ocean would achieve that goal. Frankly, in the absence of terms of reference based on the relevant UNGA resolutions the U.S.S.R. surely would use the conference as just another opportunity to pursue its own distorted version of events in Afghanistan designed to legitimize its presence there, and to distract attention from its international obligations and the condemnation it has earned from the international community.

We have said before that trust and good faith are needed to make genuine progress toward resolving security problems in the Indian Ocean region, including Afghanistan. Until the Soviet Union alters its policy in Afghanistan, there can be scarcely any trust and little prospect of moving forward to consummate agreement on broader regional issues. To attempt to do so by holding a conference which ignores the reality of Afghanistan, would only reinforce the status quo there and would represent a further setback to security in the region.

In regard to the Afghanistan crisis, I should like to affirm our support for the efforts of the Secretary-General's representative [21] to find a political solution consistent with international law and the inalienable rights of the Afghan people. In that connection, as President Reagan has suggested, we ask for deeds, not just words, from the Soviet Union.

I have noted that some delegations wish to use a conference or series of conferences on the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace to promote or impose security doctrines—specifically, the great power naval doctrine reflected in elements of resolution 2832—on which fundamental disagreement exists within this committee. For obvious reasons, to which I alluded during my discussion of L.51, the Soviet Union is a fervent advocate of a conference that would implement some version of the 1971 resolution. To do so would only enhance the military position of the U.S.S.R. derived from its military presence in Afghanistan and adjacent areas in Soviet Central Asia, create a dangerous imbalance in the region, and encourage further acts of aggression. The insistence of the U.S.S.R. and some other delegations on implementation of this obsolete doctrine is another reason why the United States believes that a conference under the present circumstances would impair progress toward peace and security in the region.

I have referred several times during the course of this statement to the harmonization of views on substantive matters related to a zone of peace that is so necessary in this committee. Toward that end, my delegation joined with a number of others in cosponsoring document A/AC.159/L.44 embodying a proposal for a set of principles on the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace. [22] In that connection we note that a variety of documents before the Committee underscore the importance of developing an agreed set of principles on the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace, though of course there are deep differences as to what these principles should be. For example, document L.35 refers in part to "principles and characteristics of the Indian Ocean as a zone of peace." [23] Document L.43 refers to "discussion of the frame and contents of a declaration of principles of the zone of peace." [24] In any case, in developing a consensus set of principles naturally we recognize the utility to the committee of drawing not only on L.44 but also on ideas contained in other documents, including useful elements of resolution 2832 and of course the 1979 Littoral and Hinterland States Final Document. [25]

In furthering that process of negotiation, document A/AC.159/L.55, which emanated from the useful discussions aimed at harmonization that took place at our session in April, should have real utility. [26] In 1984, as other members of the committee have already suggested during our current series of meetings, the committee should set about the task of analyzing and distilling the views expressed by member states in this document. As an upshot of this process, it will be necessary to endeavor to work to reduce the differences on substance that exist among delegations and to seize points of convergence. This will be a serious and important undertaking, but one we believe within the capacity of the committee if delegations approach it with determination and political will.

We look forward to joining with all other delegations in that process in 1984. And I emphasize all delegations, including that of the Soviet Union which potentially has such an important role to play in the establishment of a real zone of peace. If I may paraphrase what Ambassador Kampelman stated in his speech of just 4 days ago (July 18) to the CSCE followup meeting in Madrid [27] to which the distinguished representative of Yugoslavia just alluded, [28] the American delegation makes this statement today not to irritate or offend any delegation here. We understand the need for patience in building the structure of peace and understanding among us. We cannot, however, lull ourselves into believing that words alone—in the absence of deeds—are adequate to erase the pressing threats to security. As Ambassador Kampelman said, we wish to resolve all potential conflicts between us, bilateral, regional, and international. We seek to do so on the basis of reciprocity and mutuality. We appreciate that in order to have a successful dialogue, we must be as attentive and responsive to the concerns of others as we ask them to be with respect to ours. We are prepared to do so.

In that context, I should like to affirm again that the United States is ready to attend a conference to implement a zone of peace in the Indian Ocean region, once a realistic basis for that zone has been agreed to here, and once political will has been exercised to improve the political and security climate in the region, notably through the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. We earnestly hope that the day will come in the not too distant future when the circumstances I have described will exist and when we can then hold a successful Indian Ocean conference. [29]

Proclamation by President Reagan, March 21, 1983 [1]

Designation of March 21, 1983, As Afghanistan Day

The tragedy of Afghanistan continues as the valiant and courageous Afghan freedom fighters persevere in standing up against the brutal power of the Soviet invasion and occupation. The Afghan people are struggling to reclaim their freedom, which was taken from them when the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in December of 1979.

In this three-year period the Soviet Union has been unable to subjugate Afghanistan. The Soviet forces are pitted against an extraordinary people who, in their determination to preserve the character of their ancient land, have organized an effective and still spreading countrywide resistance. The resistance of the Afghan freedom fighters is an example to all the world of the invincibility of the ideals we in this country hold most dear, the ideals of freedom and independence.

We must also recognize that the sacrifices required to maintain this resistance are very high. Millions have gone into exile as refugees. We will probably never know the numbers of people killed and maimed, poisoned and gassed, of the homes that have been destroyed, and of the lives that have been shattered and stricken with grief.

It is, therefore, incumbent upon us as Americans to reflect on the events in Afghanistan, to think about the agony which these brave people bear, and to maintain our condemnation of the continuing Soviet occupation. Our observance again this year of Afghanistan Day on March 21, the Afghan New Year, will recall for all the world America's unflagging sympathy for a determined people, its support for their refugees and commitment to achieving a political settlement for Afghanistan which will free that country from tyranny's yoke.

The Congress, by Senate Joint Resolution 65, [2] has designated March 21, 1983 as "Afghanistan Day" and has requested the President to issue a proclamation in observance of that day.

Now, Therefore, I, Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate March 21, 1983 as Afghanistan Day.

In Witness Whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-first day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and seventh.

RONALD REAGAN

Message by President Reagan, March 21, 1983 [3]

"All We Seek Is the Restoration of Peace and Freedom"

Today, March 21st, is New Year's Day in much of the Moslem world. New Year's, of course, should be an occasion for celebration. But for the Moslem people of Afghanistan, whose country was attacked and is occupied by the Soviet Army, it is a bitter reminder of a national calamity that befell their nation more than 3 years ago. To focus the world's attention on this crime against an innocent and brave nation, we observe today the second annual Afghanistan Day.

In Afghanistan, tens of thousands of people have been killed, millions have lost their homes and their livelihood. Others have been subjected to torture and other atrocities. And many have been victims of the grisly chemical and biological weapons, including "yellow rain," weapons the Soviets have used in violation of solemn international agreements. The consequences of this calamity extend to Pakistan which has assumed the burden of sheltering and feeding nearly 3 million refugees.

Yet while we condemn what has happened in Afghanistan, we are not without hope. To watch the courageous Afghan freedom fighters battle modern arsenals with simple hand-held weapons is an inspiration to those who love freedom. Their courage teaches us a great lesson—that there are things in this world worth defending.

To the Afghan people, I say on behalf of all Americans that we admire your heroism, your devotion to freedom, and your relentless struggle against your oppressors.

The Soviet people have known great suffering. More than other people, they should be able to sympathize with the terrible suffering of the Afghan people. To the Soviet leaders, I urge you in the name of humanity to end the bloodshed so that an independent Afghanistan can again take its place in the community of nations. The West has no designs upon Afghanistan. We do not threaten you there or anywhere on the globe. All we seek is the restoration of peace and freedom for a noble and brave people whom we remember today.

Statement Read by the Department of State Acting Spokesman (Romberg), March 21, 1983 [4]

Commitment to a Political Settlement for Afghanistan

I would like to note that today, March 21, the Afghan New Year, is being commemorated again this year as Afghanistan Day. Various private organizations, including many Afghan exile groups and some State governments and municipalities, are planning events throughout the United States to show their continuing support for the struggle that the Afghan freedom fighters are waging against Soviet aggression in Afghanistan.

In the 3 years since their invasion, the Soviet forces have been unable to subjugate Afghanistan. They are pitted against an extraordinary people who, in their determination to resist, have organized an effective and still spreading countrywide resistance. The resistance of the mujahidin, or Afghan freedom fighters, is an example to all the world of the invincibility of the ideals we in this country hold most dear, the ideals of freedom and independence.

The Secretary of State expresses his solidarity with the Afghan freedom fighters and sends his New Year's greeting to Afghans everywhere. He would like to recall for all the world America's unflagging sympathy for a determined people, its support for their refugees, and its commitment to achieve a political settlement for Afghanistan, based on the complete withdrawal of Soviet forces, which would also include self-determination for the Afghan people, independence and nonaligned status for Afghanistan, and the return of the refugees with safety and honor.

Strong Opposition to Soviet Occupation of Afghanistan

. . . . . .

Q. On a new subject—on Afghanistan: Do you have any comment on the reports that the administration is now publicly admitting aid to the Afghan rebels, and can you be any more specific about the extent of that aid?

A. I do have a response. I don't think you're quite right in saying the administration has addressed itself to that subject. We've seen the report in today's paper, [6]

[5] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State, Alan D. Romberg, Department of State Acting Spokesman, conducted the briefing which began at 12:19 p.m.

[6] New York Times correspondent Leslie H. Gelb reported, on the basis of information from senior administration officials, that President Reagan had decided on the supply of arms to Afghan insurgents. See Gelb's article in New York Times, May 4, 1983, p. A1.

and as you know, we don't comment on intelligence matters or allegations of intelligence matters so I don't have anything specific to offer. But I would reiterate for you our views regarding Afghanistan.

The United States strongly opposes the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and seeks an early end to the agony it has brought to the Afghan people by means of a negotiated political settlement. The Soviets have been responsible there for the death of many thousands of Afghans, the flight of a fifth of the population to Pakistan and Iran, massive violations of virtually the entire spectrum of human rights, and gross violations of the rules of warfare, including the use of chemical and biological weapons.

A negotiated political settlement must be based upon the principles outlined in the U.N. General Assembly resolutions on Afghanistan which call for: the complete withdrawal of Soviet forces; self-determination for the Afghan people; an independent and nonaligned Afghanistan; and the return of the refugees with safety and honor.

Believing that every avenue leading toward a peaceful settlement must be explored, we support the efforts of the United Nations to determine the possibilities for a settlement consistent with the UNGA resolutions.

Q. Does the supply of weapons to the Afghan rebels promote a negotiated political settlement?

A. Don, you're asking me to comment on allegations of covert activities and I can't do that.

Q. You brought it up. I mean, you brought up the negotiated political settlement.

A. I'll stick with what I've just said.

Q. Can we have a copy of that?

A. Sure.

Retaliatory Expulsion of an Afghan Diplomat From Washington

. . . . . .

Q. Have you decided on retaliatory measures vis-à-vis the expulsion of an American diplomat from Afghanistan?

A. The Department of State has informed Mr. Salem M. Spartak, the Chargé d'Affaires of the Afghan Embassy in Washington that the presence in the United States of his second secretary, Mr. Masjaedi Hewadmal, is no longer acceptable to the U.S. Government.

Q. When does he have to get out, Alan?

A. We ask that he leave within 48 hours, which is the same amount of time accorded our second secretary in Kabul.

Q. Any comment on the charges against the second seceretary in Kabul?

A. Only what we said yesterday, which is—why don't I go through the guidance we had on this, which is that the Afghan Government unexpectedly informed us Saturday [8] of the PNG order against Mr. Peter Graham. [9]

Graham, who had planned to leave Kabul anyway at the end of May on reassignment, will depart Afghanistan within a few days. I can't give you an exact update as of this moment. [10] I don't know.

The DRA's explanation for Graham's ouster that he was using pornographic literature to purchase rugs is ludicrous and wholly without foundation.

Q. You got any of the pictures with you? (Laughter)

A. Talk to you in the Press Office. (Laughter)

As we said on Saturday, we don't know what their motivation might be.[11] We pointed out that there is no substance to the explanation given to us and have asked if they could provide another one.

We are also puzzled and concerned about recent arrests by the Afghan secret police of most of our Embassy's white collar Afghan emmployees who were performing routine administrative duties in the Embassy.

Q. Alan, the explanation that the United States is giving for the expulsion today is that the second secretary is not acceptable.

A. His presence is no longer acceptable to the U.S. Government.

Q. What is the substance—what were the words you just used to describe the lack of substance for the Kabul government? What is the comparable explanation to justify this government's—

A. I think you can draw your own conclusions about our action against the second secretary in the Embassy here. I will stand on what we said about the fact that the charges against Mr. Graham are ludicrous and wholly without foundation.

Q. Are there any charges against the second secretary?

A. I'm not aware of any particular charges against him, no.

. . . . . .

Q. On the Afghan expulsions, what does it say about U.S. relations with Afghanistan and, by extension, U.S. relations with the Soviet Union?

A. I don't think, number one—to take number two first—I would try to extrapolate on relations with the Soviet Union.

As far as Afghanistan is concerned, I can't offer you a general statement either, but we find the explanation given in terms of Mr. Graham's expulsion not satisfactory and inexplicable. I'm not in a position to try to explain the Afghan Government's motives.

. . . . . .

Q. Who suggested that this was an unexpected or surprise move by the Afghans? Was there any incident or any circumstance involving Mr. Graham which was unusual and might have led to this, or was it really a total surprise?

A. My understanding is that it was a total surprise. It was unexpected, as I said.

Q. Was he buying rugs?

A. That I can only refer to what I've actually seen in the paper coming out the Embassy, and I think that the answer is no.

Q. Alan, could this possibly be a ploy by the Soviets to divert attention from the fact that a lot of their people were expelled from Iran a few days ago?[12] Has that thought occurred to you?

A. It hadn't occurred to me. I don't want to try to get into the thinking behind it.

"The United States Cannot Stand Silently by and Witness This Slaughter"

. . . . . .

[HUGHES.] Numerous reliable reports continue to reach us from refugee and other sources of extremely heavy, brutal and prolonged Soviet and Soviet-mandated bombing of civilian areas within Afghanistan in recent weeks, especially of areas around Herat, the country's third largest city, and north and west of Kabul. These reports leave no room for doubt that casualties among the civilian population have been extremely heavy. It's not possible to measure precisely the extent of those casualties, but they certainly number many hundreds and are probably in the thousands. Such a massive and ruthless assault on people who are, for the most part, without any means of defending themselves is intolerable by any standard of civilized behavior. It would appear that the Soviet Union believes that the world is either unaware of or no longer cares about what it is doing in Afghanistan and that in its desperation to subdue the spirit of the vast majority of Afghans who yearn for their nation's freedom the Soviet Union is willing to employ any means, no matter how brutal.

The United States cannot stand silently by and witness this slaughter. The Soviet Union is aware of our strong concern. We call on it once more to desist from its heartless assault on a courageous and independent people and to urgently seek a solution to the crisis in Afghanistan which preserves human life and responds to the principles outlined in four successive resolutions by the U.N. General Assembly. [14]

These call for the complete withdrawal of Soviet forces, self-determination for the Afghan people, an independent and nonaligned Afghanistan, and the return of the refugees in safety and with honor.

. . . . . .

Q. Can you explain what you mean by "the United States cannot stand silently by"?

A. We're not going to be silent in the face of this action. That's why we are making this statement.

Q. You're talking only about verbal action.

A. Verbal action.

Q. You're not implying the possibility of the United States—

A. Verbal and diplomatic action.

Q. Diplomatic through what channels?

A. A variety of channels. I think the Soviets are well aware of our views, both privately and publicly.

Q. John, has the United States taken any action other than verbal or diplomatic on Afghanistan in the last few days, months, weeks?

A. No; no new action.

Q. No new action since what time?

A. Other than the continuing action we've been taking over the months and years.

Q. John, are these air strikes halted or are they still continuing?

A. I can't answer that, Larry; I can't answer it.

A. I think that senior administration officials have addressed that question before and I think given a fairly thorough estimate of where the arms are coming from. [15]

Cease-Fire in the Panjsher Valley of Afghanistan

. . . . . .

Q. Do you have anything on the reported truce in Afghanistan?

A. Yes, I do have something on that. Basically, that's a fairly old story. We've been aware for some time of reports from many sources that Panjsher Valley resistance leader, Massud, may have worked out some sort of cease-fire with the Soviets. It's difficult to know what the terms are or what it may mean in this struggle against the Soviet invaders, but it seems clear from all reports that there is no current fighting in the Panjsher. This valley, about 80 kilometers to the northeast of Kabul, was the scene of the heaviest and most publicized fighting between the Soviet and Democratic Republic of Afghanistan Armed Forces and the Afghanistan mujahidin last year during the spring and summer campaigns.

As we stated last Friday, [17] reports continue to reach us of extremely heavy and brutal Soviet bombing and fighting in various areas of Afghanistan, especially around Herat. In spite of this, the Soviets appear unsuccessful in their attempts to break the back of the mujahidin.

Our outrage at the loss of civilian life grows, and the Soviets are aware of our continuing concern. Surely, all the world must demand an end through a negotiated political settlement of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, the sole cause of the destruction and suffering of the Afghan people.

Q. I didn't understand. Are you confirming something?

A. What we're saying is that the activity by the Soviets continues despite this cease-fire.

Q. Are you confirming that such an agreement was reached, or are you only saying that you imply an agreement from the reports that there hasn't been any fighting?

A. That's what I'm saying. We've been aware for some time of reports from many sources that they may have worked out a cease-fire.

Q. Do you know when it took effect?

A. I do not, no.

Q. Could you look into it?

A. We may be able to pin it down a little—sure. [18]

(Office of Press Relations, Department of State)

Although Soviet military action in the Panjsher Valley was halted throughout 1983, guerrilla attacks on Soviet convoys continued, and Ahmad Shah Massud, the guerrilla commander in the Panjsher Valley, reportedly refused a Soviet request to prolong the truce in 1984.

Meeting of Secretary Shultz With Pakistani Foreign Minister Yaqub Khan

. . . . . .

Q. The Pakistani Foreign Minister is meeting with the Secretary this afternoon.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know what the talks are focused on?

A. I think he actually was in this morning. [20] The Foreign Minister is visiting the capitals of the Security Council's permanent members to brief them on the results of the latest round of U.N.-sponsored indirect talks on the Afghanistan crisis, and his visit to Washington at this time is part of that mission. [21]

In his meeting with the Foreign Minister, Secretary Shultz reiterated U.S. support of the U.N. negotiations and U.S. support for the applicable U.N. resolutions, which call for total Soviet troop withdrawal, an independent nonaligned Afghanistan, free of outside interference, Afghan self-determination, and return of the refugees with safety and honor.

This has been the consistent U.S. position.

Q. John, any bilateral questions brought up?

A. I'm sure there were.

Q. Can you give any indication—

A. I don't have a readout on them.

ing effort on Afghanistan. The policy of the United States in regard to Afghanistan is clear. We seek a negotiated political settlement at the earliest possible moment to end the agony of the Afghan people and to get the Soviet forces out of Afghanistan.

In our view, any settlement must incorporate the four elements which are contained in the UNGA resolutions on Afghanistan—that is, the withdrawal of Soviet forces, the independent and nonaligned status of Afghanistan, self-determination for the Afghan people, and return of the refugees with safety and honor.

Our hope is that progress toward settlement can be achieved in this session. We believe that the key to a settlement is Soviet willingness to withdraw troops from Afghanistan.

Lack of Discernible Progress in the U.N. Negotiating Effort on Afghanistan

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, do you have the impression yet that the Soviets want to negotiate a way to get their troops out of Afghanistan? And what would you hope to accomplish on that front . . . during your trip? [25]

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The United Nations has been conducting for some time now negotiations with the Soviet Union on the Afghanistan matter. Just how much progress they've made is a little difficult to interpret. The Pakistanis have been involved, and of course, taking a part there. I've had the opportunity to discuss that with Foreign Minister Yaqub Khan, and I look forward to talking with him again. But I don't really have anything to point to that says that genuine progress has been made. There is a large contingent—over 100,000, we understand—of Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

For there to be a genuine resolution of that problem, which we very much favor, it would have to include the removal of those troops; it would have to include the emergence of a nonaligned government of Afghanistan; it would have to provide for the creation of a government that is responsive to the people of Afghanistan, and in some way the refugees would have to come back with honor and without prejudice.

So those are the things, I think, that are pretty well agreed that we need to work for. And there is a lot of effort going on, but it's hard to identify progress.

Exchange of Letters Between Secretary Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko on Negotiation of a Settlement in Afghanistan

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, Afghanistan is one of the issues in your talks here and also in Islamabad. You have recently written a letter to Mr. Gromyko dealing with Afghanistan. Did you get any answer and what was the purpose of this letter?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. There has been an exchange of letters. The purpose was to assure the Soviet Union, as we have assured others who are involved in this negotiation—the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Pakistanis and others—that we wish to see it settled and we would like to see it settled according to the guidelines that have been laid out in the United Nations. Just how much progress there has been, I think, is something of a question and I look forward to my discussions in Pakistan where I will get another reading on that subject.

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz) at the Nasrbagh Refugee Camp, Peshawar, Pakistan, July 3, 1983 [27]

"Fellow Fighters for Freedom, . . . We Are With You"

Fellow fighters for freedom, not only in Afghanistan but throughout the world. My message to you from the United States is very simple. We are with you. This is a gathering—a very moving experience for me—a gathering in the name of freedom, a gathering in the name of self-determination, a gathering in the name of getting the Soviet forces out of Afghanistan, a gathering in the name of a sovereign Afghanistan controlled by its own people. The millions from Afghanistan who are refugees here, of course, bring out the human dimension of this tragedy brought on by the invasion and occupation of Afghanistan by Soviet forces. The human dimension has its counterpart of tragedy but also of inspiration and determination, at the determination of you not to live under that rule, but to fight back. I would like to express my appreciation and my support for many people who are part of this effort, for the officials of the Government of Pakistan, and for the people of Pakistan, particularly those in this area. I was touched to see that you spoke so eloquently yourself, this morning. [28] I express my appreciation to those from around the world who have come here as volunteers to be helpful. I feel privileged as an American to be part of the support effort for you, not only from the governmental efforts, but from the private organizations which have come here to be helpful. You fight valiantly and your spirit inspires the world, and I want you to know that you do not fight alone—many all over the world stand with you. World opinion is expressed without equivocation or ambiguity in votes in the United Nations. But you have also spoken of the visible support that has come here and I assure you again that the United States, has, does, and will continue to stand with you. You spoke, sir, of the fact that there are negotiations taking place about the Afghan issue, and I can tell you that from the standpoint of the United States, negotiations will only be successful if they include the removal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan, if they include a provision for self-determination in Afghanistan, if they include provisions under which refugees may return to their country with dignity and honor. These are things that must be included in any settlement if it is to be satisfactory.

You spoke of your determination and your confidence and I agree with you—there are not only the millions here, but you spoke also of the millions who have turned out in Poland just in the past few weeks. I share your confidence that in the end, freedom will prevail—we will prevail. And we will prevail because, first of all, we have strength; second of all, we are determined; and most of all, because our cause is the cause of right and justice. Finally, I express again my sense of privilege at being here with you, and of sharing these aspirations for freedom that you fight for, that I fight for, and the American people stand for. Thank you very much.

Press Briefing by the Pakistani Foreign Minister (Khan), July 3, 1983 (Extract) [29]

. . . . . .

(Inaudible) . . . .[30] In order to try to find a peaceful settlement of the Afghanistan problem. The last round of talks we had in Geneva were centered primarily on trying to move forward in arriving at a comprehensive settlement of the Afghanistan problem. As you know, the talks are indirect. That is to say, that we do not talk face to face with the Afghan delegation because we do not recognize the Karmal regime. We are insistent therefore that the talks should not be direct and should be through the special representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. So much for the form of the talks.

As regards the prospects, or more accurately, as regards the progress made . . . As you know the problem is a very complex one. It's thorny and it's difficult for a number of reasons, most of which are obvious.

Nevertheless, from our point of view, and indeed I would have thought from the point of all concerned, it is highly desirable that we should arrive at a settlement for these refugees whom you saw, or some of whom you saw. The plight in which they live; the fact that there are no less than 3 million of them in Pakistan and in the province or state or which you were, of which Peshawar is the capital. One in every seven persons that you meet in that state, in that province, is a refugee. That just gives you an idea of the demographic situation, if you like, of the refugees. We are doing our best to take care of them from a humanitarian point of view and we shall continue to do so. We are assisted greatly by help from outside—international resources, your country, and so on. Nevertheless, the fact remains that they are a burden on the economy of a country like ours. This is a burden we have borne cheerfully. Because you see it is our humanitarian duty to assist them and we shall of course continue to do so. They themselves, having been driven from their homes, having fled from their hearths and homes, and in many cases, separated from their dear ones, in conditions of anguish, sorrow and frequently of tragedy, would like to return to their homes voluntarily, in safety and with dignity and in honor. They cannot return so long as the Soviet troops continue to occupy Afghanistan.

Therefore, the withdrawal of Soviet troops becomes the central point to create the set of conditions which would admit the return of these refugees to their homes in the conditions that I have just described. It is to that end that the negotiations we are conducting are in fact directed. They are directed at an arrangement or a comprehensive agreement which would ensure the withdrawal of the Soviet forces and the return of the refugees to their homes. It also entails assurances from our side and from the side of the Afghans—reciprocal assurances of noninterference and nonintervention in the internal affairs of Afghanistan—and these are assurances which we are prepared to give because we have not intervened or interfered in the internal affairs of Afghanistan and we are not doing so now. Therefore we have no hesitation prospectively, that is to say with regard to the future, to give undertakings of the kind that are part of the U.N. Charter and are rooted in normal international conduct.

From the Soviet side and the Afghan side, they also insist on guarantees—guarantees of noninterference and nonintervention. This is the Afghan and Soviet demand from the United States, and possibly from others. The Soviet Union would equally undertake to give guarantees of noninterference and nonintervention and the United States would be called upon to do the same. This stage of the negotiations—the one dealing with guarantees—has not yet been tackled in substance. The reason is obvious. Until the text of the agreement has reached a point where there is something to show the potential guarantors—what they are going to guarantee—obviously, the time is not right for such an undertaking. Within the next few weeks, possibly in the next two months, the U.N. Secretary-General's representative will be making contact with the U.S. Government—an official approach to discuss the question with them. I obviously cannot speculate on what the reactions of the United States would be. In principle, subject to the declaration of guarantees being acceptable to the United States, the United States has agreed to consider the possibility of being guarantors, and so has the other side, the Soviet Union.

Q. They have considered?

A. Yes they have. So far the Soviet Union and the United States are the potential guarantors. I say potential because they have not yet had a chance to study the problem in detail. Our view is that all the five members—permanent members of the Security Council—should be guarantors. Nevertheless, as you know, guarantors have to be accepted by both sides and so far the two states or countries which have appeared as the most probable and acceptable to both sides are the United States and the Soviet Union. The question is open with regard to the other guarantors. So much for the guarantees, and the guarantors.

Now with regard to the progress that we have achieved, the progress is steady. It is slow and I think that is how it should be, because it is better to move steadily and in a methodical and solid manner rather than attempt a quick fix. In our view nothing could be more fragile and also undesirable and shaky as any attempt to arrive at a hasty settlement. Therefore, we are moving in these talks very cautiously and steadily. We are not at a point of a breakthrough. No dramatic or spectacular results are around the corner. Nevertheless, the progress from our point of view has been sufficiently encouraging for me to be able to tell you that we are satisfied with the rhythm of the progress that has so far has been achieved with regard to substantial issues of a possible settlement. That is where things stand and I would be happy to try to answer your questions. Of course there is an aspect of confidentiality with regard to the details. I could not go into the blow by blow account of where things stand.

Q. You have been very active and you have been very much in touch with the United States and the Soviet Union. The Secretary came here to Pakistan. Now he has met with you twice. What would you say he now knows that he didn't know before he came here?

A. This I think you should address . . . these questions . . . .

Q. What have you told him that was new? He said he came here to listen and to hear a first-hand report from you because you had been to Moscow, you had been to Geneva.[31] What you have said now is pretty much the picture as we've known it for several weeks. Has there been any new development, any new initiative, any new approach? What has he accomplished by coming here?

[31] Reference is possibly to Secretary Shultz's arrival statement in Islamabad, July 2, 1983; see Department of State Bulletin, September 1983, pp. 36–37.

A. Well, I spoke to the Secretary when I was last in Washington [32] regarding the visit to a number of capitals that I have undertaken . . . (to) all members, permanent members of the Security Council, since then we had this meeting in Geneva, and I was able to update him on the developments that took place during the meeting in Geneva and to share with him the progress that has since been made. As I say, that progress should not be seen as something spectacular. Nevertheless, it is steady, it is meaningful, and it is substantial. This I was able to communicate to him and to update him regarding it.

Q. Is it your feeling that the Soviets, when you deal with the Soviets and with the Afghans indirectly . . . is it your feeling that the Soviets are genuinely interested in finding a solution or the other version that the Soviets are going through the motions of negotiation as a way of stalling?

A. No, it is not our impression that the Soviets are stalling or dragging their feet. It is negotiation. Obviously there are differences of approach and there are hurdles that have to be overcome. But it is our impression that the Soviets are serious about this process of seeking a settlement. They have declared this publicly. Their leaders have repeated it many times and we take their word—for the purpose of these negotiations—we take their word as stated to us: as an assumption that they would withdraw provided certain conditions were fulfilled, the conditions being noninterference and nonintervention. These are assurances we are prepared to keep because . . . .

Q. Some say that the progress that you allude to is more in atmospherics than in any tangible aspect of the negotiations. Do you agree with that?

A. No, I don't think it would be fair to say that the progress is all intangibles or peripherals or marginals and not germane to substantive issues. I think it would be true to say that steady progress has been made on substantive issues . . . Only a few of them have been tackled. Several important ones remain to be addressed. But I think it would be a mistake to draw conclusions on either end of the spectrum. Either that is all superficial, peripheral, nonsubstantial, or that we are very close to or at the verge of a breakthrough. The reality as usual lies in the crepuscular region, it lies in that twilight.

Q. At the present rate of progress, how many years will it take (inaudible).

A. It's very difficult to prognosticate but I don't think it should run into that type of time frame. I would be very disappointed if it runs into anything like several years. I think it should be possible—if both sides are as serious as there is every evidence that they are—I wouldn't like to name a time frame. But I don't think it would run into that kind of period.

"The Russian Threat . . . Has Come Forward As a Result of Soviet Aggressive Behavior"

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, as a result of your discussions with the Foreign Minister [34] and President Zia, has there been any fine-tuning of the U.S.–Pakistan position on Afghanistan, any change regarding what Pakistan will convey in the Geneva discussions?

[34] Lieutenant General Sahabzada Yaqub Khan, Pakistani Foreign Minister.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We have shared views and, of course, I have been very interested in the Foreign Minister's report and analysis, and President Zia's, and we have, I think, become very well informed through an intense briefing at the staff level. Our objectives, I think, which we share completely, remain unchanged, and I would say in my analysis that the report that I've had that there isn't a sense of enough progress to make it worthwhile continuing the dialog, but not so much as to make you think we're anywhere near the end of it.

Q. Mr. Secretary, I would like to divert your attention toward the interview of the Russian Ambassador in Pakistan [35] who said that "Mr. Shultz is bringing the Soviet danger in his briefcase during his visit to Pakistan."

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I guess the origin of that question has never visited where we visited yesterday. [36] It is not me that brings the Russian threat, it is the Russians who have brought it themselves with their invasion and occupation of Afghanistan. We could see the human tragic fallout from that in the refugees, and particularly, I think, the women and the children, the widows. So the Russian threat is there, has come forward as a result of Soviet aggressive behavior, nothing whatever to do with the United States. At the same time we join with Pakistan and others in deploring this action and in expressing our support for the Afgan freedom fighters.

Q. You had an exchange of letters with Foreign Minister Gromyko on Afghanistan, [37] and now you have had talks with Foreign Minister Yaqub Khan. In 2 or 3 months' time the U.N. Envoy will get in touch with the Soviet Union in Moscow on the subject of guarantees and other questions related to the Afghanistan issue. Do you think these U.N. talks will go on for years as other talks have gone on for 5 or 6 years? What is your assessment? How soon can this question be solved?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I think it is a mistake to try and put some sort of deadline down on talks of that kind. At the same time, obviously nobody concerned wants to have talks that just drag on endlessly and pointlessly and the possibility of not coming out with something constructive. The expert on that subject is sitting on my right, [38] but I have already characterized what my understanding of the situation is, and I don't want to repeat it.

Rejection of Afghan Charges of Spying Against Two American Diplomats

Turner III, Second Secretary of Embassy, and Robert Q. Blackburn, Jr., Attaché, from Afghanistan within 48 hours for espionage. On the same day, Joseph W. d'Affaires in Washington. That is Mr. Haider Refq. He was called into the Department yesterday at which time he was told by Deputy Chief of Protocol Richard Gookin that the charges against Mr. Turner and Mr. Blackburn are baseless. That is the new development.

There are in fact, just for your information, about 20 Americans at our Embassy in Kabul. That includes six Marines. The man in charge there is our Chargé d'Affaires. His name is Edward Hurwitz. Beyond that, I don't have anything beyond the guidance we gave you yesterday.

Q. You can't say they have actually left the country?

A. I can't, no.

. . . . . .

Q. Why do we regard the U.S. presence in Afghanistan as being accreditation to an independent government when the government appears to be under Soviet occupation and it's really, at the moment, a kind of Soviet protectorate? Why don't we make our protest to the Soviets?

A. Make a protest to the Soviets?

Q. Make it just as a continuation of our problems with the Soviets.

A. Because our Embassy is in Kabul and accredited to that particular government.

Q. So we're recognizing them, in effect, as independent?

A. Yes, with obvious implications about the activity that is going on in that country.

Report by the U.N. Secretary-General (Pérez de Cuéllar) to the U.N. General Assembly and Security Council, September 28, 1983 [41]

Deep Concern at the Slow Pace of Negotiations For a Settlement in Afghanistan

1. The present report is submitted in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 37/37 of 29 November 1982, [42] in which the Assembly reaffirmed the principles involved and the action required with regard to the situation relating to Afghanistan.

2. Since the adoption of that resolution, I have actively continued my efforts to promote a political solution through negotiations. These efforts centred on the formulation of a comprehensive settlement designed to resolve the issues inherent to the present situation and to establish a framework for good neighbourly relations.

3. From 21 January to 7 February 1983 my personal representative, Diego Cordóvez, visited Pakistan, Afghanistan and Iran, where he had detailed consultations in order further to define the substantive contents of the settlement and to determine the procedural steps required to give impetus to the diplomatic process. The consultations dealt with the four items previously identified for consideration: withdrawal of foreign troops; non-interference and non-intervention; international guarantees; and voluntary return of refugees. In Islamabad Mr. Cordóvez met with President Zia ul-Haq, Foreign Minister Sahabazada Yuqub-Khan and other senior officials of the Government. In Kabul Mr. Cordovez met with President Babrak Karmal, Prime Minister Sultan Ali Keshtmand and Foreign Minister Shah Mohammad Dost. In Teheran he met Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Velayati and other senior officials.

4. During the consultations held in the area it was possible to widen the understandings reached during the first round of discussions held at Geneva in June 1982 through the intermediary of my personal representative.[43] In fact, additional understandings were reached on the nature and operation of a "policy mechanism" that would be articulated in the comprehensive settlement and on the kind of provisions required to ensure its effective implementation. The consultations also led to an agreement that a second round of discussions, on the same basis as that held in June 1982, should be convened in order to carry forward the diplomatic process. The interlocutors reaffirmed in that context that the discussions should remain confidential unless otherwise agreed by all concerned.

5. At the end of March I paid a visit to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics during which I had an opportunity to exchange views on the situation with President Andropov and Foreign Minister Gromyko. The Soviet Government expressed itself strongly in favour of a political settlement and supported categorically the continuation of my efforts.

6. The second round of discussions through the intermediary of my personal representative was held at Geneva in two phases: the first from 11 to 22 April and the second from 12 [16?] to 24 June 1983. The Foreign Ministers of Afghanistan and Pakistan were present at Geneva for this purpose. The Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran was kept informed of the discussions through its Permanent Representative.[44] The suspension of the discussions on 22 April was agreed upon to enable the interlocutors to hold consultations in their respective capitals.

7. During the discussions, which were conducted in a very constructive spirit, substantial progress was made in the definition of the contents of the comprehensive settlement, its principles and objectives, the interrelationship amongst its four component elements and the provisions, including time-frames, for its implementation. It did not prove possible, however, to bridge differences of attitude and position regarding a number of issues, including some crucial issues, which were left in abeyance.

8. During the Geneva discussions the arrangements aimed at ascertaining the voluntary and unimpeded character of the return of the refugees were most carefully considered, and at the conclusion of the round of discussions it was agreed that preparations for such arrangements would be started without delay. Consultations were accordingly held throughout the summer with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees[45] with a view to submitting specific proposals thereon.

9. During the past year I and my personal representative have also continued efforts to enlist the support of all Governments which can contribute to resolving the issues involved.

10. Whilst my personal representative had been requested to visit the area towards the end of the summer I subsequently came to the conclusion that the time chosen for such a visit would not be suitable for the purposes that the interlocutors had set themselves to achieve. The presence at New York of the Foreign Ministers of Afghanistan, Iran and Pakistan, on the occasion of the current session of the General Assembly, will provide, however, an opportunity for discussions which, I earnestly hope, will establish a solid basis for the resumption of the diplomatic process.

11. That valuable and indispensable work has been accomplished during the period covered by this report is beyond question. For, given the difficulties encountered in setting in motion the diplomatic process, it has undoubtedly gone a long way towards the achievement of a fair and lasting political solution. This has proved possible, in the main, because all concerned have remained firmly determined to work in good faith in the progressive development of a comprehensive settlement which would effectively resolve all the issues involved. I am also encouraged by the increasingly broad support that these efforts have received from the members of the international community.

12. I cannot conceal, at the same time, my deep concern at the slow pace of the negotiations and at the difficulties encountered in overcoming existing obstacles. It would indeed be regrettable if the solid work that has been done were to be wasted. My concern is all the more urgent as I reflect on the continuing suffering of the Afghan people and on the profound humanitarian implications of a political settlement. I personally feel that the diplomatic process has moved in the right direction and that a settlement is possible on the basis of what has already been accomplished, provided that the necessary policy decisions are made. If these negotiations succeed, all Afghans will be able to decide their future in peace, and the foundations will have been laid for mutual understanding and co-operation among the States in the area.

13. I believe that these feelings are shared by the concerned Governments and I am therefore fully prepared, should they remain committed to the diplomatic process, to continue to assist them in their endeavours to reach an early conclusion of the settlement.

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) Before the U.N. General Assembly, November 22, 1983[46]

Support For a Fair and Comprehensive Solution of the Situation in Afghanistan

The present debate in the United Nations on the situation in Afghanistan marks the fifth time that the General Assembly has met to consider the Soviet Union's invasion of that country and its continuing effort to subjugate the Afghan people by force. The fact that our deliberations, by this time, follow an established pattern must not be allowed to detract in any way from the urgency and the extraordinary significance of the issue before us.

On one level, the continuing war conducted by the Soviet Union against the people of Afghanistan poses a challenge to the ability of the United Nations effectively to defend the bedrock Charter principle prohibiting aggression against the territorial integrity and political independence of member states. But, on another level, the continuation of the war, which will shortly enter its fifth year, is a tribute to the heroism of the people of Afghanistan.

As of today, November 22d, the Soviet war against the Afghan people has been fought 35 days longer than the Soviet Union's participation in the struggle against Nazi Germany during World War II—what the Soviets call the "great patriotic war." The fact that the Afghan people have been able to resist an adversary so much more powerful militarily and so ruthless in its use of force is testimony to their fierce pride and unsurpassed courage. But this war, which is truly Afghanistan's great patriotic war against the Soviet Union, has taken a devastating toll on the Afghan people, hundreds of thousands of whom have been killed and millions of whom have been forced to flee their homeland.

It has been said that Afghanistan can be destroyed but cannot be conquered. Unable to subdue the Afghan freedom fighters, the Soviet forces have launched ruthless campaigns against the general populace—leveling entire villages, burning harvests, killing livestock, and taking cruel reprisals against Afghan civilians. Areas that once exported foodstuffs now suffer food shortages and, in some cases, actual starvation.

The chronicle of the rising level of violence inflicted by Soviet occupation forces against Afghan civilians recalls images of Guernica and Lidice. This violence, which has included torture, mass executions, rape, and civilian massacres, has been painstakingly documented and strongly condemned by independent international humanitarian groups, including the Permanent Tribunal of the Peoples, which met last December in Paris, and the International Conference on Afghanistan, which was held in Oslo in March.

Of all the dozens of witnesses who testified at the Paris meeting—among them journalists, doctors, experts on weaponry, representatives of humanitarian groups who had secretly visited Afghanistan, Afghan victims, and other eyewitnesses—none presented more compelling testimony than three men from a village in the Logar Valley near Kabul. They described in harrowing detail how Soviet troops entered the village on September 13, 1982, and deliberately burned to death 105 villagers, including many small children, who had taken refuge in an underground irrigation tunnel. According to one of the witnesses, the Soviet troops "burst into applause" after successfully sealing up and igniting the tunnel. The witnesses charged that incidents of equal brutality had occurred in other villages.

The report of the Oslo Conference, [47] which was presented to the recent meeting of the U.N. Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, contains many factual accounts and eyewitness testimonies of flagrant violations of basic human rights, including mass killings perpetrated by Soviet forces in Afghanistan.

The main Soviet military efforts in 1983 have included a ruthless bombing and ground campaign in the western city of Herat during the spring and summer and attacks on villages near Kabul and along the Pakistan border near Kandahar, Ghazni, and Jalalabad. The bombing attacks resulted in heavy civilian casualties but relatively few losses among the mujahidin. Herat, for example, was hit by some 50 sorties a day in April, but the city still remains in the hands of the resistance.

Among the many reports of violence against civilians was the execution by Soviet forces in July of 20 elders in the provincial capital of Ghazni to avenge the deaths of several Soviet personnel. In October, reprisals were launched against villages near Kandahar, Afghanistan's second largest city, resulting in the death of some 100 civilians.

More recently, several hundred men, women, and children were reportedly killed as a result of the Soviets' savage destruction of the small handicraft-producing town of Istalef north of Kabul. At least half the town was leveled by artillery shelling, aerial bombardments and torching by Soviet troops. Shocking but credible reports have been received from numerous sources of Soviet soldiers killing women and children with bayonets. A respected Istalef religious figure is said to have been summarily shot after personally complaining to the Kabul regime's Prime Minister about the Istalef atrocities.

Wartime devastation and the violence directed against the civilian population have forced a massive exodus of Afghans from their homes. Over 3 million Afghans have fled their country, while tens of thousands more are displaced within Afghanistan itself. Pakistan, which provides asylum to well over 2 million refugees, has handled its burden in a humane manner which is truly admirable. The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees deserves special recognition for tireless efforts to lessen the burden by providing shelter, food and medical care to the refugees.

Finding themselves unable to defeat the Afghan resistance in its native mountainous terrain, Soviet forces have cruelly used chemical weapons and toxin weapons against freedom fighters and civilians alike in contravention of international law and agreements—and human decency. Victims tell of long and painful sickness and death following Soviet chemical attacks. Their accounts conform with those of Hmong tribesmen in Laos and Kampuchean resistance fighters who report similar attacks by Soviet surrogates in Indochina.

The Soviets also continue to use booby-trapped mines disguised as toys, cigarette packs, pens, and other household objects in violation of an international convention which they signed in 1981 prohibiting the use of such cruel weapons. [48]

[47] An interrogation panel of politicians, journalists, and specialists heard testimony of Afghan and Western witnesses on conditions in Afghanistan before the International Afghanistan Hearing in Oslo, March 13–15, 1983. Bjorn Stordrange, Chairman of the hearing, prepared the report, a copy of which was submitted by the International Support Committee for a Free Afghanistan to the U.N. Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities on August 22, 1983.

[48] The text of the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects, with annexed Protocols: Protocol on Non-detectable Fragments (Protocol I), Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of

The increased Soviet brutality against Afghan civilians makes a mockery of Soviet propaganda which portrays the Soviet Union as the protector of Afghanistan and Babrak Karmal as the beloved and democratically chosen leader of the Afghan nation. In fact, the Soviet invasion and occupation of Afghanistan is a clear—indeed, blatant—example of imperialist expansion, the fulfillment of a longstanding Soviet, and before that Tsarist, goal of obtaining warm-water ports on the Indian Ocean. In its effort to add Afghanistan to its collection of conquered Central Asian Khanates, Moscow unilaterally invaded the country (in December 1979) and installed a puppet regime there. Moscow's claim that it was invited by an established government was concocted after its invasion. The Soviet Union has, in fact, never produced a shred of concrete evidence supporting its claim that an invitation was issued, and its first action in Afghanistan after the invasion was the murder, by a special Soviet assault team, of then-President Hafizullah Amin, in whose name they claimed to be acting.

The Soviet assertion that it sent its forces into Afghanistan to beat back American, Chinese, and other foreign invaders is equally absurd and unsubstantiated. Not a single American or Chinese soldier has ever been found there. In a recent interview, a Soviet soldier who defected to the mujahidin said that he and other Soviet soldiers sent to Afghanistan were told that they would be defending the Soviet southern border against such foreign invaders. "But one or two months after I arrived in Afghanistan," he said, "I realized that I was deceived. We didn't see any Chinese or Americans." He added: "I didn't want to be part of this dirty war in Afghanistan. None of the Soviet soldiers wants to be here . . .[49] the Soviet Union should pull out its forces, because innocent people are dying on both sides."

Moscow's argument that it is fighting "outside interference" has validity only if one considers the Afghan people to be outsiders in their own country. Meanwhile, four years after the Soviet invasion, Moscow is still attempting to make Afghanistan a subservient satellite, with 105,000 Soviet troops wreaking death and destruction upon an unyielding Afghan citizenry.

Real Soviet intentions toward Afghanistan are further underscored by its efforts to absorb the country economically and culturally into the Soviet empire. Afghanistan's natural resources, including natural gas, copper, and iron ore, are being shipped to the Soviet Union to offset the cost of the occupation. New road and rail links connect Afghanistan with the Soviet Union, while the power grid in northern Afghanistan is now integrated with that of Soviet Central Asia. The effort to reshape Afghanistan's traditional culture in a Marxist-Leninist mold continues apace. In addition to the Sovietization of Afghanistan's educational institutions, thousands of young Afghans, including children aged 6 to 9, have been sent to the Soviet Union and other bloc countries for training and indoctrination.

Such efforts to reshape Afghan culture are one indication of the total absence of popular support for the Soviet occupation, as well as for the puppet regime of Babrak Karmal which has no-following apart from the tiny, splintered, and despised Communist Party. As a result, the Soviets and their surrogates have had to exert control through brute force and terror. The Afghan secret police, known as the Khad, is modeled after the Soviet KGB and is under Soviet direction. During the 20-month period of Communist rule preceding the Soviet invasion, the Khad and its Soviet advisers were responsible for thousands of executions, as many as 32,000 in Pul-i-Charki prison alone, according to the Paris-based International Federation for Human Rights which has conducted extensive interviews with survivors of the terror campaign. The Khad remains the most pervasive and systematic violator of human rights in areas under regime control. Through surveillance, arrest, imprisonment, and torture, the Khad has instilled a pervasive atmosphere of terror.

Mines, Boobytraps and Other Devices (Protocol II), and Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Incendiary Weapons (Protocol III), concluded at Geneva October 10, 1980, opened for signature in New York for one year from April 10, 1981, and entered into force December 2, 1983, is printed in The United Nations Disarmament Yearbook, 1980 (New York, 1981), vol. 5, pp. 466–475. The United States signed the Convention on April 8, 1982, but has not yet ratified it. Amnesty International recently reported that torture is used systematically by the Khad.[50] Victims range from 16-year-old girls to persons in their sixties. Amnesty's interviews with former prisoners reveal that hundreds of students from Kabul University and high schools have been tortured during the past 3 years. Amnesty renewed an appeal to Babrak Karmal, which has still gone unanswered, to put an end to the torture.

With the Soviet invasion of 1979, a totalitarian, one-party state ruled by the Afghan Communists has given way to a totalitarian apparatus completely controlled by the Soviet Union. Soviet military and civilian advisers sit in almost all ministries and make or approve every decision in the name of the regime. So weak and isolated is the Soviet client regime that its tenuous control extends only over parts of some major cities. The Afghan army continues to elude Soviet and regime efforts to make it an effective fighting force. Wracked by desertions and low morale, the army remains at half its pre-1979 level, despite the use of hated press-gangs to conscript males, many in their early teens, and incentive pay scales for recruits almost equal to sub-Cabinet salaries. Defections to the resistance in fact equal inductions into the army.

Afghans tell of Alexander the Great defining the hero as "he who does not ask the number of his foe, but asks as to where his foe is." This description epitomizes the Afghan mujahidin. Enjoying widespread support among the Afghan people, the mujahidin have heroically held the Soviet Union at bay for four years in a tenacious defense of their homeland, their religion, and their right to self-determination as a people. They have not been deterred by the military and technological superiority of the Soviet forces or by the violence that these forces have used without restraint against the population of Afghanistan. On the contrary, fully three-quarters of the Afghan countryside and populace and a third of the district capitals remain under the control of the resistance. Indeed, Moscow's efforts to subjugate Afghanistan have fostered a new sense of Afghan nationhood based partly on common ties to Islam and, increasingly, on the Afghan nation's unbending determination to resist Soviet aggression and domination.

Nothing more clearly illuminates the aggressive nature of the invasion of Afghanistan and the utter fraudulence of the Soviet arguments defending the invasion than the universal revulsion this action has occasioned among the Afghan people. Had the reaction of the Afghan people been different—had they, for example, welcomed the Soviet troops as liberators—then surely the judgment of the international community regarding the Soviet action would, and should, be different. The norms embodied in the U.N. Charter become meaningful in their application to specific situations. It is not possible to distinguish between the lawful and the criminal use of force without first carefully examining the reasons for the use of force, the manner and duration of its use and the result.

In this respect, the use of force by the Soviet Union in Afghanistan is without legal foundation and lacks any reasonable moral or political justification. As we have already seen, the use of force by the Soviet Union was not undertaken at the request of any lawful authority within Afghanistan and resulted, in fact, in the murder of the existing president. Similarly, the countries of the region neither requested nor welcomed the action but regarded it as a blatant act of aggression and a threat to their own security and to regional stability. Nor was there evidence of any foreign involvement in Afghanistan posing a threat to Soviet security. Moreover, the Soviet action could not be justified in terms of liberating the Afghan people from internal oppression or alien domination. As the attitude and the actions of the Afghan people clearly demonstrate, the Soviet Union is an oppressor and a foreign aggressor, not a liberator. There are no reports of Afghans welcoming Soviet forces with cries of "God bless Andropov."

On all other counts, the Soviet invasion violates the norms of international law and the fundamental principles of the U.N. Charter. The Soviet Union has used force without restraint and without regard to civilian casualties. On the contrary, it has deliberately attacked the civilian population in an effort to depopulate areas of resistance strength. Nor has it allowed the International Committee of the Red Cross or any other international humanitarian organization to establish a presence in Afghanistan or to fulfill its international function. It has not only forbidden such organizations to work in Afghanistan; it has deliberately bombed hospitals established by French doctors in an effort to drive them out of the country.

Regarding the duration of the Soviet presence in Afghanistan, the Soviet forces have already been there for 4 years, and Moscow gives no sign that it has any intention of withdrawing these forces in the foreseeable future. Finally, the result of the Soviet invasion is the clear and unambiguous denial of the right of the people of Afghanistan to self-determination. The argument put forward by Moscow that the Afghan people exercised their right of self-determination through the so-called Great Saur Revolution of April 1978, thus precluding the need for free elections, is ludicrous on the face of it. The argument is meaningful only to the extent that it reveals Moscow's Orwellian interpretation of self-determination as absorption into the Soviet Empire.

A careful examination of these issues not only helps clarify the illegal and, indeed, the immoral character of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan but also exposes as intellectually pernicious and morally obfuscating any equation of this invasion with the rescue operation undertaken by the United States and six Caribbean nations in Grenada. I have no intention of discussing the issue of Grenada at this time beyond noting that on each and every point mentioned above—the attitude of the people concerned, the legal authority of the action undertaken, the stability and security of the region, the clear threat posed by foreign involvement, the effort to avoid civilian casualties, cooperation with humanitarian agencies, the announced intention to withdraw forces with deliberate speed and by a date certain, the intention to hold free elections in a manner consistent with the principle of self-determination, as well as the additional factor of the safety of innocent U.S. civilians whose lives were endangered—on all of these points and more, Grenada was as different from Afghanistan as day is from night, as liberation from enslavement, as independence from subjugation.

The failure to make such distinctions will not, as some may feel, preserve the integrity of the principle of non-use of force. Rather, it will undermine international law as an instrument for the resolution of conflict in a manner consistent with the purposes and principles of the U.N. Charter.

It is on the basis of these purposes and principles that we support the resolution before us today.[51] This resolution outlines a fair and comprehensive solution to the situation in Afghanistan. It calls for the complete withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan; the right of the Afghan people to choose their own form of government; the restoration of Afghanistan's political independence and nonaligned status; and the rights of the refugees to return to their homes in safety and honor.

My government supports these principles. It supports as well the search for a negotiated political settlement to end the tragedy the Afghan people now endure. We firmly believe that a peaceful settlement is possible, and we strongly support the efforts of the Secretary-General to find such a settlement. Indeed, the Secretary-General and his personal representative for Afghanistan negotiations, Diego Cordóvez, deserve to be commended for their sustained effort to bring about an end to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. We have been pleased to hear of the progress made in the U.N. talks, and my government will continue to support them in the context of the four fundamental principles outlined in the resolution before us today. The Soviet Union, and it alone, can insure the success of these talks by committing itself to a timetable for the total withdrawal of its troops from Afghanistan.

The elements for a fair and just settlement are in place. They have been repeatedly endorsed by the large majority of nations. The world awaits a Soviet act of good faith. The world hopes for a peaceful and free Afghanistan—an Afghanistan in which the people of that country, and they alone, shall determine their country's destiny. Surely if any people in the world has earned the right to self-determination through courage, determination, sacrifice and faith, it is the people of Afghanistan. In an age of cynicism and unbelief, they are authentic heroes. For their courage and resilience, they deserve our admiration. For their just cause, they deserve our support. And for their defense of rights which all people cherish and which constitute the foundation of world peace, they deserve our undying gratitude.

U.S. Strategic Interest "To Have Soviet Troops Removed Back Within the Soviet Union's Borders"

. . . . . .

Let me say something now about U.S. policy.

As I implied at the outset, the United States does not accept Soviet control of Afghanistan. Our policy goal remains to get the Soviet troops out because we believe it suits the strategic interests of ourselves and our friends to have Soviet troops removed back within the Soviet Union's borders. Both our bilateral and multilateral diplomatic activities are designed to move the Soviets toward a negotiated settlement.

We have repeatedly told the Soviets in our bilateral contacts that their occupation of Afghanistan remains a serious impediment to the improvement of relations with us, and with many other countries as well.

In the multilateral arena, we supported Pakistani efforts at the U.N. General Assembly last month to obtain the overwhelming passage of yet another (the 5th) resolution on Afghanistan. [59] The vote was 116 to 20, with 17 abstentions. This is equal to the highest vote ever, which was recorded in 1982. The resolution calls for the withdrawal of Soviet troops, the independent and nonaligned status of Afghanistan, self-determination for the Afghan people, and the return of the refugees with safety and honor.

As regards self-determination, we have not said how this must come about, but simply that the Afghan people must be allowed to determine the type of government they wish to have in Kabul.

We are glad that consultations in the U.N. process of indirect talks on Afghanistan will continue. After providing some hope that a political settlement might be possible following last April's session in Geneva, the indirect talks ran up against hard reality in the later June session in Geneva, when the Soviets were unwilling to give a definite timeframe for the withdrawal of their troops.

At the end of the summer, the talks appeared stalled, but the United Nations announced last week that more active discussions will be resumed early next year. [60]

We support U.N. efforts to develop a negotiated solution and hope they will prove successful.

However, Soviet willingness to withdraw from Afghanistan remains problematical. Current Soviet policy toward Afghanistan

Schaffer, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, and Thomas Gouttierre, Director, Center for Afghanistan Studies, University of Nebraska at Omaha, began at 3 p.m.

[60] The statement of November 30, 1983, by the Spokesman for the U.N. Secretary-General, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, on continuing the U.N. diplomatic process on the Afghanistan situation is in U.N. document SG/SM/3494 (SG/1832).

makes it appear that the Soviets intend to stay for a long time.

They're maintaining current troop levels, they're improving the military infrastructure, they're continuing the Sovietization of Afghan society, and they're attempting to wear down civilian support for the resistance.

Nonetheless, the mujahidin persevere. The struggle continues, and the United States maintains its admiration and moral support of the Afghan resistance. Their stand for freedom and independence is an inspiration to all of us.

. . . . . .

Q. Besides you're saying that we want to get the Soviet troops out of Afghanistan, what are any of the substantial significant political, economic and diplomatic efforts you have been doing recently which could put forth the efforts that you are doing in the last 3, 4 years to bring about the evacuation of the troops from Afghanistan?

MR. SCHAFFER. We have been moving on several fronts. As you know, as I mentioned, we have been giving strong support to the efforts being made by the U.N. Secretary-General's special representative, Diego Cordóvez, in trying to bring about a peaceful solution to the Afghan problem through indirect talks between the Pakistanis and the Karmal regime in Kabul.

We have also given strong support to the U.N. General Assembly resolution which, as I mentioned, was passed with an overwhelming vote.

I think you can also look at the efforts we have made through our economic and military assitance programs to bolster Pakistan as it faces the challenge of the Soviets on its border. And as it leads the fight in the diplomatic effort in the U.N. General Assembly, in the Islamic forum, and elsewhere to keep the Afghanistan issue before the world and to call through these diplomatic and public efforts on the Soviets to get out.

So these are some of the efforts which are being made. And I must say, and one of the purposes in my talking to you today and our holding this Afghanistan Conference next week, [61] is to do all that we can to keep the Afghanistan issue in the international eye, and in the eye of our own public here.

We don't want this to become a forgotten war. That's what the Soviets would like. They would like the world to forget about Afghanistan so they can carry out their programs and turn it into a docile Communist country, something they clearly have not be able to do up until now.

I must say also that we have had direct contacts with the Soviet Union. We have made it very clear to the Soviets that Afghanistan is an important issue in deterring an improvement in U.S.-Soviet relations. We have made it clear to them, most recently when the Secretary wrote to Foreign Minister Gromyko in May [62] that we seek a peaceful settlement in Afghanistan, and that we support the U.N. diplomatic process which Mr. Cordóvez, with considerable effort, has been pursuing.

Regrettably, the Soviet response has been uniformally unhelpful, unfavorable.

Q. What do you anticipate in 1984—a continuation of the present policies or will there be some new initiatives by the United States, by the Pakistanis, or by the Afghan resistance? Is time on the side of the resistance or is it not with the Soviets in the effort?

A. It's hard to say where time comes out on this one. Quite clearly, the Soviets have long felt that time was on their side; that the world, as I said, would forget all about Afghanistan and that, over time, they could Sovietize Afghan society while the world forgot.

I think the trend of the last year has been at least slowly in the direction of the mujahidin. But let's not kid ourselves; the mujahidin are not going to be able to drive the Soviets out of Afghanistan. That's quite clear.

As far as other diplomatic efforts are concerned, the United Nations has announced that Cordóvez will resume his shuttle diplomacy, probably in April.

[61] Dean Thomas Gouttierre chaired the Forum on Afghanistan held in the Loy Henderson Conference Room at the Department of State, December 12–13, 1983.

The key issue there, though, is whether the Soviets are prepared to show greater flexibility and a real interest in finding a negotiated solution than they have been up until now. The key point on that particular issue is this one already referred to about their willingness to agree within this framework of a negotiated settlement, to a particular timeframe for the withdrawal of their troops; actual dates. That they will start on "X" day and they will be out by "X" plus "Y". They've not been willing to do that.

I can't be optimistic that they're going to. I think that the U.N. effort, though, is the best thing that is going now. And, as I've said, we strongly support it because it is consistent with the UNGA resolutions that we and the vast majority of other countries, nonaligned, Western, have supported over the years.

. . . . . .

Q. What's the latest on the use of chemical weapons in Afghanistan?

MR. SCHAFFER. Let me give you a statement on that because I want to be sure that you have it right.

In November of '82, Secretary Shultz sent an updated report to Congress on chemical warfare in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan.[63] That report on Soviet use of chemical and toxin weapons worldwide contained new evidence of their use by the Soviets in Afghanistan.

This evidence included a contaminated Soviet gas mask which came out of Afghanistan and which showed the presence of deadly trichothecene/mycotoxins, that yellow rain.

In other words, the suspicions that we had before that time had been confirmed. We had physical proof that toxin weapons, in addition to chemical weapons, had been used by Soviet forces in Afghanistan.

In the most recent State Department report on CBW, submitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations on August 4,[64] the evidence dealt with blood samples from Laos and Kampuchea.

We continue to receive reports of the use of agents in Afghanistan, and the examination of samples continues. Detailed analysis of all information gathered in Afghanistan in 1983 is not yet complete.

Q. How much aid is the United States giving the rebels, and are you considering increasing it?

MR. SCHAFFER. The rebels themselves, the mujahidin themselves, say that much of the arms that they acquire come from within the country. They're acquired in part from desertions, many desertions, from the Kabul-regime army. As before, I've got to follow the policy of not commenting on arms which might come into Afghanistan from wherever.

Q. Any rough estimate of the Soviets expending dollars, roubles, on an annual basis by maintaining their forces, fighting this guerrilla war, in Afghanistan?

MR. SCHAFFER. The figure I have is that it has cost them in 4 years of war something on the order of $12 billion. And I think the trend is upward. Let me ask the experts about that. (A staff aide nodded.) Yes. The trend is upward, but that's the figure we've been using.

Q. What is the significance for the Soviet Union of holding onto Afghanistan? Is it to reach the warm waters of the Arabian Gulf, or what? Is it a way of seeping through that area, or what do you see as their strategy of being there?

MR. SCHAFFER. I think there are various points of view on that, and a great deal has been written as to whether they see Afghanistan as a stepping stone to broader conquests in the area, or whether their invasion and their remaining in the country is basically motivated by considerations having to do with Afghanistan itself.

I think the important point, though, is that they are in Afghanistan; that as long as they remain there, it causes a major challenge to the stability of the whole area; that it has potential for Soviet use beyond the borders of Afghanistan. It puts pressure on Pakistan, it puts pressure on other parts of that area.

[63] Extracts of Secretary Shultz's report, entitled "Chemical Warfare in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan: An Update," are printed in American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, pp. 918 and 1019.

I'll stop there. Whole books have been written about this subject, but I think that's basically the way we see it.

. . . . . .

Q. To what extent are the other Moslem states, and particularly Iran, helping the mujahidin, and the refugees that are coming out?

MR. SCHAFFER. Pakistan, of course, is the major contributor to assistance to the refugees and has done amazing work, I think, in running the camps in providing the variety of assistance, especially given the fact that it is, itself, such a poor country.

The organization of the Islamic conference which has just been meeting in Dacca in Bangladesh, has once again passed a resolution calling for the departure of foreign troops from Afghanistan. [65]

The Muslim world has been very much interested in this matter. I think they regard Afghanistan as a Muslim country which has been attacked by an outsider, and they have been, led by Pakistan, in the forefront of those calling for the world not to forget it and to continue to demand the Soviet exit.

Q. Without getting involved in the specifics of where the resistance fighters' weapons are coming from, are we at all concerned about their lack of adequate air defense, portable air defense weapons?

MR. SCHAFFER. I think they're doing very well with the heavy machine guns that they've got. Obviously, all resistance leaders are looking for the perfect weapon to use. I think that's about all I can say on that subject.

Q. Because your own report last year [66] indicated that the government had pretty well closed off the source of supply from the Afghan side, Afghan Government side, by impounding those weapons.

MR. SCHAFFER. I can again call your attention to the fact that in '83 the Soviet losses, both of fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters, has been significantly higher than in '82.

Q. Mr. Schaffer, I can't help but ask you this question: There were reports in the media in the last few months that the freedom fighters, the mujahidin, the resistance movement itself is almost in disarray because they cannot get their act together in trying to make a solidarity fight and strong unit or force to be worthwhile in their attempts to penetrate through the Russian encampment there. What do you comment on that?

MR. SCHAFFER. Lack of unity has always been a problem for the Afghanistan resistance. It's been a problem both in Afghanistan in waging the war and outside the country in presenting Afghanistan's position to the international community.

Recently there have been indications of a greater degree of cooperation among different mujahidin groups within Afghanistan, though turf battles continue, some of them we suspect prompted by the regime.

Nonetheless, I think the trend is in the right direction. Outside of the most recent efforts to bring about greater cohesion and hopefully unity have centered on the person of the former king of Afghanistan, Zahir Shah, who reigned in Kabul until 1973.

We have certainly on our part done what we could to encourage efforts to build greater unity, greater cohesion, among the different forces. We hope these will continue. Clearly, it's not up to the United States or, for that matter, any other outside power to decide who should take the lead, but we have tried in a quiet way to encourage the Afghans in that direction.

. . . . . .

Statement by President Reagan, Los Angeles, December 27, 1983 [67]

Fourth Anniversary of the Soviet Invasion of Afghanistan

While Americans are thankful for the blessing of peace at home this holiday season, we do not forget that the tragic war in Afghanistan continues. For 4 long years the Soviet Union has occupied that unhappy land. But for 4 long years the brave Afghan people have held the might of a Soviet occupation force at bay. These Islamic fighters in a faraway land have given new meaning to the words courage, determination and strength. They have set the standard for those who value freedom and independence everywhere in the world.

Afghanistan's freedom fighters—the resistance or mujahidin—represent an indigenous movement that swept through their mountainous land to challenge a foreign military power threatening their religion and their very way of life. With little in the way of arms or organization, the vast majority of the Afghan people have demonstrated that they will not be dominated, and that they are prepared to give their lives for independence and freedom. The price they have so willingly paid is incalculable.

While we will continue to do our part to maintain and improve the U.S.-Soviet dialog, we cannot remain silent on the tragedy of Afghanistan. There should be no misunderstanding that the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan has created serious international tensions. It is not only the Afghans themselves who oppose the Soviet occupation of their country, but virtually the entire world community. This has been demonstrated time and again in five consecutive votes of the U.N. General Assembly, when resounding majorities of the world's nations called upon the Soviet Union to end its occupation and restore the independence and nonaligned status of Afghanistan. In fact, the most recent U.N. resolution was adopted on November 23 by the largest vote yet: 116 to 20. [68]

Early this year, [69] I had the privilege of receiving in my office a group of six Afghan freedom fighters. I was moved by their simple dignity and pride and their determination to continue their struggle for independence. These brave individuals have returned to the fight.

The struggle for a free Afghanistan continues. This is not because of any outside manipulation, but because of the Afghan people's own desire to be free. And their struggle will continue until a negotiated political settlement can be found to allow the Afghan people to determine their own destiny.

Our goal is to do everything we can to help bring about a peaceful solution which removes the Soviet forces from Afghanistan, ends the agony and destruction of the Afghan nation, and restores that country's independence and nonalignment. Clearly, a neutral and nonaligned Afghanistan would not be a threat to its huge Soviet neighbor.

Thus, we mark the fourth anniversary of the Soviet invasion with sadness and continued indignation. But we are convinced that a settlement is possible, and we are glad that consultations in the U.N. process of indirect talks will go on. We call upon the Soviet Union to reach a settlement of the crisis which restores the freedom, independence and nonalignment of Afghanistan.

Let all of us who live in lands of freedom, along with those who dream of doing so, take inspiration from the spirit and courage of the Afghan patriots. Let us resolve that their quest for freedom will prevail, and that Afghanistan will become, once again, an independent member of the family of nations.

Afghanistan: Four Years of Occupation

Overview

Four years after Soviet troops invaded Afghanistan neither a political nor a military solution seems likely in the near future. The Afghan resistance shows no sign of weakening or loss of popular support. The country-wide insurgency continues and the mujahidin deny the Soviets military success.

During 1983 resistance operations against Soviet/regime forces have become more effective even in urban areas. Tactical cooperation has increased among resistance groups and most of the country's land area remains under resistance control. Typically, once Soviet/regime sweep operations have been completed, areas return to mujahidin control. Major problems of supply and disunity remain, however, and resistance forces are unlikely to be able militarily to eject the Soviets from Afghanistan.

Despite some optimism following the April round of indirect negotiations in Geneva that the parties might be able to work out a settlement, the U.N.-sponsored negotiations among the concerned parties have thus far not made significant progress because of Moscow's unwillingness to set a timetable for the withdrawal of its forces. The Soviet Union appears committed to a strategy of attempting to wear down the resistance militarily, gaining control of urban areas, and remodeling the Afghan political and social structure in its own image. Soviet troop strength remains at approximately 105,000.

Afghanistan's internal problems have multiplied as the regime remains factionally divided and as Soviet control deepens. During 1983 economic and administrative chaos increased. The war has severely damaged Afghanistan's social and economic infrastructure, causing major declines in social services, agricultural production, and industrial output. Afghanistan is becoming more dependent upon outside food sources, and its economy is ever more dependent upon Soviet aid.

Significant declines in security in both urban and rural areas have led to increased Soviet use of KHAD—Khedamati-i-Etal'at-i-Dolati, the Afghan intelligence and security organization. KHAD is being greatly expanded but has been ineffective in promoting loyalty to the regime.

Intense Soviet efforts to fashion the Afghan military into an effective force also have failed and the people are increasingly alienated by forced conscription drives. Soviet frustration over inability to stop resistance activities has led in recent months to a deliberate policy of increased brutality and reprisals against the civilian population.

The refugee problem continues to grow. Between one-fifth and one-fourth of Afghanistan's pre-1979 population now lives outside its borders, mainly in Pakistan and Iran. The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the World Food Program (WFP), and a variety of voluntary agencies and governments, including the United States, assist Pakistan in caring for these refugees—the vast majority of whom are determined to return to their homeland when it is freed from foreign occupation.

U.S. policy goals for Afghanistan remain the same. We seek the earliest possible negotiated political settlement in Afghanistan to effect the withdrawal of Soviet forces and end the agony of the Afghan people. Such a settlement must also provide for the other three requirements spelled out in five U.N. resolutions on Afghanistan: the independent and nonaligned status of Afghanistan, self-determination of the Afghan people, and the return of the refugees with safety and honor. The United States supports the U.N. negotiating efforts to achieve these goals.

The Soviet Occupation

In 1983 the military struggle for Afghanistan continued unabated. As before, the Soviets concentrated on building up key logistical bases, securing Kabul and other major cities, improving security for lines of communication, and controlling infiltration routes across the Pakistani and Iranian borders. During the year, no major changes occurred in the size or composition of Soviet forces committed to Afghanistan. The total number remains at about 105,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan with some 30,000 additional men on the Soviet side of the border.

Throughout 1983 Soviet/Afghan forces regularly conducted multibattalion operations designed to interrupt resistance supply lines and respond to reports of mujahidin concentrations, but these efforts have not significantly affected mujahidin activity. The resistance has been remarkably resilient, and the mujahidin today are stronger and better equipped than ever before. They have an extensive intelligence capability and regularly learn in advance about Soviet/Afghan operations from sympathizers in the Afghan military.

Large areas of the country remain under resistance control, and even in principal cities Soviet/Afghan control is being increasingly challenged. Throughout the year the resistance has dramatically demonstrated its ability to extend the war into the capital by regularly conducting operations inside Kabul and its suburbs. During the winter months, Kabul's electricity supply was a principal target of the mujahidin. Power cuts lasting several days were caused by destruction of the power lines leading from power stations outside Kabul, confronting the capital with an energy crisis unprecedented in the 4 years of Soviet occupation. Frequently, only the Pule Charki thermal power station located on the outskirts of Kabul could be relied upon, but its capacity was limited due to repeated interdiction of fuel supplies from Termez on the Afghan/Soviet border. A key petroleum pipeline which services Kabul and the major Soviet airbase at Bagram, 50 km north of Kabul, has been sabotaged so often that it is no longer dependable as a regular source of fuel.

During the summer, Marshal S.L. Sokolov, the Soviet first deputy defense minister, returned to Afghanistan for another inspection tour. Following his previous visit in late 1981, the Soviets significantly stepped up their military operations and increased their troop strength. While there has been no discernible increase of troops or step-up in operations this year, Sokolov's latest visit clearly reflected the Soviet leadership's concern about the progress of the war. The upsurge in reprisals against civilians also appears to reflect growing frustration over failure to stem the resistance.

During the summer, the level of fighting in Kabul was also significantly higher than last year. In mid-June, a few days before resumption of the U.N.-sponsored indirect negotiations, the mujahidin staged a night-long attack against the Soviet-manned Bala Hissar fortress and attacked a Soviet command post near the Darulaman Palace. The attacks resumed in early July with a successful rocket attack on Kabul airport that damaged military and civilian aircraft.

On the night of August 13–14, the mujahidin staged the most ambitious operation in the capital since the Soviet invasion. Using coordinated rocket, mortar, and small arms fire, they attacked Radio Afghanistan, a Soviet residential complex, and the Bala Hissar fortress. On October 1 the mujahidin brought the Soviet Embassy in Kabul under attack for several hours. These incidents, involving some of the most heavily guarded and important installations in the city, along with bombings and frequent assassinations of regime officials, underscore the tenuous government control in Kabul.

In a move to demonstrate the regime's control of the capital, on September 28 Babrak Karmal conducted a highly publicized walking tour of Kabul. That he felt compelled to undertake such a step and the elaborate security precautions necessary to carry it out, only served to further highlight the strength of the resistance.

Large sections of the cities of Qandahar, Mazar-e Sharif, and Herat likewise remain in the hands of the resistance. Movement of regime personnel into many areas of these cities is possible only with substantial military support and during daylight hours. In April, in response to mujahidin attacks, the Soviets conducted heavy bombing and shelling of the western suburbs of Herat. As many as 50 planes a day flew missions over the city, causing extensive damage and resulting in several thousand civilian casualties. This savage bombing of Herat and the surrounding villages, however, brought no improvement in the government's security situation. Even daylight resistance operations in Herat are not uncommon, and fighting in and around the city takes place every night.

Throughout the year, Soviet/Afghan forces also have been repeatedly attacked in and around Qandahar, the country's second largest city. An incident in late August vividly demonstrated the regime's limited control there. The day following a regime speech proclaiming that the power of the "counter-revolutionaries" had been broken in that city, mujahidin from Qandahar and the countryside appeared on rooftops around government installations in the city center and at many military posts surrounding the city. For several hours they taunted regime soldiers through loud speakers and exhorted them to defect.

In recent months, even in Jalalabad, which has been one of the most secure cities in Afghanistan, the situation has eroded with frequent attacks on the airfield. Similarly, the regime faces resistance in northern Afghanistan. Mazar-e Sharif has been subjected to repeated mujahidin attacks. In September, an attack against the airfield outside the city caused extensive damage.

In late April and early May, following a deterioration of security in Paktia and Paktika Provinces, which lie astride supply lines from Pakistan, a major Soviet/Afghan offensive was launched. The operation, involving some 10–15,000 government forces, was designed to relieve pressure on several Afghan cantonments that were under mujahidin pressure and could be resupplied only by air. A Soviet-trained elite Afghan unit, the 38th Commando Brigade, was decimated near the town of Urgun. One battalion was wiped out, and the remainder of the unit deserted to the resistance. This defeat represented a major setback to Soviet efforts to reconstruct the Afghan army.

In late summer, the mujahidin again stepped up pressure in Paktia and Paktika Provinces. During August and September many isolated government outposts in these provinces deserted or were overrun. Major cantonments at Urgun, Khowst, and Jaji Maidan were brought under siege. Although no important towns fell to the mujahidin during the September attacks, the fighting highlighted the growing strength of the resistance in this region and reflected increasing tactical coordination among mujahidin bands inside Afghanistan.

This past year has been marked by increased mujahidin success in convoy interdiction. Resistance efforts in Paktia and Paktika Provinces were significantly boosted by the interdiction of Soviet and regime resupply convoys traveling through the Lowgar Valley. Although additional government military posts have been set up along the major highways to protect the convoys, the mujahidin have proven increasingly skilled in the use of mines and in preventing convoy movement. The road through the Lowgar Valley—which begins just south of Kabul and is the primary land route from Kabul to Paktia and Paktika Provinces—has been a particular problem for the Soviets. Soviet/Afghan convoys were repeatedly ambushed with heavy losses, often forcing the convoys to return to Kabul. Security in the Shomali region south of the Salang Tunnel on the road to Kabul also has posed a major problem for the Soviets. Traffic through this area, the principal line of communication between the Soviet border and Kabul, is often halted for days.

The insurgents likewise have become more efficient this year in combating Soviet air power—Moscow's most effective weapon. Using heavy machineguns, the mujahidin have become adept at downing Soviet MiGs and helicopters. The resistance has capably employed heavy machineguns during attacks on convoys and claims its successes have forced Soviet/regime helicopters to fly at high altitudes, thus reducing their ability to support the ground forces. Although there have been isolated reports of surface-to-air missiles in the hands of the resistance, such weapons are still limited. The presence of a few missiles, however, is sufficient to compel Soviet/Afghan pilots to be more cautious.

A disturbing trend has been the increasing use of reprisal attacks in response to mujahidin successes. The level of violence against the civilian population by Soviet firepower has reached new heights. Attacks against Soviet convoys have led to the destruction of nearby villages, cultivated fields and orchards, and the execution of male inhabitants. In July, Soviet forces executed 20–30 elders in the provincial capital of Ghazni in reprisal for the deaths of several Soviet personnel. In October, following a series of hit-and-run attacks on convoys outside Qandahar, reprisals were launched against villages in the area resulting in significant destruction and the deaths of some 100 civilians.

In the Shomali region, the sustained bombing of villages has created virtual free-fire zones along the highway. The vineyards and orchards of what was once the showcase of Afghan agriculture have suffered irreparable damage from repeated Soviet attacks. In late October during a Soviet/Afghan operation in the Shomali, at least half of the historic town of Istalef was leveled by aerial bombardment and artillery shellings in reprisal for Soviet losses in the area. Civilian casualties totaled several hundred—women and children were bayoneted and village elders shot.

Negotiations and Cease-fire

A new tactic adopted this past year has been the attempted negotiation of cease-fires between resistance groups and the Soviets. While many have quickly broken down, one prolonged highly publicized cease-fire was in the Panjsher Valley—which opens onto the vital Salang pass route between Kabul and the Soviet border. The Panjsher truce, arranged between the mujahidin leader Mahsud and the Soviets without the participation of the Karmal government, reveals the strengths and weaknesses of both the Soviets and the resistance.

The Panjsher cease-fire began in March and officially ended in August, but the valley remains quiet. Coming after six large-scale and costly Soviet Panjsher Valley campaigns over the past 3 years, the truce promised to free Soviet troops for duty elsewhere by reducing the Soviet presence in the valley to token level. At the same time, it provided Mahsud an opportunity to consolidate his position and develop his logistical and economic base and harvest a vital food crop. This cease-fire has also enabled Mahsud to resupply and train his forces and to expand his organization and operations well beyond the Panjsher Valley. In recent months Mahsud's forces have been conducting operations outside the valley in Konduz, Paghman, and the Shomali region.

Soviet Casualties and POWs

Soviet casualties since December 1979 now total at least 17–20,000 killed and wounded. General dissatisfaction with conditions in Afghanistan have prompted a number of Soviet troops to desert. Accounts of indiscipline, drug usage, and black marketing—including the sale of weapons and ammunition—are numerous.

In the early period of the Afghanistan war, there were very few prisoners taken on either side, but now various resistance groups hold Soviet prisoners of war. In 1982 the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was able to work out an agreement among the Karmal regime, the Soviet Union, Pakistan, Switzerland, and the Afghan resistance whereby Soviet prisoners of war captured in Afghanistan and held by the resistance would be taken to Switzerland for internment for 2 years. At the end of their internment, the prisoners would be turned over to the ICRC by the Swiss Government for repatriation. In February 1983 the president of the ICRC [71] told the press that the ICRC would not participate in the forced repatriation to the U.S.S.R. of Soviet prisoners interned in Switzerland. In July one of the eight Soviet prisoners interned under this agreement escaped to West Germany where he is seeking political asylum. Another Soviet soldier arrived in Switzerland on October 28.

Two Soviet army privates from Afghanistan arrived in the United States as refugees on November 28. Their resettlement is being assisted by a private voluntary agency.

Popular Support for the Resistance

Popular support for the mujahidin remains high even though the fighting has brought destruction and reprisals on civilians, has disrupted social services and administration in most of the country, and has contributed to competition for food supplies. Local populations continue to provide the mujahidin with shelter, food, and recruits. Casualties among civilians and the resistance fighters have not reduced mujahidin activities, and morale remains high.

It is impossible to assess the exact number of mujahidin since the numbers fluctuate according to the season and in relationship to the level of Soviet operations in specific areas. Loosely organized in some six main organizations and several smaller groups, the resistance forces operating out of Peshawar are split into two alliances—the moderates and fundamentalists—both calling themselves the "Islamic Unity of Afghan Mujahidin." Despite ongoing efforts—mainly by groups in Peshawar—to promote unity, disagreements between groups, including armed attacks upon each other, are not infrequent.

Allegiance of the fighting groups operating in Afghanistan to headquarters in Peshawar is often flexible and contingent on a continuation of adequate supplies. In the past, only a few of the fundamentalist groups in Peshawar have exercised significant operational control over affiliated units in Afghanistan. However, the major mujahidin offensive in Paktia and Paktika Provinces during September and October was conducted by groups with direct links to Sayed Ahmad Gailani, leader of a moderate group in Peshawar.

Tactical cooperation among mujahidin groups inside Afghanistan has increased during this past year. This has been evident in the Shomali region and in attacks conducted inside the capital. Moreover, mujahidin operations in Paktia and Paktika Provinces have been supported by other resistance groups who have interdicted Soviet/regime convoys traveling through the Lowgar Valley.

While the mujahidin have demonstrated increasing military effectiveness and cooperation this year, the resistance is still plagued by internal divisions and factional fighting. No nationwide resistance organization has yet evolved that is capable of coordinating activities throughout the country, and progress toward organizational and logistical coordination is slowed by serious territorial and ideological rivalries.

Both moderate and fundamentalist alliances have problems of organization. The spring of 1983 witnessed an effort to forestall the fragmentation of the Peshawar-based fundamentalist groups. In May, seven of these groups appointed Professor Abdul Rasal Sayaf, the leader of a minor group, to a 2-year alliance presidency. Despite this mediation, however, internal strains continue within the fundamentalist alliance as some groups accuse others of being more interested in expanding their own power bases than in fighting the Soviets.

Supply shortage remains another serious problem for the resistance. Although small arms appear to be available in sufficient numbers, ammunition, medicines, and frequently food are sometimes critically short. Resistance leaders frequently mention to the media and others the need for increased supplies of heavy machineguns and weapons such as mines and rocket grenades for use against armored vehicles. Nonetheless, this year the resistance has registered a higher kill ratio against Soviet aircraft, increased ability to challenge the Soviet policy of urban control, and continued success in operations against Soviet bases and supply lines.

Participation of Iranian-based Afghans in the resistance has also increased in recent months, although the Iranian Government exercises tight control over cross-border activities. The primary beneficiaries of the limited Iranian support have been the Shia groups in Afghanistan.

The most dramatic new development this year, involving an initiative to organize the resistance more effectively, was an appeal by ex-King Zahir Shah in June concerning the need to create a united organization capable of speaking on behalf of the Afghan people. The timing of the ex-king's announcement stemmed from growing concerns that representatives of the Afghan people have not been included in the U.N.-mediated indirect negotiations in Geneva and frustration over inability to create a united resistance organization. Zahir Shah expressed his willingness "to better coordinate our resistance activities and to better represent them in international conferences and activities." At the same time he also stated that he had no personal ambitions and did not want to reestablish the monarchy.

In August, following consultations with the ex-king, the three groups belonging to the moderate alliance announced the establishment of a "United Front for the Liberation of Afghanistan." Its sponsors called on Zahir Shah to "take necessary measures" to obtain international recognition of a 12-man committee set up to oversee implementation of the united front. The moderates hope that his involvement will provide a rallying point and give new visibility to the Afghan cause, thus increasing their effectiveness in the international arena.

Provisions were made for the accession of other resistance groups to the united front with the same rights as the founding members, thus leaving the door open to participation by the fundamentalists. Although the latter have to date publicly eschewed involvement in any organization involving the ex-king, if Zahir Shah's initiative gains momentum, it could eventually receive some fundamentalist support.

Acceleration of the Government's Problems

As the Afghan resistance against Soviet occupation enters its fifth year, the Soviet-sponsored Babrak Karmal regime faces continued widespread popular dissatisfaction. Most observers feel that the regime could not survive without Soviet military support.

Attacks on Soviet and regime officials are common even in areas claimed to be under government control, and Soviet personnel need extremely tight personal security because of the constant threat of kidnaping and assassination. Increased Soviet brutality against civilians has, moreover, undermined the intense Soviet/regime propaganda campaign portraying the Soviets as peacekeepers and Karmal himself as a beloved and democractically chosen leader.

The Karmal regime has been unable to expand its influence beyond a small coterie of party loyalists, who themselves are divided into warring factions. Factionalism and corruption are serious obstacles for the regime, and steps by the dominant Parcham faction to heal the deep divisions within the party and promote a National Fatherland Front have not been successful. The 12th Party Plenum in early July revealed continuing rifts. Addressing the plenum, Karmal observed that previous decisions had not been fully implemented, a situation which he blamed on "lack of unity, disorganization, lack of ability, and fatalism."

Serious clashes have occurred between the Parcham and Khalq factions, including a confrontation in mid-August near Herat in which more than 100 persons were reported killed. In mid-May, an argument over a military promotion list favoring Parcham officers led to a violent altercation between Minister of Defense Abdul Qader and his Khalq deputy, Major General Khalilullah, who physically assaulted Qader.

Soviet dissatisfaction with Karmal over his inability to unite the warring factions also has surfaced. Rumors have abounded throughout much of the year that a major shift in leadership was imminent. A Cabinet reshuffle in October may have reflected an attempt to alleviate some of the intragovernmental strains. Open Soviet preference for the Parchamis could, however, exacerbate tensions in the party. In early 1983, for example, a money-market scandal involving Soviet advisers and high-level Parchamis was publicized by the Khalq faction in an effort to enhance its own position.

The Afghan intelligence and security organization, KHAD, has been largely ineffective in its efforts to counter the insurgency and ensure loyalty in the military and among the general populace, and its operations have added to the fear and distrust permeating Afghan society. KHAD responsibilities include counterinsurgency, military intelligence, security for Afghan VIPs and official installations, and foreign intelligence and covert action. Organized under Soviet direction, KHAD is designed to assist the Afghan communists in setting up the same kinds of party and government institutions used by the U.S.S.R. to control its own population. The Soviet presence pervades the KHAD leadership, and the KGB continues to play a significant role in training and operations.

KHAD, however, shares in the internecine Parcham-Khalq competition resulting in factionalism, fear, and incompetence within the organization itself. Intraparty violence, moreover, frequently overlaps with mujahidin operations and obscures responsibility for violent acts. Agents in the Parcham-dominated KHAD often provide information enabling the mujahidin to assassinate Khalq party members. The Khalqis play a reciprocal game with the Parchamis. KHAD activities also have contributed to the already low morale with the Afghan military.

It is widely believed in Pakistan that KHAD has sent its agents among refugees to foment discord in the camps and to stir up trouble between the refugees and their Pakistani hosts. Nearly 3 million Afghans now live in Pakistan; the inevitable conflicts over access to land, grazing rights, and social services make fertile ground for KHAD mischief. KHAD agents also are suspected of having infiltrated Afghan resistance organizations based in Peshawar to gain intelligence on mujahidin activities and to exacerbate divisions among the resistance groups. KHAD agents are believed to have fueled Shia-Sunni religious conflicts, especially in border areas of Pakistan's Northwest Frontier Province where most of the refugees have settled, and to have supported the tribal Baluch separatist movement in Baluchistan Province.

In 1983 KHAD was significantly strengthened in an effort to exert greater control over the Afghan civilian population, particularly in the cities. The organization, which now includes between 15–20,000 personnel, is widely recognized as being responsible for prisoner interrogation. Amnesty International—which has appealed to Babrak Karmal to stop torture, arbitrary arrest, and secret trials which deny defendants the right of defense—issued a report in early November citing systematic torture of prisoners.[72] Based on interviews with ex-prisoners and their relatives, the Amnesty International report said those tortured include civil servants, teachers, teenage students, and persons arrested as a warning to others—as well as those actually associated with armed resistance to the regime.

The decline in security this year is only one aspect of Afghanistan's grave internal plight. Domestic opposition to the Soviet presence and to the Karmal regime also has accelerated the trend toward economic and administrative chaos which will take years to repair. The country's social and economic infrastructure has been decimated, and in 1983 the Afghan Government approached the International Monetary Fund seeking credits. Social services, agricultural production, and industrial output continue to suffer reverses, and inflation is estimated at around 20%–25%.

In a speech before the U.N. General Assembly (UNGA) on October 6, Afghanistan's Foreign Minister Mohammad Dost acknowledged the impact of resistance activity on the Afghan economy. He stated that "50 per cent of the country's schools, 14 per cent of our hospitals, 75 per cent of our public transportation vehicles, all communications cables and significant numbers of other public installations have been destroyed."[73] He noted that the damage to the economy totaled $287 million or roughly half of the total investment during the 20 years before the 1978 revolution.

The continued refugee exodus is another impediment to the functioning of social and educational services, as well as the business sector. Reduction of the work force by the continuing flight of refugees, particularly the middle class, has had a similarly negative impact. Shortages of raw materials and manpower as well as lack of security have forced many industrial units to close. Mujahidin operations, moreover, have damaged power facilities and disrupted the flow of petroleum products to urban areas. Most utility projects planned before the Soviet invasion remain uncompleted.

The Afghan economy is increasingly linked with the Soviet Union. In a recent speech at the military academy, Babrak Karmal indicated that the value of trade between the U.S.S.R. and Afghanistan will increase threefold between 1983 and 1987. He noted that more than half of the country's industrial output comes from facilities built with Soviet aid.

Despite other problems, the natural gas industry continues to function more or less normally, due in part to the proximity of the Sheberghan gas fields to the Soviet border. Babrak Karmal claims that revenues from the sale of natural gas amount to 40% of Afghanistan's total exports, but the figure is probably much higher. Afghanistan uses its revenues from gas sales to reduce its debt to the U.S.S.R. and as barter for Soviet machinery and other goods. Afghanistan also exports dried fruit, raisins, and skins and remains a major source of opium; trade in the latter commodity being conducted by Soviet soldiers, as well as by Afghan citizens.

The war's impact on agricultural production varies widely from province to province. Although the Soviet/regime forces have destroyed crops and depopu-

General Assembly, October 6, 1983, printed in Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: South Asia, October 18, 1983, p. C1. The U.N. General Assembly's provisional record of this part of Foreign Minister Dost's statement reads as follows: "half of all schools in the country, 50 percent of our hospitals, 14 percent of public-transport vehicles, 75 percent of all communication lines, a number of hydroelectric and thermal power installations of the country, and other public facilities have been destroyed." (U.N. document A/38/PV.21)

lated many food-producing areas near highways, the country has generally remained self-sufficient in food. Shortages have been experienced mainly in urban areas as a result of swelling urban populations and the interdiction of road transportation by the resistance. Kabul's population now stands at 1.8 million in contrast to 600,000 in 1979; as a result Kabul is increasingly dependent on imported foodstuffs such as wheat, cooking oil, and sugar. Other basic commodities, including medicines, also are generally in very short supply.

The Soviet Union has supplied food and other commodities to meet the basic needs of the cities. In November, for example, the Soviet Union announced agreement to provide Afghanistan with 20,000 tons of wheat immediately and a further 180,000 tons over the next year. According to official press reports from Kabul, half of the wheat would be given as a grant and the other half sold in Kabul in exchange for Afghan goods. This significant increase—115,000 tons of wheat were supplied from the Soviet Union in 1982 and 74,000 tons in 1981—illustrates both increased food shortages and growing reliance on the Soviet Union as a supplier. Although the food supply improved somewhat this year over 1982, a shortfall is again expected during the winter.

Problems in the Military

The Soviets have failed to rebuild the Afghan army, comprised of 40–50,000 men, into an effective military force. Its size is far short of the regime goal and far less than the 90,000 in the Afghan military in 1978. Morale and discipline remain low and the army continues to experience desertions at about the same rate as it gains new conscripts. Many conscripts, in fact, desert and are reconscripted repeatedly. The desertion rate—up to 80% reported in some units—is higher in the less secure and more contested areas of the country.

As a result of recruiting problems and desertions, reservists during 1983 were once again retained beyond their legal release date. Revised draft laws promulgated in August, in concert with a massive conscription drive, further reduced exemptions from military service and increased the flight of eligible men from the country or into rural areas. These latest changes have led to the recall of men who completed their military service as late as 1980. The regime employs the talashi—in which an entire village or section of a city is cordoned off and a house-to-house search conducted for conscripts, weapons, or mujahidin. Following an intensive conscription drive in Kabul during October, Interior Minister Gulabjoi protested that the drafting of recent reservists would severely disrupt the economy.

In addition to problems of low morale and inadequate training and equipment, the army suffers from lack of a skilled officer corps. Many senior officers were killed following the 1978 coup, and the army has been unable to fill this professional vacuum. As part of the effort to rebuild the Afghan armed forces, military personnel annually numbering in the thousands have been sent to the Soviet Union for training. In addition, Soviet advisers serve at all levels of the Afghan army. The Soviet presence has caused considerable problems. As in previous years, during 1983 there were instances of Afghan troops turning on their Soviet advisers.

The Afghan military, which is dominated by the Khalq faction, is further weakened by Khalq-Parcham animosity, with the Khalqis generally taking the view that the Parchamis have sold out to Moscow. The Parchamis in turn suspect the Khalqis of disloyalty and have moved to limit Khalq authority in the officer corps and the military schools.

Despite such problems, Moscow may still have ambitious long-range regional plans for the Afghan military. In 1982, in an interview published by the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug, Afghan Minister of Defense Abdul Qader asserted that the Afghan army will have a significant future role, similar to that played by the Cuban and Vietnamese armies. Tanjug also quoted a 1981 statement by Babrak Karmal that, "Not far away is the day when our army will become a strong and energetic army capable of defending peace and security not only in Afghanistan, but in the region as well."

The Refugees

At year's end 2.9 million Afghan refugees were in Pakistan, according to official Government of Pakistan figures, while an estimated 650,000 Afghan refugees were in Iran. (About 850,000 Afghans worked in Iran before 1979, bringing the present total of Afghans in Iran to roughly 1.5 million.) Before the Soviet invasion, some 14–17 million persons lived in Afghanistan, meaning that between one-fifth and one-fourth of the country's population has now been displaced outside its borders.

Although the refugee exodus has slowed down, it continues steadily, picking up when fighting becomes heavier or when food supplies are particularly scarce. This fall, for example, fighting in Paktia and Paktika Provinces caused a new flight into Pakistan's North Waziristan and Kurram Agencies along the Afghan border. A campaign by the Kabul regime to convince refugees that it is safe for them to return to Afghanistan has been a complete failure. Increasingly harsh Soviet reprisals against civilians suspected of collaborating with the mujahidin will no doubt increase the refugee flow into Pakistan and Iran.

In addition to those persons who have left Afghanistan, an undetermined number have been displaced within the country itself as fighting and destruction have driven people into urban areas. Since the Soviet invasion, the Kabul population, for example, has expanded by an estimated 1.2 million despite the exodus from the city of large numbers of businessmen and other professionals.

Loss of much of the country's educated elite and work force has had a serious negative impact on the Afghan economy. Furthermore, changes in the country's ethnic balance and destruction of the educational and social infrastructure have combined with the loss of educated professionals to create social problems that will endure for many years to come.

The UNHCR has, with the assistance of the Government of Pakistan, undertaken an international relief program for the refugees in Pakistan which includes basic housing and health and educational services. Despite the heavy burden the refugee influx has placed on Pakistan, the refugees have been welcomed and good rapport continues between them and their hosts. Pakistani assistance to the refugees includes some cash allowances to individuals and payment of relief administration costs. Contributions from several other countries and international voluntary agencies have greatly assisted this program.

The Afghan refugees in Iran have not been handled in any systematic way and there have been no international relief efforts there.

Most of the Afghan refugees are Pathan and, therefore, feel comfortable in the Pathan-dominated Northwest Frontier Province (NWFP). Due to the large concentration of refugees in the Northwest Frontier Province, however, Pakistani authorities began in 1982 to move refugees into new camps in less populated parts of the adjacent non-Pathan Punjab Province. Efforts to move the refugees increase the possibility of conflicts between the refugees and their hosts. Nonetheless, more than 40,000 Afghans were relocated from the NWFP in order to relieve population pressures and provide better living conditions. Large numbers, however, subsequently left the Punjab to return to Pakistan-Afghanistan border areas citing adverse climatic conditions in the south and a desire to remain close to their homeland.

Pakistani authorities continue seeking ways in which to manage the massive refugee population to the advantage of all concerned. President Zia has reaffirmed his commitment to a political solution including repatriation, and the Government of Pakistan adheres to a ruling by the Organization of the Islamic Conference that no member country should deal with the Karmal regime.

Working through the UNHCR, the World Food Program, and a variety of voluntary agencies, the U.S. Government continues to share in the international assistance program. Since 1980, the United States has contributed more than $300 million to Afghan refugee relief. During fiscal year 1983, the United States contributed $80 million to support Afghan refugees in Pakistan, including $49 million through the WFP. The U.S. contribution represents some 35% of the total UNHCR budget and about 50% of the international food contribution.

Soviet Strategy

The Soviets have failed to reduce the level of the insurgency, but they do not seem to have changed their long-term goals or altered their overall strategy in Afghanistan. Their troop strength remains at approximately 105,000 men. Furthermore, they seem to believe, perhaps erroneously, that in terms of international reaction, the worst is over. While Afghanistan has proved to be a far knottier problem than Moscow originally envisaged, the Soviets seem to judge that the costs are bearable and that in the long run they will be able to wear down the insurgency.

If anything, Moscow's commitment to preserving a pro-Soviet, Marxist-dominated regime in Kabul appears to have grown over the last 4 years as the Soviets have come to view Afghanistan as a test of their credibility. Despite constant rumors, the Soviets evidently are unprepared to replace Babrak Karmal, probably because no viable alternative exists.

The Soviets appear to be trying to impose a Soviet-style political and economic system. Their efforts, however, have been frustrated by the unsettled conditions in the countryside. Still, where possible, the Soviets have introduced changes aimed to increase the central government's control and security. Afghan Government and party officials are routinely sent to the U.S.S.R. for training and indoctrination.

The Afghan economy has been progressively integrated into the Eastern bloc. Afghanistan was an observer at the October 1983 council meeting of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance in Havana. Last spring, TASS announced that the U.S.S.R. was the main trading partner of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. The Soviets control Afghanistan's natural gas industry, virtually all Afghan gas going to the U.S.S.R. to service Kabul's Soviet debt. Moscow's current ambassador to Afghanistan [74] was previously the first secretary of the Tartar Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic where he oversaw the development of the West Siberian oil and gas fields.

Since the invasion, 10–20,000 Afghan students have been educated in the U.S.S.R. Moscow considers this program sufficiently important to exempt the students from military service in Afghanistan. There has been a steady stream of articles in Soviet academic journals and the national press comparing Afghanistan with the U.S.S.R.'s Central Asian republics, where final pacification and integration took a similar form.

In their approach to Afghan tribal and nationality problems, the Soviets have taken another page out of their own Central Asian experience as they pursue a policy of divide and rule. The Karmal regime's strategy has been to offer large sums of money, weapons, and privileges as an inducement to tribes and villages to abandon the resistance and to obstruct mujahidin activity. It was the failure of this program—with previously neutral tribal groups joining the resistance instead—that contributed to the government setbacks in Paktia and Paktika Provinces this year.

In recent months the regime has widely publicized the surrender of mujahidin groups under an official amnesty program. The resistance, however, discourages potential collaborators from aiding the regime by regularly using assassination and other forms of retaliation against government supporters. Mujahidin frequently accept arms and cash subsidies from the government only to return to the resistance after a few months. To date no major sustained defections from the mujahidin to the regime have occurred.

Status of the U.N.-Sponsored Negotiations

U.N. efforts to help negotiate a solution to the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan date from a November 1980 resolution by the U.N. General Assembly. [75] The then Secretary-General, Kurt Waldheim, appointed Pérez de Cuéllar as his personal representative to see if the United Nations could play an active and useful role in negotiations concerning Afghanistan. When Pérez de Cuéllar succeeded Waldheim, he followed the same formula and appointed Diego Cordóvez, U.N. Under Secretary General for Special Political Affairs, to act for him on the problem.

Cordóvez shuttled between Kabul and Islamabad in April 1982 and gained agreement for a round of indirect talks between Pakistan and Afghanistan which were held in Geneva that June. Iran decided not to participate formally but agreed to be kept informed and thus associated with the talks.

Following these discussions, the United Nations, Pakistan, and Afghanistan all issued positive statements and indicated that there was a measure of flexibility in the negotiating positions of both sides. Kabul apparently agreed in principle to allow the subject of troop withdrawal to be part of the negotiating package and to accept the idea that at some point the refugees must be consulted on the conditions of their return. Cordóvez announced in a press conference that he kept a written record of the understandings that he has reached and that he would work from these texts in subsequent discussions.

From January 21 to February 7, 1983, Cordóvez again visited the area to refine the text of the agreement. His consultations dealt with four items previously identified for consideration: withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan; noninterference and nonintervention; international guarantees of a final settlement; and voluntary return of the refugees.

During Pérez de Cuéllar's March visit to Moscow, he and Cordóvez exchanged views on the Afghanistan situation with both Chairman Andropov and Foreign Minister Gromyko. According to the Secretary General, the Soviet Government expressed itself strongly in favor of a political settlement and supported a continuation of his efforts.

A second round of indirect talks took place in Geneva from April 11 to April 22, 1983. Cordóvez met separately with the Pakistani and Afghan Foreign Ministers and with Soviet observers daily to further develop the text of a possible agreement. Once again Cordóvez also kept Iran informed of the discussions. At the conclusion of this round, there were suggestions that a breakthrough might be possible.

After consultations with the capitals concerned, another round of indirect talks took place in Geneva from June 12 [16] to 24, 1983. Although the parties reportedly made progress in defining the nature of a comprehensive settlement—its principles and objectives, the interrelationship among its four components, and the provisions for its implementation—the talks stalled on the crucial issue of the Soviets' unwillingness to provide a timetable for troop withdrawal from Afghanistan. Although the parties had agreed that Cordóvez should visit the region in September for further discussions, Pérez de Cuéllar decided in late summer that such a visit at that time would not be productive.

On November 23, the UNGA again passed a resolution urging immediate withdrawal of all foreign troops from Afghanistan by a vote of 116 to 20, with 17 abstentions—the largest majority since the Soviet invasion nearly 4 years ago. [78] This was the fifth time since January 1980 that the UNGA had called for a troop withdrawal from Afghanistan, each time by overwhelming margins.

Also during the UNGA, Pérez de Cuéllar and Cordóvez met informally with both the Pakistani and Afghan Foreign Ministers to explore conditions for resuming the diplomatic process. On November 30, the United Nations announced that Cordóvez would continue the diplomatic process by further negotiations in Islamabad, Kabul, and Tehran at a mutually convenient date.

Transcript of a White House Press Briefing, October 24, 1983 (Extract) [1]

Visit of Lieutenant General Ershad of Bangladesh

. . . . . .

[Senior Administration Official.] This is a visit which I think is characterized by agreement. Our bilateral relations are good. The President has invited General Ershad here in confirmation of those good relations between the two countries.

Much of the emphasis in our bilateral relations is on internal affairs in Bangladesh because we participate extensively through the vehicle of our assistance programs. We provide assistance, I think it's $164 million in a year, [2] about evenly divided between development assistance and food. And this very substantial amount reflects the extent to which we have been able to agree with Bangladesh on development policy. In this case, Bangladesh is an excellent example of a country which has set forth development policies, constructive development policies which we believe will move this country closer to solving its problems.

The briefing was conducted on background by a senior administration official beginning at 3:03 p.m. Omitted here are introductory comments on Ershad's schedule of meetings with U.S. officials by Leslie A. Janka, Special Assistant to the President and Deputy Press Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Janka's introduction of the briefing official, and Janka's concluding remarks.

Of course, it started in 1971 in great poverty and in recent years has shown a considerable ability to set forth policies which the Government of Bangladesh and we believe can move Bangladesh considerably closer to resolving its food and population problems.

The President will expect to take up with General Ershad a broad range of both international as well as these bilateral issues. We anticipate that General Ershad will seek a reaffirmation of our ongoing aid relationship.

He's also meeting with American businessmen to encourage increased U.S. private investment in Bangladesh. Among the major development policy reforms which have been taken in Bangladesh is a giving of much greater emphasis to the private sector. In fact, the government has denationalized a number of government-owned industries, some with rather positive results.

Therefore, in recognizing the role which he wishes to give the private sector in development, General Ershad is seeking American private investments. Obviously, this is something with which the administration agrees and we will be encouraging him to proceed along these lines.

We will also be expressing our interest in General Ershad's plans which he has announced to restore democratic institutions in Bangladesh. In fact, there is a process of elections which he has announced which will begin with local elections next December and proceed on to parliamentary elections. I believe it's in early 1985.

We, furthermore, applaud Bangladesh's constructive foreign policy actions in a number of international bodies in which Bangladesh is active—the nonaligned, the Group of 77, [3] the underdeveloped, the Islamic Conference which is the organization of Islamic—World Islamic countries and a newly formed South Asian regional organization, South Asian Regional Cooperation Organization which Bangladesh proposed and which has moved now through the stage of foreign ministers' meetings and may go on to one of chiefs of state.

So, we will be noting, as I said at the beginning, our appreciation for many of Bangladesh's policies, its development policies, its moving on to Democratic institutions as well as for its moderate positions on international issues. And I might mention a couple.

Bangladesh has been very strong—taken a very strong position in regard to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and Bangladesh also has—supports positions which—of ASEAN and positions which we support in regard to Kampuchea.

I think I would close my opening remarks at that point and take any questions. Yes?

Q. You talked about the move toward democratic—restoring democracy. Is the United States confident that that schedule can be kept and that there actually will be a new parliament in 2 years?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We would not express a view on—it is for General Rashad [Ershad?] to plan and to schedule and carry these things out. But we accept that he has set this forth in full sincerity, that it is his intention to move in this direction.

Q. So, the U.S. position is that there's no concern on the part of Washington in terms of the timetable—when this takes place, only that it takes place?

[3] Formed in 1964 by 75 developing countries during the first U.N. Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD I), the Group of 77 acquired its name after the membership had expanded by two. Currently representing some 116 Third World nations it has functioned as a caucus for economic matters in many forums, particularly in the United Nations.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We're pleased by the announcement which he has made because we think that this progression, the return to democracy, is constructive and we of course will be telling him that when he is here.

Q. What's the PL–480 [4] agreement that's going to be signed?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It's a further food grain agreement—wheat.

Q. How much of an increase?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. — $65 million.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. — $65 million.

Q. An additional $65 million in wheat?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Excuse me. It's not additional.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Oh.

Q. It's not additional? It's part of the ongoing—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It's a part of our ongoing program but it is an additional agreement beyond the last agreement. These are annual—

Q. —part of the 164? Is that it or—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It's a part of the 164, yes.

Q. Are they getting any military aid?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. Nothing military, just economic?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No. We have no FMS credits program.

Q. Just economic in aid?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes, that's right.

Q. Will he be coming here asking anything else of the U.S. government according to your anticipation at this point?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. This is obviously for him to say.

Q. I know, but would you anticipate that? Are things on the table right now that need to be expedited or anything like that?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No, I think that we're moving forward with this PL–480 agreement. We have under negotiation an investment agreement, but this will not be produced at this time.

Q. I'll just go ahead and show my ignorance. I don't know anything about this general. Can you tell me about him—I mean, how he took power and what's he like?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes. He was the Chief of Staff of the Bangladesh Army, had been for some years. And he took control of the government in March of '82 after a period of instability, of what was said to be ineffective government. I think that was probably a situation of uncertainty in regard to government.

Q. It was a coup?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes, yes, he took over control of government.

Q. And what's he like? I mean, is he—what are his views?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I've described his positions on policies, both international and domestic. I think that's the best indication of his views. He will be—He's having I believe, a breakfast session at the National Press Club. When is that?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Wednesday morning. [5]

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Wednesday morning. So, that'll be a time for him to state his views.

Q. What's the position the government took in the United Nations on the Korean airlines voting? [6]

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. They made quite a strong statement, and they voted for the resolution at the International Civil Aviation Organization, the resolution which we supported. [7]

Q. Can you give us from your experience some insight into how life may have changed in Bangladesh since their great difficulties when they got started?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes, I'd like to do that. Understand at the beginning that this is a very poor country. But the change from 1971 to the present is a change from a great need for relief and from donor countries providing relief to a situation of development in which our emphasis and that of all other donors is on development as on positive movement forward.

There has been substantial progress. There's been progress in agriculture. It's slow. It's difficult. But it moves ahead nonetheless. For example, we were looking at numbers the other day about one winter crop. They have three food grain crops a year, and the winter rice crop, which is the one supported by high technology, has had a phenomenal increase of over 100 percent in the last seven years in productivity.

Don't misunderstand me: The overall agricultural production has been at a more modest rate. But it represents movement ahead with some prospect ultimately of solving their food problem.

Q. Is there U.S. AID projection of when they might be self-sufficient in food?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think AID may have its own projections. I've learned to be careful about that, if only because of the unpredictability of weather. Last year they had a drought; this year they've had floods. So, it's—And the figures, the graphs go like this, overall upward. But it's hard to make projections which I'd like to put into print.

Q. Is it something that's conceivable in this century?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Oh, yes. I think so.

Statements of President Reagan and Bangladesh President of the Council of Ministers Ershad, October 25, 1983 [8]

U.S. Relations With Bangladesh

THE PRESIDENT. Today we're honored to welcome Lieutenant-General H.M. Ershad, President of the Council of Ministers of Bangladesh. Over the past year and a half, General Ershad's government has taken steps to restore democratic institutions and economic growth to the people of Bangladesh.

In our useful and cordial conversations today, the General and I have had an opportunity to discuss these admirable goals and other matters of concern to our two countries. We especially appreciate the General's dedication to the economic development of his country. The self-help reforms which his government has put in place reflect this commitment to reinvigorate development and better the lives of the Bangladesh people.

General Ershad's government understands the vital role of private enterprise. Changes taking place should attract private investment to the opportunities available in that deserving country. The United States is proud of its long association and support for the people of Bangladesh. Today we pledge our continued support. We look forward to further cooperation between our two governments as Bangladesh seeks to overcome problems of hunger, overpopulation, and poverty.

In the political realm, the General has now set in motion a process designed to build a broad base of popular support for economic and social development in his country. We endorse this goal since we believe that long-term political stability can be achieved only through representative government.

Lastly, the United States wishes to applaud Bangladesh, a member of the nonaligned movement, for its constructive approach to issues of regional and global concern. To cite only a few examples: Bangladesh clearly manifested its courage and resolve in its unswerving responses to aggression in Afghanistan and Kampuchea. It also took the lead in establishing the South Asian Regional Cooperation Organization—a body designed to build a more prosperous and stable region for the people of South Asia. Bangladesh's foreign policy has exhibited an activism, moderation, and force of moral conviction which has earned the respect of the world.

General Ershad, we hope that the remainder of your visit to this country will be pleasant and we're happy to have had you with us.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL ERSHAD. Excellency, President Ronald Reagan, distinguished representatives of the United States news media, ladies and gentlemen, it is both a great privilege and pleasure for my wife and myself and for the members of my delegation to be in the United States of America.

We are grateful to President Ronald Reagan for the thoughtful and cordial invitation which he has kindly extended to us to visit this great country. We bring with us the warm greetings and sincere good wishes of the people of Bangladesh.

My meeting with the President was very satisfying, and I thank him for having received me despite his preoccupation at this critical moment. The comprehensive and productive exchange of views which we have just had is an unmistakable demonstration of our friendship.

The object of my visit is to reinforce and consolidate the relations between the United States of America and Bangladesh, which I'm happy to say, has been achieved.

During our meeting, the President and I covered a wide range of subjects. It gives me great pleasure to say that we have had the opportunity of reaffirming our two countries shared perceptions and close identity of interests in strengthening the process of peace, progress and prosperity for mankind.

I have apprised the President of the intensive level of activity which my government has undertaken to improve the quality of life of our 95 million people, a large measure of whom live in rural Bangladesh. I have explained that my government is committed to laying firm political and economical foundations for the long-term development and social benefits for our people. We have already undertaken significant measures in the fields of population control, food production, rural unemployment and energy production. These have involved the organization and the centralization of our administration, the streamlining of our judiciary and extensive work in reviewing colonial laws, on the one hand, and our outdated education system, on the other.

We hope, sir, that these basic efforts will substantially reinforce the base we must have for the restoration and maintenance of democratic values which are integral to our society.

We are about to launch ourselves into local government elections this winter, followed by elections at progressively higher political echelons throughout 1984, leading to the elections to our Parliament in March 1985. Over 40 million people will go to the polls, not merely to elect their representative, sir, but to lay the political and economic foundation for our future, to enable our people to live freely and to live with honor and dignity by the grace of God.

The President and I have agreed to explore possible ways and means towards furthering strengthening the close bonds of friendship and cooperation between out two countries. Indeed, I am most grateful to you, sir, for the deep and abiding interest you have personally shown in the welfare and progress of our people and for the moral support and economic assistance which have been extended to us.

As members of the Organized Islamic Conference, an unaligned movement in the Commonwealth, and—as chairman of the Group 77, Bangladesh firmly believes the current international economic situation needs the closest vigilance by the whole community of nations, recognizing that interdependability is indispensable as a way of life in this day and age.

The role of the United States is a crucial and critical one in this regard. It is, indeed, a matter of great satisfaction that the President and I, in discussing these issues, fully agree that global peace and stability is closely interlinked with the need to restore confidence in the current economic climate in both developing and developed countries.

We, in Bangladesh, deeply appreciate the importance of the vital role of the United States in upholding the principles of maintaining peace and stability in the world, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations. I warmly welcome your recent reassuring statement in the United Nations General Assembly in this regard.

I'd like to mention here that I have conveyed to the President our profound sorrow and anguish in the tragic loss of life in the recent days in Beirut. We share your grief, and on behalf of my government and people, I extend our heartfelt condolences to the families of the deceased.

My wife and I have been deeply touched by the warm hospitality extended to us and the members of our delegation. Our stay in the U.S. capital, the beautiful city of Washington, though short, has been most pleasant and rewarding. I have no doubt that I speak on behalf of all of us when I say that we shall treasure these happy moments and cherish the memory of your warm friendship.

During our meeting, I extended our most cordial invitation to the President to pay a State visit to Bangladesh as early as is convenient. It is my sincere hope that you will visit our country soon and see for yourself the high esteem in which you are held and the enormous fount of goodwill that exists in Bangladesh for your people.

Mr. President, I wish you good health, happiness, long life and every success.

And I thank you, ladies and gentlemen of the media, for your time and patience. Thank you.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Schaffer) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 8, 1983 (Extract) [1]

U.S. Aid to India

. . . . . .

India, the largest and most powerful nation in the region, remains fundamentally stable despite ongoing economic difficulties, communal and caste disturbances, and unrest in its troubled Northeastern region. Domestic tensions are likely to continue, but will not threaten the political system itself. Since her return to power in 1980, Mrs. Gandhi has governed in accordance with India's democratic traditions. Notwithstanding recent electoral defeats in some states, the Prime Minister and her Congress (I) party retain a dominant position in the Parliament. She is the only political figure with genuinely national support and can be confident of holding office for the balance of her 5-year term ending in January 1985, if not longer. Given its many decades of experience with representative institutions and a capable national bureaucracy, India can be confidently expected to remain a democratic and united country. It is clearly in the interest of the United States that it does so.

During the past 2 years, the Indian leadership has begun to turn toward a more open, liberalized, and private sector orientation for the economy. We welcome and encourage this more pragmatic direction in economic policy. India has undertaken an ambitious plan that emphasizes development of its petroleum resources, which now meet half of its needs, and improvement in infrastructure services and industrial performance. Capitalizing on its sound credit rating, India has begun to borrow significantly on the commercial markets. With the assistance of a $5.7 billion IMF program, the government is undertaking structural adjustment to improve its balance-of-payments situation.

Since its independence, India has played an active role in international affairs. A generally moderating and constructive influence in the Non-Aligned Movement, [2] India as its new chairman is expected to help guide the NAM back to the mainstream approaches that earlier prevailed. During the past 2 years India has sought to reinvigorate its relations with the West, particularly in the economic and commercial areas but also in military supply arrangements. Mrs. Gandhi's successful visit here last year highlighted the desire on both sides for an improved relationship. [3] At the same time India has retained important ties with the Soviet Union. This basically nationalistic and non-aligned posture of Indian foreign policy is likely to continue.

The administration attaches great importance to maintaining constructive relations with India and has sought ways to expand its dialog with India and to work together more closely. Along with U.S. contributions to the World Bank (which disbursed over $2 billion last year to India), our aid program helps demonstrate our commitment to India's development. Foreign assistance comprises but one aspect of the multi-faceted reflection of U.S. interests in the country. Our political dialog has been intensified in recent months. Our trade relationship is of increasing significance to both countries. In 1982 for example we purchased $1.4 billion (or seven times the level of our aid) in Indian goods, many of which entered under the Generalized System of Preferences. [4] EXIM Bank has extended preliminary commitments covering over $1.6 billion in potential sales of American equipment to India. In response to a more attractive business climate in India and to that country's desire for Western technology, the administration is seeking to encourage U.S. firms to take advantage of business opportunities there. An OPIC Investment Mission has just returned from India. The Department of Commerce is currently conducting seminars in 15 cities on doing business in India. A panel of senior scientists established by the two heads of government has begun to design areas for enhanced joint research.

Our proposed program for India in FY 1984 of $86 million in Development Assistance, $123 million in PL–480 Title II and $200,000 in IMET will continue to concentrate on agriculture, particularly irrigation, and nutrition. Perhaps the greatest achievement of our assistance programs has been in the agriculture sector, which provides a livelihood for the vast majority of Indians and accounts for 40 percent of GNP. The United States in the mid-1960's helped India bring about its Green Revolution, [5] which remarkably has resulted in near self-sufficiency today. As was demonstrated again last year when India had to purchase 4 million tons of wheat from U.S. markets, the food balance depends precariously on the vagaries of weather. By helping to expand and improve the irrigation system, we contribute to India's ability to produce enough food for its population, which continues to grow at a disappointingly high rate.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, June 21, 1983 [6]

U.S. Policy Toward India

A question was asked yesterday at the noon briefing about Ambassador Barnes' comments in India. Although information on the subject was not available at that time, we would like to offer the following:

In view of certain misunderstandings arising from distorted reports of recent remarks by Ambassador Barnes, [7] the Embassy of the United States is releasing the following statement of U.S. policy contained in a letter from Secretary of State George Shultz to Foreign Minister Rao dated March 1, 1983. This has been and remains the policy of the United States. "This administration is firmly committed to the unity and territorial integrity of India. We view this unity and integrity as key elements in the stability of the entire South Asian region, something very much in the interest of the United States. In no way, therefore, should the decision to grant Dr. Chohan a visitor's visa be construed as U.S. Government approval of, let alone support for, the views of Dr. Chohan or the Sikh separatist movement."

[6] Source: Office of Press Relations, Department of State; posted statement. The statement was posted in response to a question asked at the Department of State Daily Press Briefing on June 20, 1983.

[7] On June 16, 1983, demonstrators in front of the U.S. Embassy in New Delhi protested the remarks of Ambassador Harry Barnes who equated the Khalistan movement in northern India to the Puerto Rican demands for freedom. To Indian officials these statements as well as the granting of a visa to the movement's leader, Dr. Chohen, made it appear that the United States was supporting the Khalistan separatist movement.

Remarks by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the India–U.S. Joint Commission, New Delhi, June 30, 1983 [8]

The Work of the India–U.S. Joint Commission

It is an honor to cochair this joint commission session, and I welcome the opportunity to reaffirm with you the enduring ties between our two countries. These ties are based on the principles of freedom and democracy, cherished by both India and the United States. As former colonies, we understand the struggle to achieve independence from foreign domination. As free peoples, we respect individuals' right to choose their own government. As representatives of the oldest and the most populous of the world's democracies, respectively, we must continue to uphold our ideals. U.S. relations with India will be sustained by these values and our determination to cooperate in areas of mutual interest.

The work of the joint commission and its four subcommissions is an important and highly promising aspect of our bilateral relationship. The activities of the subcommissions in the fields of economics and commerce, science and technology, education and culture, and agriculture enable us to work together despite political differences. They contribute to the more constructive ties with India that President Reagan is determined to maintain, and which I might say, the Prime Minister's visit to the United States about 10 months ago did so much to develop.

Let me review briefly the work of the subcommissions. First, the Economic and Commercial Subcommission has continued to function as a forum for free and frank discussions of mutual economic interests. The subcommission should continue to study measures to improve the environment for commercial and economic activities between the two countries. We favor early negotiations on a tax treaty—an area where concrete progress is possible in our commercial relations. We would also encourage the subcommission to focus on the most promising areas for expanded trade and investment, such as the energy, communications, agribusiness, and electronics sectors where mutually beneficial technology transfer prospects exist.

[8] Source: Department of State Bulletin, September 1980, pp. 32–33. The Secretary was in New Delhi as part of his official visit to East and South Asia and the Middle East, June 23–July 8, 1983. He visited the Philippines, June 25–26; Thailand, June 26–29; India, June 30–July 2; Pakistan, July 2–4; Saudi Arabia, July 4; Lebanon, July 5; Syria, July 5–6; Israel, July 6–7; Jordan and Egypt, July 7. The Secretary returned to Washington on July 8.

The work of the Subcommission on Science and Technology continues to enjoy a healthy momentum. A dozen U.S. agencies are cooperating with their counterpart Indian organizations on over 50 projects. We are particularly pleased by the new impetus given to our joint session and technology work by the formation and progress of the senior scientific panel, which grew out of the 1982 meeting between President Reagan and Prime Minister Gandhi. We look forward to results within 2 years from many of the project areas recommended by the panel, including monsoon predictability research and immunology research.

Our Subcommission on Agriculture covers one of the most important areas of cooperation between our two countries. Even before the formation of the subcommission, India and the United States had collaborated on literally hundreds of agricultural research and development projects. Although the Subcommission on Agriculture is the youngest one of our subcommissions, working groups are functioning to cover research and education, agricultural inputs and applied technology, natural resource management, and extension and training. In the area of agriculture, the senior scientific panel has recommended important projects on biomass and nitrogen fixation. We support the efforts of the subcommittee, through its ad hoc committee, to facilitate planning and coordination of the exchanges in this very important area.

The last, but certainly not the least, of the subcommissions is devoted to education and culture. Already this subcommission has supported some very successful exchanges but those are only a foretaste of the vast variety of exchanges planned for 1984 and 1985. President Reagan and Prime Minister Gandhi designated those 2 years for special emphasis on educational, cultural, and scientific exchanges, and we are working hard to make them a success. Both sides have designated groups of prominent citizens to marshal our efforts for 1984 and 1985.

Over the next 2 years, we support the establishment of new ties and enlargement of existing ties among a wide spectrum of groups and individuals in both countries. We hope that special efforts can be made to initiate the planned Nehru studies program in the next academic year. We welcome the decision of the Education and Culture Subcommission to draw up a program of seminars and discussions on our shared democratic experience.

Successful execution of the many activities already planned for all the subcommissions is essential. Moreover, we need to explore ways to place their activities on a solid, long-term basis. There have been preliminary informal discussions between our governments and within my own government on how to do this. One possibility would be to create a binational endowment which the United States, for its part, would fund with a portion of the rupees it now holds. We hope that it would be possible to develop some concrete proposals in this area by the end of the year.

Finally I would like to express my personal satisfaction with the success of our subcommission and the creative efforts under their auspices. I am a firm believer in the long-term beneficial effects of cooperation in any field where cooperation is possible. I know that Indo-U.S. cooperative programs have helped us to build a better bilateral relationship and I am confident that they will continue to do so.

Remarks by the Secretary of State (Shultz), New Delhi, June 30, 1983 [9]

Indo-U.S. Relations

Today I had the opportunity to meet with many of you in this room, and I think we had a fruitful day's work. We have exchanged views on issues of international importance, reviewed areas where our two countries interact, and charted the tasks which will draw our two countries even closer together in the future. Our discussions have reinforced the spirit of frank and constructive interaction which has marked Indo-U.S. relations, especially since Prime Minister Gandhi's visit to the United States last year. I would like to note some of the objectives we seek for this region.

The American goal in South Asia is a stable, peaceful, prospering region. This is not a pious hope. Our interests are best served by a regional, as well as global, order in which each nation is in control of its destiny, immune from foreign intervention, and free to promote the welfare of its citizens.

Before arriving in India, I had the opportunity to meet with the ASEAN leaders, whose firm commitment to regional cooperation has resulted in tangible political and economic gains in Southeast Asia. We encourage regional cooperation in South Asia and welcome the recent initiatives by India and other countries of the region to work toward greater cooperation and alleviate the potential for conflict. In turn, regional cooperation will discourage those who would upset the equilibrium of the region, the most recent and tragic example being the continued presence of over 100,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

As leader of the Nonaligned Movement, India not only has a special role in fostering regional cooperation but plays an important international role representing the aspirations of the members of the movement. We have our differences over certain elements in the declarations of the nonaligned summit. We, nonetheless, value and will continue to pursue a continuing dialog on political and economic issues raised by the Nonaligned Movement.

Particularly on international economic issues, as you noted, the healthy functioning of the global trade and financial system depends heavily on the participation of both the developing countries and the industrial countries. This is a relationship of mutual responsibility and a positive North–South dialog should aim at restoring and sustaining worldwide economic growth. We have had a useful exchange of views today on economic and financial issues. In the past year we have explored many avenues to strengthen mutually beneficial linkages between the Indian and U.S. economies. These efforts will continue. India's record of economic development is an impressive one, and it is one that has been financed primarily by domestic savings. International assistance can supplement self-generated savings for investment, but I have seen in my recent visit in the ASEAN region, as well as here in India, that aid is no substitute for genuine internal economic development. The United States has supported Indian development in the past and continues to do so today and will do so in the future. We do so through our bilateral relationships and through our major contributions to international financial institutions. We stand by this commitment to India's development.

I was impressed today by the degree to which our overall objectives are parallel—in many cases quite similar—but I was not surprised. The commonality of objective, in our case, springs from the values we share of respect for human dignity and democratic values. Ultimately, it is these values which bring us back together again and again. Perhaps at times, we take each other too much for granted, and that is why we have committed ourselves today to reinforce and strengthen our ties.

The work of the joint commission and its four subcommissions, reinforced by the progress on last year's bilateral initiatives, provides tangible evidence of Indian and American scientists working together on a variety of projects to combat disease and blindness, to increase agricultural productivity, and to unlock the secrets of both the Sun and the monsoon rains. Businessmen and government officials have spurred interest in bilateral trade and investment. The 1984 U.S. cultural program in India will be matched by Indian exhibitions and performances in the United States in 1985. Our two peoples are learning more about each other through tourism, the growing U.S. population of Indian ancestry, and through films like Gandhi which brought his message of peace and brotherhood to millions in both the United States and India.

These programs and projects demonstrate our ability to work together and help to create a positive and constructive atmosphere in which we can discuss our differences without disrupting the progress of our cooperation or denying the common goals which unite us in the search for world peace and international economic recovery and development.

As Mrs. Shultz and I visited the famed Taj Mahal last night and this morning, I was reminded of the rich and ancient culture of India, a culture which, long before, contributed to the worlds of religion, science, and government. Indeed, as we dine here tonight we are reminded that wise men and women throughout history have been able peacefully to reconcile their differences and build upon their mutual interest. I have come to India with a belief in the benefit of free and frank exchanges between nations. I will leave with profound satisfaction that our relations are built on a firm foundation. With energy and commitment from both sides, I am confident these relations will grow and flourish.

Tarapur Nuclear Spare Parts Issue

HUGHES. As you know, the Secretary was at Agra last night and this morning and, I think was really very much impressed by the Taj. He's talked about it quite a bit today to his Indian colleagues—he saw it in the moonlight last night, he saw it at dawn this morning and obviously it made a big impression on him.

He called on President Singh this morning; that was largely a courtesy call, but I understand that both of them expressed the view that the strong relationship between India and the United States is important for both sides.

As Mr. Aiyar has said, he then went into a one-on-one session with the Foreign Minister, Minister of External Affairs, at which they discussed the agenda for the Secretary's stay here and also on a number of matters of mutual interest. At 12:15 they went into the larger meeting. Again the Secretary stressed the importance the United States attaches to its relationship with India which as Mr. Aiyar said we represent between us the two largest democracies. There was some discussion about the important work of our joint commission in the field of education, science, commerce, culture and then a fairly extensive discussion on the East-West relationship with particular emphasis on U.S.-U.S.S.R. relations. The Secretary outlined our posture toward the Soviet Union. He outlined the basic premises of the Reagan administration policy, namely first be strong in terms of military strength, in terms of economic strength and indeed, he mentioned today, spiritual strength, a kind of self-confidence to be realistic, be realistic in appraising the Soviets, be realistic in appraising ourselves and three [sic], be reasonable in working with the Soviet Union to reduce tensions. There was an outline of the talks we are having with the Soviets in various fora, and how those talks are going. There was some discussion of the transition in the Soviet leadership, and then, as Mr. Aiyar said, some discussion about Central America. And at the end of that morning session, the United States released—or is releasing I should say, now—a statement that emerged from those meetings. The statement says that the U.S. Secretary of State and the Indian Minister of External Affairs today discussed the question of safety-related spare parts for Tarapur. Both the United States and India are concerned for the operational safety of the reactors and for the health of the employees of the plant and for the residents of the community in which they operate.

Insofar as the need for replacement parts to ensure these objectives is concerned, the Secretary indicated that the United States is prepared to take the necessary actions to supply those parts which are not available from elsewhere. The Government of India shares the confidence of the Government of the United States that this problem can be satisfactorily resolved. That's the end of that statement.

[10] Source: Department of State files. The briefing was conducted by Department of State Spokesman John Hughes and his Indian counterpart, Mani Shankar Aiyar, beginning at 5:30 p.m.

Q. Mr. Hughes, does your statement, or Mr. Shultz's statement about reactor parts mean that both the United States and some conveniently and mutually agreeable third country will supply the parts, or does it mean that the Secretary has decided, the administration has decided to not take the advice of a number of democratic Senators who say it violates the law, or is the administration willing to do it, and see the supply of parts challenged in Congress? What about the whole problem of proliferation? Or has the proliferation problem been subordinated now to a safety problem or what? What is the thinking?

HUGHES. Well, the U.S. policy on the overall question of nonproliferation is quite clear, there remains no change in that, but insofar as these particular parts are concerned the President, the administration, the Secretary of State have decided to take this action. The action is quite clear. India will look for the appropriate parts that it needs elsewhere. If those parts are not available elsewhere, those parts which are available in the United States, from the United States, and cannot be acquired elsewhere, the President intends to take the action that would make those parts available to India.

Q. What determines if they are not available elsewhere. Is it time, is there a deadline when those are or not available?

HUGHES. I don't know if there's a deadline on determining when those parts are available. There has, as I understand it, already been consultation between the United States and India and indeed a number of other countries. It's not as though this research, into the availability of parts is starting from scratch now, that research, as I understand, has been going on. I can't give you a timetable on when.

Q. Would you say now those spare parts are available from a third country?

HUGHES. I don't know. I think that that examination will have to continue. As I say it has been going on and I assume will continue to go on. The answer—if you are saying do we yet know whether specific parts will be supplied by the United States—I think the answer to that is no. It is conceivable that all the parts might be available from other countries. What the administration is saying is if those parts are not available elsewhere, the President will take the action which would enable the United States to make them available.

Q. What in the U.S. spokesman's view is going to be the contribution of the resolution of this question of spare parts to repairing Indo-U.S. relations—that was the question.

HUGHES. Well, I think neither Mr. Aiyar nor myself can give you any details of the meeting between the Prime Minister and the Secretary because it's still going on. That's the simple answer to that question.

. . . . . .

L.K. SHARMA. What precisely is the U.S. role in facilitating this delivery from the third countries? Is it just a helpful suggestion or would you go beyond that? And number two, if Congress does not approve of the United States itself supplying the spare parts what does the administration intend to do?

HUGHES. Well, on the first part of your question, I think it's basically consultation, I think, the United States making available its expertise about the availability of the parts. Obviously India has expertise as well, and, I think, it's probably an exchange of ideas. As to the second part of your question, I don't think I'm going to go beyond our statement that the President of the United States is firm in his decision to move forward in this way, but I'm not going to specify how, what his strategy will be and how he will approach the question in terms of Congress.

BILL CLAIBORNE. Were there any discussions about concessional funding from international monetary agencies, specifically about the U.S. position on the Asian Development Bank?

HUGHES. There was some general discussion at lunch, and it's conceivable that there could have been some discussion in some of the other meetings, but there certainly was some general economic discussion at lunch.

Q. Can you characterize a little bit more?

HUGHES. Well, I think it basically was an exchange of views, it was a general exchange of views.

AIYAR. Can I just add to that. Mr. Narasimha, our Secretary for Economic Affairs, was present at the luncheon meeting, so was Mr. L.K. Jha, and that constitutes a fairly formidable economic team on the Indian side. It was explained to us at the plenary talks that economic experts as such were not present in Mr. Shultz's delegation, therefore the purpose of the discussions on the economic questions was not one that was designed to arrive at agreements here and now so much as to clarify to the United States India's concerns, and on the Indian side to try to understand what the U.S. position was in respect of these issues. The two major issues before us are in regard to the IBRD. There is the fulfillment of the U.S. commitment in regard to IDA–VI [11] and subsequent to that what position the United States will take on IDA–VII, and in this general context the question of the Indian share of IDA funds.

And there's also the question of the U.S. attitude to an Indian Request for borrowing $2 billion from the Asian Development Bank in tranches of $500 million a year over 4 years from the general capital increase that is taking effect in the Asian Development Bank.

Also of course within this, apart from the two financial institutions, there are proposals regarding monetary reform. The reference is to the call given by the nonaligned countries at the last summit for an International Conference on Money and Finance for Development, as well as the discussions in this regard that took place at the Williamsburg Summit. [12] So there are a number of economic issues that do reflect upon the bilateral Indo-U.S. relationship in regard to discussions taking place in multilateral forums. And there is also the bilateral Indo-U.S. relationship. So these questions were discussed in the light of attempting to explain Indian concerns to the United States and India attempting to understand the U.S. position on these issues.

Q. Did Secretary Shultz respond to Mrs. Gandhi's appeal for an international conference? Did she get any satisfactory answer?

AIYAR. I can't answer that because the talks are still going on. You know there are talks still going on between the Prime Minister and Secretary of State Shultz. So I can't tell you what's happening there. What I can say is that in the talks that took place earlier in the day, we have had an assessment from Secretary of State Shultz of the major matters that came up at the Williamsburg Summit including the question of an International Conference for Money and Development, which was an issue that was raised at that summit.

Q. I would like to know from the American spokesman what exactly is the position of the Indo-U.S. agreement of 1963? [13] Is there any obligation on the part of the United States to supply the spare parts? Number two, in case the United States agrees to supply these spare parts, what is the condition on the supply of non-available spare parts.

HUGHES. You've cast your question as to whether the United States has an obligation to supply these spare parts. Without seeking to duck that question, I don't know about the legality, the fact is that the President is firm in his decision that he is going to move forward, that this is what he wants to do. Having considered it, he thinks this is right and this is what he is going to do. Insofar as the other countries, yes, there certainly is an understanding that India will look for these spare

[11] The International Development Association (IDA) established in 1960 as an affiliate of the World Bank, provides low interest loan assistance to low income developing countries. In order to replenish its capital base, IDA has met regularly with its membership to secure additional lendable funds. IDA VI marked the sixth round of such replenishment negotiations, which were completed in December 1979. The schedule of U.S. payments to IDA VI has been delayed by Congress, but other donors agreed to make additional contributions to cover the U.S. delay. The United States will complete its IDA VI payments by August 1985.

[12] The Williamsburg Summit, an economic conference attended by the Heads of State of the seven major industrial democracies, the United States, Japan, France, West Germany, Great Britain, Canada, and Italy, met from May 28 to 30, 1983, at Williamsburg, Virginia parts elsewhere. That is quite clear, and as I said, it may well be that all of the parts are available elsewhere. If that is the case then the United States would not supply any. Should those parts not be available elsewhere, and they are available from the United States, the President has made clear that he intends to take the kinds of action which would permit the United States to make them available. The statement stands by itself, there were no other obligations or promises or concessions or agreements. It's a statement that stands by itself.

Q. Second part of the question was on the question of spent fuels.

HUGHES. Yes, I'm afraid I simply cannot answer that question because I'm not sufficiently informed on the answer.

JOHN DAYAL. Could you tell us whether the issue of Pakistan was discussed in talks this morning and in the afternoon? The Indian stand on the arming of Pakistan is well-known and I presume that the same stance was maintained at the talks today.

HUGHES. Well, I don't ever want to speak for another government and the Indian Government. I don't recall a specific exchange on that point, but the U.S. position is quite clear. We expect and hope that we can maintain good relations with both India and Pakistan, and we will determine our policies towards both countries and that involves defense relationships on the basis of each country's needs.

Q. India maintains this arming of Pakistan is not directed toward large countries like the Soviet Union, but could be turned against it (India).

HUGHES. Yes, I did not hear any discussion today concerning U.S. military aid program, or such as it might be, to Pakistan.

Q. John, if it's still necessary that these nuclear, these spare parts be obtained for this nuclear power plant, why won't the United States supply them up front? And, did the Indian Government provide any sort of reassurances that the Secretary of State can take back to Washington to call off some of the opposition in Congress?

HUGHES. Well, the second part of the question first. As I said earlier the statement stands by itself and I think it's quite explicit on what transpired. Insofar as the first part of your question is concerned, there are some legal restraints upon the United States in connection with nonproliferation, and I think that that explains why we are suggesting that those parts come from other countries first, if that is possible.

Q. Well, if there are legal constraints how can we assure India that we will be able to supply these parts?

HUGHES. Well, what we're assuring India is that the President is going to take the appropriate action. The action that he will take insofar as Congress is concerned remains for him to announce.

Q. What concerns does your government have about the vast buildup of arms, American arms to Pakistan and the long-term Soviet occupation of Afghanistan?

AIYAR. Insofar as arms supply to Pakistan is concerned, what the Minister of External Affairs told his U.S. counterpart is a reiteration of positions that have already been explained in the past. Insofar as the question of Afghanistan is concerned, the position again of the Government of India has been reiterated on several occasions, and I would draw your attention to the relevant paragraph of the Nonaligned declaration on the question of Afghanistan at the last summit.

. . . . . .

AIYAR.[14] I could go on about two hours on the great advances that have been made in each of these subcommissions. I am prepared to swear you that, but I think both Mr. Hughes and I would totally disagree with your suggestion that either the progress has been negligible or that it has been deadly dull. In fact in every one of the areas that have been treated by the subcommissions of the Joint Commission, significiant progress is increasing, what Secretary Shultz described today,[15] As the interplay between the two democracies has been significant and you have only to go through the details to find that, whether it is in regard to trade, whether it is in regard to these important seminars that are to be held on the democratic experiment in the two countries, the Nehru studies program, the trade missions that are being undertaken, the proposed tax treaty, the Blue Ribbon Panel on Science. There's a whole host of subjects which are of great relevance to the ordinary people of the United States of America and India, where the work of the Joint Commission is of significance, and it's really the means that we have to build upon this relationship between these two great democracies.

Q. Were there any narrowing of differences between the two countries?

AIYAR. I think the purpose of the exercise was not the narrowing of the differences as an immediate objective. It was more a question of attempting to understand each other's position, and in that process what was discussed on Afghanistan, as I said it wasn't a major focus of attention, so there were references made to the subject. And in regard to the ADB, the position is as I said earlier, that we brought to the attention of the United States of America our need to secure this particular loan. The United States' Secretary of State was not accompanied by economic experts so he broadly stated the position of the United States. And it is our hope that this exposition of our views of the rationale for us to borrow from the ADB will be carried by Mr. Shultz back to Washington. And hopefully, the attitude of the United States will, as a result, be favorable to this Indian request.

Q. How soon do you expect to receive spare parts for Tarapur and secondly, could you also be precise about how long the reactor—the two reactors can continue to operate before you run into serious safety hazards?

AIYAR. The answer to the first question is very soon.

Q. What is very soon?

AIYAR. Very soon really just means very soon. We believe that the problem has now been resolved. There are commercial modalities that have to be completed. I am not in a position to tell you how long it takes to complete a commercial negotiation, open a letter of credit, get the stuff shipped out or sent out by air. This would also of course vary from one spare part to another. So it would not be fair on your part to ask me to specify very soon in terms of days or weeks or months. But what we do expect is that now that the problem has been resolved, and since there is a considerable awareness in India of what our spare part requirements are, insofar as we are going to procure them from elsewhere it should take place very soon. I can see no great difficulty now.

Insofar as we are not able to locate a spare part elsewhere and have to go to the United States of America to procure it, how soon it comes would depend upon how quickly these actions referred to in Mr. Hughes' statement are taken, and we don't anticipate any problems in that regard. So we think that we will get it very soon. I agree it's a vague word in terms of days or months but in terms of a concept of whether it will take some time, take a long time, take a very, very long time, come very soon, I think in relative terms it is very clear that we expect these to come very soon. Now, of course, that the problem has been resolved, your second question, about how long it would be before health hazards became apparent, sort of recedes into the realm of hypothesis. I don't think we are going to face that problem now because we are going to get the spare parts that will prevent hazards from occurring in that area.

Q. (Inaudible, on trade and U.S. restrictions on Indian exports).

AIYAR. As far as expanding trade between India and the U.S.A. is concerned, obviously it will not take place on the same pattern as with countries with whom we had trade plans. So the idea of giving specific targets is not as germane to this exercise as it might be in our trade relations with some other countries. There has in fact been some expansion in our mutual trade in recent years. For the last full year, that is 1982, India's exports to the United States amounted to about $1,400 million and our imports from them amounted to just under $1,600 million. So while the trade is not exactly in balance, the trade deficit is of the order of $178 million in the total turnover which is in excess of $3,000 million. There's been a trade mission that's come in from the United States here, the OPIC team. We are hoping to send out a trade mission to the United States. There have been some trade problems relating to protectionism which have been partially or fully resolved. For example, in regard to textile products we have, as the result of the most recent agreement, succeeded in increasing access by approximately 70 crore

(one crore equals 10 million rupees) annually although in a sense the problem of protectionism in the textile sector remains. We do believe that the general scheme of preferences provides one mechanism for improving the trade balance in increasing India's exports to the United States, and what we are seeking from the U.S.A. is stable, duty-free treatment, without abrupt exclusions based on automatic triggers or arbitrary subjective criteria.

There have been problems about the countervailing duty. We have solved them in regard to footwear and for two types of fasteners. And some problems that remain in regard to castings and some other types of fasteners we hope will be resolved as we go along. But these are matters of detail which were of course not gone into during the course of this visit, but since you raised the question in the context of the subcommission on trade, that subcommission does look into some of these problems, but there are also diplomatic contacts through which we attempt to resolve these problems as they come along.

Q. (Inaudible).

AIYAR. We had the OPIC mission here—this was a little earlier this year—that's the overseas private investors (sic) corporation.

U.S. Relations With India

. . . . . .

Q. I was asking whether there is a broader discussion or not on Indo-U.S. relations apart from Tarapur.

[A.] Oh yes. I thought you were talking about nuclear matters.

Q. No, no.

[A.] . . . Yes, we had. I discussed, and the Foreign Minister and the Prime Minister and others in our meetings talked about the India–U.S. relationship, our aspirations for it and the substantive underpinning of it as well as you might say its tonal qualities and attitudes toward it. And I think that the Prime Minister's visit to the United States was outstanding in its impact on U.S. attitudes, and this is part of a process of continuing to build that relationship in terms of its bilateral nature and in terms of the mutual interest that both countries have in a wide variety of worldwide issues. So, we had a good bit of discussion about that. And I believe myself—I know the President shares this view—that a unified and strong and developing democratic, free India is very much in the interests of the United States, and to the extent that our relationship can help in that regard that's important to us.

Q. Mr. Secretary, you know that certain issues have come up in the relation to the broader Indo-U.S. relations on account of your government's attitude to the current replenishment of funds for IDA, your attitude towards IMF funds available to countries. And then the Asian Development Bank, the loan that India is seeking and U.S. attitude toward that. Because in the Indian scheme, as I see it, the aid prospect figured very prominently. And generally the U.S. attitude is seen to be less than helpful. Did this issue come up or will it come up in the discussions here or not?

[A.] . . . We discussed the problems of economic development generally, and India's interest in the multilateral lending institutions and access to loans and so forth in particular. And let me express, if I can, the attitude of the United States on this subject, and I might say as a background matter, I did address this subject in a general way in a speech in New York about a month ago and if you're interested I'm sure we can find a copy for you.

But as a general proposition it's clear, I think, to everyone that we have a world economy, we're all involved in it, we all stand to gain or lose depending upon how healthy it is and how well it operates. So that includes the so-called Third World as well as the industrial countries, and when you address yourself to the health of this system you have to address yourself to the whole.

So that's one point that conditions the U.S. attitude and it seems to me that people's thinking in the United States, and for that matter elsewhere, has been moving away from the notion that concessional aid of one form or another is a form of gift-giving—and I'm not here speaking against gift-giving, but I think that has been a kind of conception that the rich nations owed it to the poor nations to give them resources. I think that idea is beginning to fade out of the picture insofar as this problem is concerned, and to be supplanted by a different idea, that it is in the interests of developed countries to do things that enable those who will do what it takes to develop, to see their economies be healthy and expand.

And therefore we find ourselves with another zero-sum game in the sense of what I give to you, I don't have any more; but a plus-sum situation where actions taken that help everybody be healthy are mutually self-supporting. And I think this is a much better, more solid way of thinking about it and one that has a long-term implication to it, that is, a healthier one than the rich to poor gift-type of thinking. Obviously the components of this process of attendance to each other's health has a trade dimension, an investment dimension, an aid dimension, and so on; all these things are part of a process, at least as I see it, and I've tried to spell this out somewhat in that speech.

Insofar as India is concerned, I think the development picture is quite an impressive one and we can see a progression, if you take IDA, other concessional lending and commercial lending and think of these as increments in the total lending mix, and then look at it over a period of time, what you see is that initially highly concessional soft loans from IDA made up the bulk of the total. And as time has gone on, that has changed and all three elements are in the picture and the component of IDA has declined although it's still very important. And I would expect that process to continue and by now, and I called attention to this in the New York speech, India generates 90 percent of the funds used for investment in India from domestic savings, and really that's the kind of thing that's necessary for economic development.

Q. But you wouldn't blame our government from seeking the lowest possible terms.

[A.] . . . Of course not, every borrower does that, and the question is that, I think, we have to ask ourselves, thinking about this in terms of the overall economic system, is this: investment is absolutely dependent on savings, by definition, as we all know. If you consume everything that you produce, there are no resources left over to invest, so you have to have saving in the world in order for there to be investment in the world. And you can at least conceptually think of something that you might call a world savings, and concessional aid of one form or another takes out of world savings by a political act and allocates those resources to some form of investment somewhere. So it isn't as though concessional lending is a sort of a free good, it is part of the flow of world savings and you have to think about its impact on world savings and the allocative process here.

Q. Mr. Secretary, as we see it in India, we see this situation as being asymmetrical. You call it the world economy but the world economy is not in balance and that's why we call it the North and the South and usually in many ways the North means your country because every country's economy is in a large measure dependent on the health of your economy. So in a sense it is this unequal relationship to start with, which creates problems. That apart, we also see a shift, a major shift in American policy over the years. Earlier, America was the leader in organizing assistance for developing countries. America has long abdicated that role. In fact we find the European attitudes more helpful than the American attitude for aid, whatever the reasons. Then, we also find that American aid itself has become more politically directed than before as most of America's aid now goes to a couple of countries, Egypt, Israel. I think these two countries account for about 80 percent of American assistance.

[A.] . . . It's large but it's more like, I think, 45 percent or something like that.

Q. Well, then perhaps if we add a few more countries it may add up to make it 80 percent. Generally we get a kind of impression of America, still the leading-most country in the world, but not really all that interested as it used to be in its more liberal days. That is how a lot of people in India, if I may say so, see American policy, and even those who are really for very strong Indo-U.S. relations. I've come up against this fact that the United States is really not all that interested as it used to be. That is the kind of—I don't know if these brief discussions, like the one we are having now, are the appropriate platform for discussing bilateral assistance, because more than bilateral assistance is involved. But these are the kind of perceptions some of us have here.

[A.] . . . Yes, well, I'm aware of the fact that that is the view of people and that gets written a lot. It is not in accordance with the facts. The facts, let me give you a few facts. The United States today is by a large measure the largest single donor country, in general, for concessional aid of various kinds. There's no other country close to it. The United States today is the largest donor country in the sense of concessional aid to India. If you add up our component of the World Bank, the Asian Bank, bilateral assistance and so on, you add all these things up together and then compare them with whoever else you want to name. The United States, more importantly, provides the largest market for goods from the Third World. Roughly half the manufactured goods in the Third World find their way into the U.S. market. I believe, I don't know whether any of you covered the GATT ministerial in November, but it was very clear, and I'm not trying to slam anybody else, but it was very clear that the sentiment for protection, which is strong in the world in all countries, is strongest in Europe, and really the developing countries have a much bigger stake in the openness of market than in any other single thing. In 1980 the flow of earnings from trade exceeded the flow of funds from aid by 17 times. So trade is a much more important component—and I see it in our own country that there is a tendency on the part of people who don't want to see trade take place to substitute aid for it, and it's a very bad tradeoff. I've had this battle with our own labor unions, over what we call a Caribbean Basin Initiative, which we are trying to help these tiny economies in the Caribbean Basin of Central America by really opening the U.S. market totally with no restrictions whatever. And the labor unions take the view that that's not a good idea. On the other hand, they're willing to support gigantic sums of money, and our view is that it's much more important to provide the market opportunities.

At any rate, the United States, with all of our problems with protection, is, I think I can fairly say, by far the most open industrial market in the world to the products of the Third World. So, in all of these respects I think the reality is—in terms of the amounts of money and so on—that the United States is a major contributor to the development process. And we think this is good for us. Now insofar as the Reagan administration is concerned, we mentioned IDA—and this is a subject that I've been around the horn on a lot because I was Secretary of the Treasury at one time, and fought for the IDA tranches then and the other capital appreciations to the various development banks. But the Reagan administration inherited from its predecessor an IDA commitment which its predecessor was unable to sell to a Democratic Congress. Now, President Reagan took this commitment and adopted it and we think we are very close now to getting it through the Congress. We've worked very hard on it and we have a 1983 supplemental appropriation in which there is an increment, and if we are successful we'll complete the IDA-VI pledge in the 1984 appropriation process. And this has been a major effort on the part of the President, and he's had to turn around his own party and support something that his predecessor laid down.

And beyond that, the amount of economic concessional aid of various kinds under the Reagan administration has increased each year, its total has been going up. So I recognize the impression that people have but I call your attention to the facts, as to the reality. Now, I think the impression comes about sometimes because the United States has historically, and today the President very much takes the view that we should say what we really think and that we should be candid enough if we think that some nice idea that everybody sort of likes is really what we call "pie in the sky" and we ought to say so, otherwise we're not being honest with people. I remember when I was Secretary of the Treasury, on this, there's a so-called link and that issue is still around in which it is proposed that the issuance of SDRs be linked to aid. I'm sure you're all familiar with this issue. We always opposed that in the United States on the grounds that it would undermine the confidence in the SDR, that it would quickly be seen by legislatures as a bypassing of them, and they would wind up making it impossible, and we would have in the process done more harm than good. And we got up and said that. It made us very unpopular, everybody railed against us. I had innumerable finance ministers from developing countries come around and say to me, we're going to make a speech against you, and I'm sorry that I have to, but please don't change your mind. And I had a very distinguished finance minister, whom I won't name, from a country that portrays itself as being all for economic development, come around and say to me, . . . you say that you're opposed to the link, but are you really, are you really going to stick to it? I said, oh yes, that's what I think and Arthur Burns is sitting here, he's the Chairman of the Fed, that's what he thinks, listen to him, he's very worked up about it. The United States is going to be firm on this. And he said, well I'm just delighted to hear it, it gives me a chance to demagogue on this issue. And there's an awful lot of that. But I think that it's important for the United States, as the country that in a sense people look to to be honest about these things, to argue these points directly, and for that reason I think it often comes through that we are the bad guys, but the reality, I think, is quite the reverse.

Q. As a corollary to what you said, now, the Third World is interested very much in the U.S. economic recovery. It would help them. . . . What is the correct position about it? We keep reading conflicting accounts.

[A.] . . . Well, I don't want to pose as an economic forecaster, but I will make one anyway. We had a growth rate, real growth rate of about two and a half percent in the first quarter, coming off of a down quarter. We have the preliminary estimates for the second quarter and they are a real increase of 6.6 percent. The preliminary estimates always get revised and we really can't tell, but let's say its in the ballpark of 6 percent. All of the indications are that this is turning into a sustainable recovery. When an economy the size of the U.S. economy—it's over $3 trillion—moves at an annual rate of 6 percent, that's a huge movement. And so I think that we do see this real recovery underway. There will be a strong effort to manage it so that it is a non-inflationary recovery; some think that it's going too fast, in other words. But at any rate, I think that you'll see strength. And it is also the case that the strong dollar, which is much stronger than it would be on strictly trade measures—it's strong in considerable part because of the flow of financial resources to the United States as a kind of safe haven economy—so the dollar is very strong, and what that means is that we will ship a lot of our inherited expansion abroad. We're going to have a very large trade deficit this year and I notice the figures for May have just come out and it is a record monthly number. From the standpoint of our trading partners who are looking for their own expansion to be export-led, it's very good news that the dollar is so strong, and President Mitterrand is always complaining about this, I had a long session with him a few weeks ago and I asked him, why are you always complaining about the strong dollar? It's working to your advantage. And he smiled and he said, yes, I've seen a few deals that we have gotten here recently in third markets that we probably wouldn't have gotten otherwise. So I think if the dollar starts to weaken we're going to hear a lot of complaints, Just as we have had a lot of complaints when it was strong. But I think the U.S. economy is moving and it's going to make a difference, but it's also true that if we can keep trade open that there's going to be a mutually stimulating effect here and the U.S. economy is going to benefit by strength in various other economies such as India's.

Q. What do you expect from Indo-American relations?

A. We expect to have, want to have, a close relationship and the ability to discuss issues of interest to both the countries, whether they are bilateral matters or multilateral matters, so that if we disagree it won't be because of incorrect understanding and where we can agree, we both benefit from that. I've been impressed with the work of the Joint Commission and the various subcommissions—that's been sort of a quiet effort, a no-big-deal thing, but a lot of people have been working away in an effective manner, and so we want to keep that going. I think it's a mutually beneficial thing. As I said in the beginning, the existence in this region of such a large, free, democratic country having a healthy economy is a very important, stabilizing factor here. We welcome it and support it. We think it's a good thing for the United States.

Section 1007 of Public Law 98–164, Approved November 22, 1983 (Extract) [17]

Export of Nuclear-Related Equipment to India

SEC. 1007. (a) It is the sense of Congress that the United States Government should disapprove the export of, and should suspend or revoke approval for the export of, any nuclear-related equipment, material, or technology, including nuclear components and heavy water, to the Government of India, Argentina, or South Africa until such time as such government gives the Government of the United States stronger nuclear nonproliferation guarantees. Such guarantees should include—

(1) reliable assurances by such government that it is not engaged in any program leading to the development, testing, or detonation of nuclear explosive devices; and

(2) agreement by such government to accept international safeguards on all its nuclear facilities.

(b) If the President determines, in the case of India's Tarapur reactor, while it is under International Atomic Energy Agency inspection, that certain equipment or nonnuclear material or technology is necessary for humanitarian reasons to protect the health and safety of operations and is not available from a foreign supplier, the President may authorize the export of such equipment or non-nuclear material or technology. Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs (Schaffer) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 8, 1983 (Extract) [1]

U.S. Aid to Nepal

. . . . . .

Nepal has recently made dramatic progress toward its own sort of representative institutions. By referendum Nepal chose the partyless Panchayat form of representation and the country has now launched its own experiment in participatory government. Accompanying this has been a trend toward broader enjoyment of a wide range of human rights. Through its economic development program with its recently decentralized planning process, Nepal is making gradual progress toward a better life for its people.

The Government of Nepal is a founding member of the Non-Aligned Movement where it has supported moderate positions. It has been an active member of the United Nations, including contributions to three U.N. peacekeeping forces during the past 30 years. The United States and Nepal enjoy excellent bilateral relations.

U.S. economic assistance helps foster the development essential to preservation of Nepal's historic role as a stable buffer state between India and China. During the more than 30 years of aid to Nepal, U.S. focus has shifted from development of an elementary transportation infrastructure and education system to the current three core projects in resource conservation and utilization, integrated rural development and family planning/rural health care.

For the full text, see ibid., pp. 167–182.

These reflect shifts in GON priorities as well as successful completion of earlier projects.

For FY 1984 we are proposing for Nepal $13.5 million in Development Assistance, $1.5 million in PL–480 [2] Title II for the World Food Program, and $95,000 in IMET. In addition we are proposing a Special Foreign Currency Appropriation of $1.1 million equivalent in excess Indian rupees for training. Our assistance represents about 5 percent of total AID. Training and institutional development, which have been major emphases of U.S. programs, are now paying important dividends as the Government of Nepal plans and implements its development program. Nepal, however, is faced by continuing and severe development problems. Among the most notable are destruction of forests and consequent ecological degradation; high population growth levels; and disappointing results to date from efforts to achieve real increases in agriculture.

Remarks by President Reagan and King Birendra of Nepal, December 7, 1983 [3]

U.S. Relations With Nepal

THE PRESIDENT. You got mighty quiet all of a sudden. (Laughter.)

Your Majesties, honored guests, ladies and gentlemen, today King Birendra and I had the opportunity to review our bilateral relations and to discuss our international concerns. [4] We also had the chance to get to know one another as individuals. I'm pleased to inform you tonight that not only are relations between Nepal and the United States good, but King Birendra and I have each discovered a new friend.

Our discussion of bilateral relations revealed a refreshing lack of difficulties. Notwithstanding the great distance that separates our two nations, Nepal and the United States through the years have enjoyed a particularly amicable relationship.

We prefer to think of you, Your Majesties, as neighbors on the other side of the world. We're so pleased that you've made this neighborly visit. It will serve to expand the good will between our peoples when more Americans, as I did today, get the chance to meet you personally.

Americans respect individuals of courage and conviction. And to give you some idea of how this applies to King Birendra, one of his Majesty's many talents is parachuting. We have a great deal in common—(laughter)—but let me hasten to say we found our common ground in another of his interests—horseback riding. (Laughter.) (Applause.)

Your Majesty, the highest mountain on our planet, Mount Everest, is in Nepal. And as—so are eight of the world's ten highest peaks. And the character of your people, the sincerity of your convictions stand as tall and strong as your mountains.

Any American who's visited Nepal returns home in awe, not only of the majestic beauty of your land, but also of the religious strength of your people. There are countless religious shrines in Nepal—outward symbols of your country's greatest strength.

And Your Majesty, the spiritual side which is so important to your nation speaks well of you and your countrymen.

Today, we had the opportunity to discuss a proposal of which you and your people can be rightfully proud. Through [4] King Birendra of Nepal and his wife made a State visit to the United States from December 5 to 13, 1983. The King and Queen were in Washington from December 5 to 10, where they met with the President, several Cabinet Members, and Members of Congress. While in the United States the royal couple also traveled to Harvard, which the King attended in the 1967–1968 academic year, New York, Orlando, Dallas, Atlanta, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Honolulu.

the Nepal Zone of Peace concept, you're seeking to ensure that your country's future will not be held back by using scarce resources for military purposes. We Americans support the objectives of your Majesty's Zone of Peace proposal [5] and we endorse it. We would only hope that one day the world in its entirety will be a zone of peace.

In the meantime, we encourage you to continue to work closely with your neighbors to make Nepal's Zone of Peace a reality. Your innovative approach to peace and development could be a foundation for progress throughout the region. We wish you success.

It is an honor to have you with us, your Majesties. Now, would all of you please join me in a toast to His Majesty, King Birendra, to Her Majesty, Queen Aishwarya, and to the people of Nepal.

KING BIRENDRA. Mr. President, Mrs. Reagan, distinguished ladies and gentlemen, I'm touched by your cordial welcome and the warm words with which you and Mrs. Reagan have received us here in Washington. We're equally honored by the generous remarks you, Mr. President, have just made about my country and people.

Seen from Washington, Nepal is almost on the other side of the globe and, yet, as this friendly gathering here tonight shows, distance notwithstanding, friendship, and cordiality based on shared ideals can exist between countries that are geographically far apart. In 1947, as soon as Nepal broke her age-old isolation by seeking friendship beyond her borders, it was with the United States of America that Nepal sought to establish her diplomatic relations.

Since 1951, the year when my grandfather, late King Tribhuvan, led the Nepalese people to democracy, we have looked to the United States as a land of freedom and fulfillment. The enduring ideals of the founding fathers of America who spoke to men of liberty and independence have inspired men throughout the world, including those of us living in the mountain fastness of Nepal.

In our part of the world, if America is looked upon as a land of gold, grain and computers, a country of skyscrapers and space shuttles, she is also regarded as a nation committed to respect man and his dignity. A land of discovery, America has distinguished herself in being inventive, in breaking new grounds and opening newer horizons of knowledge for the betterment of man.

With a country such as the United States, one wonders if Nepal has anything in common. On the surface, there may seem very little. Yet, as men living in the same planet, we have common stakes in the global peace, prosperity and, indeed, the survival of man in dignity and freedom.

We're happy to see, Mr. President, your efforts to maintain peace and stability around the world. The Nepalese people join me in appreciating the understanding with which on behalf of the people and the Government of the United States you have extended support to the concept of Nepal as a Zone of Peace. This recognition, I assure you, will go down not only as an important landmark in the history of our relations, but also as a testimony of your personal commitment to the cause of peace, stability and freedom.

Nepal rejoices in the achievements of the American people in different fields of human endeavors. The initiative and enterprise of your people are exemplary. Yet, what happens in this part of the world sends its ripples even to the roadless villages of Nepal. We receive their fallout. When America suffers a temporary drought, millions around the world get affected.

Indeed, if I may seek your indulgence, I would like to mention something that on the surface may sound trivial, but sometimes it is the small thing that can bring about profound changes. The corn maize in Nepal was introduced from this part of America, as were the potatoes from the Andes nearly 300 years ago. These new crops not only altered our ill economy, but even the mode of life by making settlements possible in the mountain terraces of Nepal.

Evidently, we do not live on islands but in a world bound in a nexus of interde-

[5] The Nepalese Zone of Peace Proposal, which was first expressed by the King in 1975, calls for Nepal to devote its energies to economic development, and to prohibit foreign powers from using its territory as a base for purposes of aggression against its neighbors. It also requests its neighbors to adopt a similar policy toward Nepal.

pendence. What happens in America ceases, therefore, to be a local event. The United States as such has shown a consistent understanding towards this and has assisted Nepal in stretching her hand of friendship and cooperation in many fields, including the building of infrastructures.

May I take this opportunity, therefore, to thank you, and through you, to the people and Government of the United States for the support we have received in meeting the challenges of development in Nepal.

Mr. President, in recent years, America has brought glory to humanity by landing man on the moon. It is indeed thrilling to reflect that one can soar into space to explore the unknown and scan the stars. Yet these adventures into outer space would carry still deeper meaning if the part of humanity living in Nepal could also rid themselves of their continuing poverty. Herself, a least developed, landlocked country, Nepal has always sought understanding and cooperation from her friends and neighbors.

In fact, since the time I assumed responsibilities I have sought that the minimum of basic needs must not be denied to people anywhere in the world. In this regard, I take comfort in the reassurance that the United States will continue to extend cooperation on a long term-basis into the future.

Modern technology, Mr. President, has reduced distance and joined us all into a family of nations. This situation demands that we create an enduring relationship based on a sense of purpose and meaning. With Nepal and countries in her region willing to join hands with the United States and other international agencies in a creative effort for prosperity by putting into use a fragment of their human and capital resources to harness the water potential of Nepal, it would not only enable them to walk over a long road to progress for our region, as a whole, but would also continue to build bridges of understanding between a most advanced and a least developed nation of the world. It would also mean eliminating the perils of hunger on the one hand, and the danger of instability and extremism on the other.

I have no doubt that Nepal and the United States can cooperate in many fields of creative endeavors. As countries that have shown respect to the uniqueness of the individual, we believe in the conservation of the natural as well as the spiritual heritage of man. But most important of all, we both honor the freedom of man and the independence of nations. In this regard, we appreciate the support the United States has shown consistently to our identity as a nation.

Mr. President, I cherish the fruitful exchange of views we have had recently with each other. You have been very reassuring, and I wish to thank you and Mrs. Reagan for the warmth of hospitality shown to me, my wife, and members of my entourage.

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen, may I now request you to join me in proposing a toast to the health and happiness of President Ronald Reagan of the United States of America, and the First Lady, Mrs. Nancy Reagan, to the peace and prosperity of the American people, and to the further development of friendship between Nepal and the United States. Thank you.

Support For Eradicating Opium Production in Pakistan

MR. VELIOTES. Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to be here before the committee again with my colleagues to testify in favor of the three appropriations that you cited earlier. [2]

I have a statement which I have submitted for the record, and I would like to summarize it at this time.

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. Fine. [3]

MR. VELIOTES. If before proceeding I could just make a comment about Senator Moynihan's testimony, sir. [4]

There is no question but that the administration, and I think all Americans, fully share the goals of eradicating the heroin trade and the drug trade wherever it may originate. Certainly as concerns Pakistan, we share that strong objective, and we have been working on it. We have made progress. It is not a simple issue.

The Attorney General visited Pakistan last fall. There have subsequently been some interesting developments in the enforcement field which are encouraging.

I would like to reserve any detailed comments on the proposal of linkage and save this for a later period, unless some of my colleagues would like to address the issue later on in the session.

I would like to know whether or not had we attempted to coerce the Pakistan Government through linkages to things like military assistance if we would have achieved the degree of cooperation and the cooperative air as well as some of the results that we have had today.

I also have to tell you my own personal concern about running the risks of one-dimensional foreign policies. We have many policy objectives in Pakistan and with the Pakistanis. One of the most important is narcotics control, but there is more than that. And I think that our best approach always in these issues is a balance in our approach, attempting to do the best we can to promote all of our policies, all of our policy goals.

Having said that, certainly I wish to conclude by saying we share Senator Moynihan's concerns, and we certainly welcome his interest, not only as a Senator but as a former Ambassador in India. And the fact that he took the time to personally make this trip and report, we are all the better for it.

SENATOR SARBANES. You regard this as but one of many foreign policy objectives, is that correct?

MR. VELIOTES. Correct.

SENATOR SARBANES. The point that Senator Moynihan is making is that it is a major domestic concern. I was out of the room. I do not know if the Senator read his statement, but he makes the point that the twin problems of drug addiction and the crime that inevitably flows from it are having an impact at home that is profoundly transforming American urban life.

To downgrade that problem to a kind of a litany as but one of many foreign policy objectives is not really doing justice to the thrust of Senator Moynihan's statement.

MR. VELIOTES. Senator, I did not mean to downgrade it. You are referring to the second part of my statement.

SENATOR SARBANES. He is saying that in every major urban area there is apprehension, if not outright fear, about safety that can be traced back to the narcotics trade. You do not really quarrel with that, I would hope.

MR. VELIOTES. Of course not, sir. In my first comment I questioned whether that would be the most effective way of achieving the progress and the goals that we share. I certainly did not intend to downgrade the issue.

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. But I gather that you disagree with the Senator's amendment [5] then that we should compel the eradication of the poppies or at least to say that our aid is not going to be forthcoming if those poppies are not taken care of?

MR. VELIOTES. I would want to know a lot more about the situation, sir, and see the language of the amendment. The issue there is what is the most effective way to assure continued progress, and that is something that we would have to discuss.

SENATOR SARBANES. Well, we would not have to draft it in terms of linkage in just reaching our judgment as to what constituted a reasonable aid figure as we face the situation of our relationships with nations around the world amongst many things which we consider would be the nature of our relationship as it touches upon this very important and sensitive problem, just as we consider the same sort of thing with respect to other problems. And we may not have to link it and establish—I think you used the word "coercive"—tie or whatever. It might be just reflected in what the figures are.

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. Mr. Ambassador, since you have begun with that subject, what king of progress do you perceive we are making with Pakistanis?

MR. VELIOTES. On the narcotics issue?

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. Sure. I must say I very much agree with Senator Sarbanes that this is not an issue to be downgraded, and it is not an unreasonable issue on which we should base our aid inasmuch as there is the upsetting factor caused in American society because of the presence of these drugs.

Have we made some progress?

MR. VELIOTES. There has been progress. We could submit for the record greater detail.

[The information referred to follows:] [6]

OPIUM POPPY GROWING

There has been progress. Since President Zia imposed a ban on opium poppy growing in 1979 there has been noteworthy progress in reducing opium production. The 1979 crop was about 800 metric tons. Last year it dropped to under 80 metric tons. While bad weather and the price-depressing effect of a large stockpile figured in the decline, we believe Pakistani enforcement efforts contributed substantially to the result.

Poppies are no longer grown in the "settled" areas of the Northwest Frontier Province under full central government control, and eradication efforts are gaining ground in the "merged" areas in transition from tribal authority or rule by former princes to full government control. The ban on opium poppy growing was extended to Buner in 1981 and continued to take increasing effect there in 1982. Enforcement in the Malakand Division is still spotty, however, and there is no enforcement in the tribal areas.

In addition, enforcement efforts by Pakistani authorities against drug trafficking have been increased quite considerably. In the Khyber Agency 27 heroin processing laboratories were surrendered during November–December 1982. Pakistani customs have stepped up their efforts to interdict heroin shipments. Nearly 1,500 kilograms of heroin were seized in 1982, more than three times the amount seized in 1981.

We are encouraged by this progress. While it is a good start, we recognize that much more needs to be done both in suppression of poppy growing and trafficking. The Pakistan Government knows how seriously the United States takes the opium/heroin problem. Attorney General Smith made this clear when he visited Pakistan in November. President Reagan emphasized our concern about narcotics to President Zia during his visit here last September [December]. President Zia has acknowledged that Pakistan has a serious domestic addict problem and publicly declared his serious concern about it. In conversations with President Reagan and other senior officials during his visit Zia said that we must cooperate to deal with this problem that harms Pakistanis as well as Americans.

SENATOR SARBANES. Does the progress that you refer to involve primarily the continued growing of opium, or does it also address the question which Senator Moynihan alluded to, and which may be the more critical one, of a significant amount of stored opium, in other words, opium and its illicit derivatives from being produced or refined for export to the United States, was introduced by Senator Moynihan and referred to the Senate Finance Committee on March 15, 1983, with no further action taken.

an available supply; he was saying that even if there were no further growing we would confront this problem over a rather extended period of years.

Does the progress you refer to address the second as well as the first?

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. The second should include the processing of it also that Senator Moynihan spoke about.

MR. VELIOTES. It is my understanding that there has been progress across the board starting with the recognition at the highest levels of the Pakistani Government that this is a problem which is a Pakistani problem as well as an international or an American problem. It flows from that that there has been more cooperation actually on the ground in attempting to do something about this.

The figure that leaps readily to mind was 20 or 22 heroin- or morphine-based labs that were closed down I believe in the period shortly after the Attorney General visited Pakistan in the fall. There also is a program, I believe, which AID is responsible for which perhaps Mr. Greenleaf would like to address, which gets into the question of the actual growing of the opium and the question of substitute crops as I believe—perhaps you might wish to address that now.

MR. GREENLEAF. Should we do that at this point, Senator?

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. Go ahead, as long as we are on the subject.

MR. GREENLEAF. Just a quick comment, that, of course, AID's involvement is on the economic development side, and we work very closely with the Bureau for International Narcotics Matters of the State Department, which is basically responsible for the enforcement aspects that Assistant Secretary Veliotes just alluded to.

We do have in our program in Pakistan at the present poppy clauses included in a great number of our project agreements that potentially impact on the poppy growing sections of Pakistan which are by and large in the Northwest Frontier Province.

These clauses, which vary from project to project depending on the situation, indicate that if any of the funds that are expended for these projects assist in any way in the development of opium, the project will be stopped and reimbursement will be required.

Point No. 2, we have underway in one of the tribal agencies of the northwest frontier a rural development project dealing with farmers who have in the past been growers of opium poppies. That project is underway as of this past year; we feel it will have an effect on people who have been in the opium-growing business in the past, or who potentially might be in the future.

The most important point I would like to make in terms of AID's activities, though, is the third one which pertains to a new project which we propose to mount this year in the Gadoon area of the northwest frontier. We believe that the Gadoon area is the source of approximately 25 percent of the opium poppies of the entire northwest frontier. In other words, we are going into what is probably the area of heaviest concentration in opium growing with a rural development project which we hope to obligate this year. And we have a fulltime narcotics development officer at post in Islamabad who is beginning to work on this.

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. Is that Mr. Campbell?

MR. GREENLEAF. No. This is a different gentleman.

Stan Samuelson, who was referred to earlier, is a State Department employee who was involved in the Malakand agency, a State Department-funded Bureau for International Narcotics Matters project which is in effect separate from AID, although we collaborate with them.

So we have a number of activities, the most ambitious and clearly the most difficult of which is this Gadoon area project which is approximately a $25-million project which we are putting together for this year in part as a result of the intense interest on the Hill that we pursue some direct activities in poppy-growing areas.

Just one last fact which has not been stated up until now. In my conversations with the Pakistani officials, as well as from my own visit to the northwest frontier, it is very clear that the Pakistanis are concerned about this problem because there is an increased problem with drug addiction in Pakistan itself. That is a point that we ought to mention: their response is not based simply on our pressure, but also on the recognition that the problem is increasing in Pakistan itself.

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. I want to give you the assurance, Mr. Greenleaf, of this subcommittee, and I also speak with considerable ease for probably the great majority of my colleagues in the Senate that we do indeed have a very broad and continuing interest in this subject, and that we urge you on in your pursuit of reducing these poppies. I hope they do not crop up in another part of the region. As Senator Moynihan pointed out, it is like a brush fire. You put it out here and it starts up over there.

But clearly, whatever leverage we have, we should exercise; and we would like to have progress reports. As you hear something and learn something, and we will consider the amendment that Senator Moynihan has proffered.

SENATOR SARBANES. In that regard, Mr. Chairman, Senator Biden has requested that the record be kept open so that he may submit to our witnesses questions pertaining to this narcotics trade as it affects Pakistan. [7]

Foreign Assistance for Pakistan in Fiscal Year 1984 and Supplemental Assistance for Fiscal Year 1983

Mr. Chairman [9] and Members of the Committee, we are pleased to have again the opportunity to testify before the subcommittee regarding the Administration's proposed foreign assistance program for Pakistan in FY 1984 and the request for supplemental assistance for FY 1983.

U.S. Interests and Objectives Regarding Pakistan

South and Southwest Asia is a region of critical strategic importance to the United States, presently threatened by Soviet expansionism. We are committed to the search for peace and stability within the region and the safeguarding of the supply of oil critical to U.S. and Western security.

Pakistan is strategically located within this region. It is at the crossroads of South, West, and Central Asia. President Zia has described his country as the "backyard" of the Persian Gulf. Pakistan has been at the vortex of regional turmoil and upheaval for the last several decades.

The stability and security of Pakistan contribute importantly to meeting U.S. objectives in South and Southwest Asia. A stable Pakistan, one of the world's largest Islamic states, can serve as an anchor for the entire region, lending its considerable weight and influence to the cause of regional peace and harmony. Conversely, an unstable, insecure Pakistan adds to regional tensions and invites outside interference.

As a frontline state resisting Soviet expansionism, Pakistan has incurred additional security responsibilities. Faced with the Soviet presence across their border in Afghanistan, the Pakistanis have not succumbed to pressures to accept the new status quo. Instead, they have consistently led the international effort to condemn the Soviet presence in Afghanistan, while also contributing to the search for a peaceful resolution of this three year old crisis. Moreover, the Pakistanis have provided refuge to the nearly 3 million Afghans fleeing the fighting in Afghanistan. Our assistance program, which both bolsters Pakistan's security and symbolizes the firm U.S. support for this frontline nation, has been a vital element in making it possible for Pakistan to adopt and maintain its courageous posture despite Soviet bullying and blandishments.

Our assistance program is also designed to meet additional goals in our relationship with Pakistan. We believe that a program of support which provides Pakistan with a continuing relationship with a significant security partner and enhances its sense of security may help remove the principal underlying incentive for the acquisition of a nuclear weapons capability. In addition, our program of economic assistance also supports the Pakistan Government's efforts to suppress opium poppy production and contributes to the economic development and political stability of the country.

Given the volatile nature of past U.S.-Pakistani relations, it was essential at the outset of this reinvigorated security relationship to underline the U.S. commitment to support Pakistan's security and territorial integrity. For that reason, the Reagan administration, like the Carter administration before it, has specifically reaffirmed the continued applicability of the 1959 Agreement of Cooperation between the Government of the United States and the Government of Pakistan.[10] In the event of Communist aggression against Pakistan, the agreement commits the United States to take "such appropriate action" as may be mutually agreed upon. The Government of Pakistan has made clear, however, its intention to provide for its own national defense.

Our commitment to Pakistan's security is given both real and symbolic shape through the existence of our 6-year program of security and economic assistance and through our willingness to contribute to Pakistan's military modernization program. There have been no commitments made to Pakistan beyond the 1959 agreement and our intention to provide, subject, of course, to congressional appropriation, the levels of assistance contained in the 6-year, $3.2 billion package.

U.S. willingness to provide Pakistan modern military equipment is a critical element of our effort to reassure the Pakistanis about our steadfastness. The F-16's in particular have assumed for Pakistan an importance which goes well beyond the tactical benefits they give to Pakistan in facing potential aggression across their western border. They have also come to symbolize both the depth and credibility of the U.S. commitment to Pakistan's security. The Pakistanis saw inclusion in their F-16's of the same avionics as in the U.S. Air Force F-16's, as indicative of the degree of trust and confidence necessary if we are to forge a successful new relationship. Although we consider the more advanced equipment only incrementally superior to the type of radar warning system notified to the Congress under Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act,[11] the Pakistani request for this equipment was subject to the most careful review. In light of the Government of Pakistan's assurances concerning its intention to protect U.S.-supplied sensitive technology, and in light of our assessment of Pakistani capability to provide that protection, we agreed to release the advanced equipment.

The foundation of our reinvigorated security relationship with Pakistan is the significant degree of congruity in our regional strategic perceptions. Both the United States and Pakistan agree on the need for a relaxation in regional tensions, including removal of the Soviet presence in Afghanistan, so that there can be greater political stability and economic development in the area.

The history of tensions between India and Pakistan has left the Pakistanis cautious about the nature of their relationship with their neighbor. This has not prevented the Indians and the Pakistanis from taking steps in recent months aimed at improving the atmosphere. We believe that there is a good prospect for the Indo-Pakistani bilateral relationship to continue to develop positively—and we welcome this.

Pakistan has generally taken a position on the Arab-Israeli dispute consistent with its Islamic ties. At the same time, the United States and Pakistan fully agree that a lasting, just, and effective peace in the Middle East is a key element in our mutual effort to enhance regional peace and stability. Pakistan welcomed President Reagan's September 1 initiative, [12] characterizing it as containing "positive elements." Although perceptual differences on the foregoing regional problems have, in the past, sometimes created difficulties in our bilateral relationship with the Pakistanis, our continuing frank dialogue with the Government of Pakistan is aimed at isolating such issues and preventing their becoming a source of disharmony in our overall relationship. We believe that the absence of unrealistic expectations about the nature of our ties with Pakistan will, to a large extent, reduce the likelihood of issues such as these creating significant problems in the larger relationship.

U.S. Assistance to Pakistan

The following is the breakdown of U.S. assistance to Pakistan for FY 1983–1985:

Year	FMS	ESF	IMET	PL–480 [13] Title I	PL–480 [13] Title II
1983	275	200	.8	50	4.6
1984	300	225	.8	50	7.4
1985	325	250	1.0	50	.....

The program outlined above is consistent with that presented to the Congress during the 1981 hearings on the Pakistan program.

In security assistance, Pakistan's most urgent requirement is the modernization of a professionally competent, but poorly equipped military. The centerpiece of our effort to assist the modernization program is the sale of 40 F–16 aircraft, the first six of which were delivered in January. Payments on these aircraft will continue through FY 1984 and 1985. Since the program was reestablished, we have also delivered, or are preparing for the transfer of, 100 M–48 tanks, howitzers, helicopters, APCs, and other urgently required items. We are also discussing with the Pakistanis additional eventual purchases along these lines, and such supplemental equipment as radars, night vision devices, and a variety of ammunition.

On the economic side, Pakistan's need for quick disbursing balance of payments and project aid is being met through our ESF program. In project assistance, the emphasis is on health care and family planning, agricultural and rural development, and narcotics control. Emphasis has also been placed on locating development projects in Pakistan's two most underdeveloped provinces, the Northwest Frontier Province and Baluchistan. Our projects for the most part span the life of the 6-year agreement. In 1985, we are projecting ESF funding of $250 million. A breakdown of our program is attached. [14]

As you know, the administration was unable to provide the targeted level of FMS guaranteed loan assistance to Pakistan out of the second Continuing Resolution for FY 1983. For that reason, we have requested an additional $75 million in FMS loan guarantees in our supplemental request. We believe that it is important that we make every effort to provide assistance at the agreed upon levels for two reasons.

First, on the basis of our 1981 understanding, the Pakistanis have undertaken obligations to U.S. defense contractors which, in FY 1983 alone, are in excess of $550 million. If U.S. assistance to Pakistan falls below targeted levels, the Pakistanis will be hard-pressed to meet their obligations.

We also need to take into careful account that we are at the very beginning of a major new program with Pakistan. The Pakistanis certainly understand the critical budgetary difficulties we face, and they appreciate the great lengths to which the administration has gone to provide as much funding as we have succeeded in providing to date. Nevertheless, a significant shortfall at such an early stage of our program would complicate our effort to build a credible relationship with the Government of Pakistan, which we require if we are to accomplish our overall strategic objectives.

Failure to provide the full measure of FMS credits during FY 1983 would also seriously disrupt the commendable progress to date of our carefully constructed program for the selective modernization of Pakistani forces.

In our February 23 hearing before this subcommittee, you asked about the possibility of covering the FY 1983 shortfalls through commercial borrowings.[15] We have investigated the possibility of a commercial loan of $75 million to the Pakistanis as a substitute for the FMS loan guarantees if the supplemental request fails. We have found that the differences between the two would have a significant impact on Pakistani payments. The first $150 million in FMS loan guarantees provided to the Pakistanis was at the rate of 10.125 percent, with a 3-year grace period and 9 years to repay, i.e., a total maturity of 12 years. Borrowing at commercial rates, the Pakistanis would likely be charged nearly 12 percent, with only 2 years grace and 5 years to repay, i.e., a total maturity of 7 years. As you can see, this would be a substantial increase. Moreover, the shorter repayment schedule on a hypothetical commercial loan would place the maximum impact of this loan between 1985–87, at precisely the time when we already estimate that Pakistan's overall debt service burden will be at its peak. Although the total debt service would be lower on commercial terms because of the shorter maturity, the annual payments would be less burdensome under the FMS loan program and the maximum burden will come somewhat later and will be much less severe.

Likewise, simply postponing the last $75 million in FMS loan guarantees to the FY 1984 request would seriously strain the ability of the Pakistanis to meet their FY 1983 obligations. We could not expect others to meet the shortfall.

Pakistan's International Relations

We believe that the program of security assistance which we have entered into with the Government of Pakistan will enable the Pakistanis to face more confidently the challenges they face as a result of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. After the Soviet invasion, there followed a series of pinprick attacks on Pakistan by Soviet air and ground forces. These challenges were brief incursions which penetrated only shallowly into Pakistan. The types of U.S. equipment which Pakistan has purchased will strengthen its deterrence and defensive capabilities.

Pakistan also continues to face the threat of a broader type of attack, i.e., a limited incursion designed to strike at Afghan refugee camps inside Pakistan which the Soviets consider to be sanctuaries for the Afghan resistance. Such an incursion would serve a secondary purpose of warning the Pakistanis of their vulnerability to attack. Our assistance will permit Pakistan to control its borders more effectively. Further, it will raise the threshold for that kind of activity.

We pointed out in our testimony in 1981 that we did not believe that our assistance will change to any significant degree the military balance between India and Pakistan.[16] This continues to be our assessment. We recognize that the modernization program undertaken by the Government of Pakistan will improve the capability of their forces to meet perceived threats from all directions. It is also clear that the experiences of the past, the closeness to the Indian border of Pakistan's key population and industrial centers and the historic concentration of its major military bases in the eastern part of the country inevitably mean that Pakistan will continue to station substantial forces there. Since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979 the Pakistanis have also focussed on improving their forces oriented towards the Afghan border. It is worth noting, in this context, that Pakistan is a relatively narrow country so that equipment can be moved from one border to the other. Moreover, important new items of equipment have been placed in the center of the country, approximately equidistant from both borders. The F-16's, for example, are based at Sargodha, in the central Punjab.

Inside Afghanistan, the struggle of the Afghan people to free themselves from the Soviet invasion continues. We believe that the mujahidin have continued to improve their tactics and appear to be better armed. The U.N. effort to provide for a peaceful resolution of the crisis continues. The United States supports the U.N. talks consistent with the UNGA resolutions on Afghanistan approved by an overwhelming number of the members calling for: 1) the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan; 2) the right of self-determination for the Afghan people; 3) the return of Afghanistan to its independent, nonaligned character; and 4) the return of the Afghan refugees in safety and honor. The Soviets hold the key to a peaceful resolution of this crisis. Until the Soviets indicate their willingness to negotiate a serious plan for the withdrawal of their forces from Afghanistan, there can be no progress on the additional points. Despite some early hints of possible flexibility in the new Andropov regime, there is so far no sign of Soviet movement in this area.

The last year did see some improvement in Indo-Pakistani relations. President Zia paid a brief visit to New Delhi on November 1, the first visit at that level since Prime Minister Bhutto traveled to India in 1972. His meeting with Prime Minister Gandhi was cordial and positive. Since then, the Indians and the Pakistanis have initialed an agreement to establish a Joint Commission to promote increased cooperation in a number of nonpolitical areas.[17]

We anticipate a continuation of these senior level exchanges in the coming months. President Zia and Prime Minister Gandhi will probably meet once again for a private discussion during the upcoming Non-Aligned Movement Summit in New Delhi. There will also be meetings at the Foreign Secretary level to conclude arrangements for the Joint Commission as well as to discuss earlier proposals for a treaty of friendship and a nonaggression pact. On the whole, we believe these are signs of an increasingly healthy relationship.

Our own ties with India have also improved over the last year. Both sides have considered it important for their own national interests to maintain a constructive relationship and to seek ways to strengthen cooperation, particularly through enhanced economic and commercial ties. While we continue to have differences over regional policies and perceptions, both sides seem to have a better understanding and appreciation for the other. Mrs. Gandhi's visit here last July played a major role in this regard. We have explained to India and Pakistan our desire to maintain fruitful relations with both countries and that neither bilateral relationship should be at the expense of the other.

With the establishment of the reinvigorated security relationship with Pakistan, the United States has become the major source of that country's modern military equipment. Nevertheless, Pakistan continues to receive important support from other countries, most notably the PRC. Pakistan has also acquired some equipment from other Western suppliers, in particular the French.

Nuclear Issues

Pakistan has continued to pursue a nuclear program that includes the construction of unsafeguarded reprocessing and enrichment facilities. These and other Pakistani activities are consistent with an effort to develop a nuclear explosives capability. If it chose to do so, Pakistan could realize this capability within the next few years.

In the past year, in the course of President Zia's discussion with President Reagan and other high level exchanges with the GOP, we have made clear that the new relationship between our two countries, and our program of military and economic assistance on which it rests, are ultimately inconsistent with the Pakistani development of a nuclear explosives device. President Zia has stated publicly that Pakistan will not manufacture a nuclear explosive device.[18] We believe that our ability to influence the direction of Pakistan's nuclear program depends on our ability to build closer ties with that country and continue our program of assistance—both of which will help address Pakistan's legitimate security needs and reduce Pakistan's incentives for nuclear weapons acquisition.

[17] Indian Minister of External Affairs P.V. Narasimha Rao and Pakistani Foreign Minister Sahabzada Yaqub Khan signed the Agreement Establishing an Indo-Pakistan Joint Commission at New Delhi, March 10, 1983; for text, see Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: South Asia, March 11, 1983, pp. E1-E2.

The United States has vigorously opposed exports intended for Pakistan's unsafeguarded nuclear program and has received good cooperation from supplier governments in controlling such exports when enough time and information could be made available to permit action under their laws. Nevertheless, Pakistan has succeeded in purchasing a substantial number of components for their nuclear program from companies in a number of nuclear supplier countries in recent years. The United States continues to work closely with exporting countries to improve our ability to control these sensitive exports.

With regard to the Indian reaction to Pakistan's nuclear program, in light of the history of conflict between the two countries we could expect New Delhi to be watching developments in Pakistan carefully. We hope that by encouraging Pakistani restraint in the nuclear area we will also help relieve Indian concerns.

Finally, in the commercial nuclear area, Pakistan has sought bids from nuclear exporting countries for the sale of a nuclear power reactor to be constructed at Chasma. We have made governments whose companies could be involved in such a sale aware that U.S. policy requires acceptance of safeguards on all of a country's nuclear activities as a condition of significant new supply commitments, and have urged them to adopt the same policy.

Human Rights and Democratization

Pakistan has now been under martial law for about 5 1/2 years. The Zia administration has made an effort to provide for some degree of representative government, most notably in the establishment of the Federal Advisory Council at the national level,[19] and in the promotion of local bodies at the municipal or county level. President Zia has promised new elections for the local bodies later in 1983.

Further progress toward the development of full representative government and an end to martial law awaits the completion of a proposed new form of Islamic government. President Zia has told Pakistani newspaper editors that the plan will be released later this year and will include a format for the orderly transfer of power to elected representatives. Zia also said it is his intention to provide for a system of government which would preclude the need for any further periods of martial law.

In the meantime, the Zia regime presently appears stable. The factors which led to earlier antigovernment upheavals in Pakistan, i.e., a poor economic performance, a united opposition, or a dramatic political development, do not seem to be present in the current climate. Moreover, the threat to Pakistan posed by the Soviet presence in Afghanistan has led many Pakistanis to value the internal stability provided by the current leadership.

The administration has continued to underline our hope that Pakistan will move toward a return to civilian, representative government, and our preference for working with democratically elected governments. We do not believe there can be any doubt in the minds of the Pakistani leadership about our position on these questions.[20]

Economic Assistance for Pakistan

Mr. Chairman and Members of the subcommittee. I appreciate this opportunity to testify in support of the administration's economic assistance request for Pakistan. For Fiscal Year 1984, we are requesting $225 million in Economic Support Funds and $50 million in PL 480 Title I food aid. This represents the third tranche of the new package of economic and food aid for the period FY 1982–87, which we negotiated with the Government of Pakistan in 1981.

Overview of the U.S. Economic Aid Program

Our economic aid package is an integral part of the overall U.S. program of assistance designed to support Pakistan in its role as a "frontline" state and to bolster Pakistan's capacity to withstand pressures arising from the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. But it is also a major development effort, designed to stimulate Pakistan's economic growth, and help meet the basic human needs of the Pakistani people.

The objectives of our assistance are to provide Pakistan with urgently needed short-term balance of payments support, and to stimulate the country's long-term economic and social development. Our 20 ongoing and planned development projects are heavily concentrated in the agriculture, population, health, and energy sectors, with special initiatives in private sector development and narcotics reduction. In support of the Government of Pakistan's own priorities, we are directing a substantial portion of our assistance to Pakistan's two poorest provinces: the Northwest Frontier Province (NWFP) and Baluchistan.

Our projects in the agriculture sector will strengthen research and extension services, rehabilitate irrigation systems, build new farm-to-market roads, improve on-farm water management, increase fertilizer inputs, and improve agricultural production, storage and distribution.

Our projects in the health and population sectors will help to control the incidence of malaria, and strengthen Pakistan's capability to provide primary health care services and mount an effective nationwide family planning program.

Our energy-related projects will help bring electricity to rural villages, develop Pakistan's indigenous energy resources, and increase the supply of fuel wood and wood products.

The main beneficiaries of our assistance are the rural poor. We will be measuring our success in terms of increased agricultural production, higher rural incomes, improved rural health services, reductions in Pakistan's population growth, increased energy production, more active participation by the private sector in economic development, and progress on the overall Pakistan–U.S. narcotics reduction effort.

The table attached at the end of this statement provides an overview of our proposed total economic and food assistance package for the period FY 1982–87. [22] Let me comment further on our planned assistance over the 6-year period:

—Nine projects were authorized in FY 1982; they are currently in the early stages of implementation. The other 11 projects are still in the design stage, with eight scheduled for authorization in FY 1983, and the remaining three in FY 1984. Thus, most of the additional ESF money we are requesting for FY 1984 is required to continue the funding and implementation of ongoing projects.

—The Economic Support Funds are being provided on a one-third loan and two-thirds grant basis. Thus, two-thirds of our economic aid will not be added to Pakistan's foreign debt burden; on the contrary, it will address Pakistan's urgent need for foreign exchange. The one-third being provided as loans will pose no burden for the Government of Pakistan (GOP) in the near-term. Our loans are amortized over 40 years, with a 10-year grace period (in which only 2% interest is due), and 3% interest thereafter.

—The total package includes considerable amounts of quick-disbursing aid, calculated to provide Pakistan with short-term balance-of-payments relief: the annual $50 million increments of Title I food aid (edible oil imports); the annual $60 million increments for the procurement of agricultural commodities (primarily fertilizer) and equipment; and other imports linked to specific development projects (e.g. rural electrification).

—Two of our projects will have components designed to assist Pakistan in increasing its export earnings: (1) Private Sector Mobilization; and (2) Agricultural Production, Distribution, and Storage. The former will stimulate new private investments in export-oriented industries, e.g. agricultural processing and marketing geared to the development of new markets in the Middle East. The latter is designed to increase the level of agricultural products available for export.

—Two of our projects—Population Welfare Planning and Social Marketing of Contraceptives—will assist Pakistan in dealing with its very serious population problem.

—Two of our projects—Tribal Area Development and another Area Development project, probably in the Gadoon—will contribute to our narcotics reduction activities.

—None of our projects is designed to increase Pakistan's security posture. The Rural Roads project, for example, is only designed to provide farmers with access to markets outside their immediate area. We do not expect our aid to directly benefit Pakistan's defense industries.

Other Donor Assistance

The United States is, of course, one of many donors providing economic assistance to Pakistan. The 16-member Pakistan Consortium (4 multilateral and 12 bilateral donors, under the chairmanship of the World Bank) pledged a total of $1.2 billion in aid to Pakistan for Pakistani Fiscal Year (PFY) 1982–83. Of that total, the United States and the World Bank pledged approximately 20% each, the Asian Development Bank about 17 per cent, with the remainder divided among the other members. Pakistan also receives economic assistance from the Soviet Union, China, and the oil-producing countries of the Middle East; none of these countries publicizes the amount.

The Pakistan Consortium will be meeting again in April 1983 to pledge assistance for PFY 1983–84. The members will also want to review Pakistan's progress on the major program of structural reforms and policy changes urged on the GOP by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), with strong support from the United States and other donors. This program includes:

—A reorientation of public investments from the industrial to the agricultural, energy, and social sectors;

—Improvements in public sector enterprise performance;

—Encouragement of private investment and export promotion;

—Liberalization of the import system; and —Further reductions in Government subsidies in the agriculture and energy sectors.

The Overall Economic Situation

The Pakistani economy continues to do as well or better than might be expected in the face of the worldwide recession. Over the past 5 years the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) has expanded at an average rate of 6% a year, with growth across all sectors. Growth in agriculture has averaged 4.1% a year; manufacturing has been expanding at an annual rate of 9.2%. This positive performance in recent years can be attributed to a number of favorable factors: GOP policy reforms, good weather conditions, relatively high prices for Pakistan's major exports (cotton and rice), substantial workers' remittances, and substantial aid from the donor community.

Last year (PFY 1981–82), real GDP increased by 6.3%, with the agricultural sector growing by 3%, and the manufacturing sector by 12%. The growth in agriculture was less than expected, due to a shortfall in wheat production. Major increases in fertilizer and refined sugar production accounted for the manufacturing sector's surge.

Also during PFY 1981–82, the GOP continued its cautious monetary and fiscal policies. Monetary expansion was held to 11%; official inflation was reduced to 12%; and, despite a shortfall in revenues, the budget deficit was financed without excessive domestic borrowing.

On the negative side, however, PFY 1981–82 saw a further deterioration in Pakistan's balance-of-payments situation, as a result of rising prices for Pakistan's major imports (oil and petroleum products), relatively depressed prices for Pakistan's major exports, a modest shortfall in remittances, and the effects of an overvalued rupee.

At this juncture, it is clear that the Pakistani economy remains highly vulnerable to exogenous forces. A large gap exists between savings and investment requirements. The private sector remains constrained by tight credit, and the Government's taxation, regulation, and labor policies. The dependence on workers' remittances and foreign energy suppliers is also excessive.

Oil Prices and Workers' Remittances

The massive contribution which remittances from Pakistanis who are working abroad make to Pakistan's balance of payments position can be seen from these statistics:

—The GOP expects workers' remittances in PFY 1982–83 to total almost $2.6 billion; this is more than double the amount of aid pledged by the Pakistan Consortium for PFY 1982–83;

—Last year, Pakistan's total bill for oil and petroleum product imports amounted to only 65% of the total of its remittances; and

—According to World Bank figures, Pakistan's balance-of-trade deficit in PFY 1982–83 will come to $3.4 billion, but due primarily to the projected workers' remittances, the current account deficit will be only $1.35 billion (a deficit which can be covered by net inflows from foreign aid and foreign exchange reserves).

Whether or not the recent reductions in oil prices will also mean a reduction in remittances from Pakistanis working in the Middle East oilfields remains to be seen. The GOP is currently projecting a 15% increase in remittances next year. A decline in remittances would, of course, be compensated by the very beneficial impact of cheaper oil prices.

The Foreign Debt and Military Expenditures

Another serious problem for the GOP is its growing foreign debt, which currently stands at about $12 billion. Pakistan's scheduled debt repayments in PFY 1981–82 totaled approximately $1 billion. As of December 31, 1981 the U.S. Government held $2.8 billion of Pakistan's foreign debt, or 21.7% of the total. The multilateral agencies held 24.8%, and the other bilateral consortium members held 22.5%. The remainder of the foreign debt is held by nonconsortium bilateral lenders (e.g. U.S.S.R., China, and OPEC) and the IMF.

As pointed out earlier, however, the U.S. economic assistance program will have very little impact on the amount of the GOP foreign debt. The table on the following page shows the projected impact of our total aid package (ESF, PL 480, and Foreign Military Sales) on Pakistan's debt service problem through 1995. It indicates that Pakistan's debt service ratio will reach a peak of 16.8% in 1987 (the last year of our proposed aid package) and that Pakistan's debt service ratio will actually decline in the out years, when the larger U.S. debt payments fall due. We consider the average 14.8% ratio projected over the entire period to be quite manageable.

Another potential factor in the equation is Pakistan's military expenditures. In PFY 1981–82 they amounted to about $1.5 billion, or 20% of the total GOP budget, and roughly 6% of GDP. Similar amounts and percentages are projected for the current fiscal year, and we consider these to be manageable levels.

Pakistan's Population Problem and AID's Assistance

With a current population of 90 million, Pakistan is the world's ninth most populous country. Its population growth rate of 3% is the highest in Asia, and almost double the world average. If present demographic trends continue, Pakistan will double its population in 25 years, and there would be little likelihood of the country achieving its economic and social development goals.

Many population programs have been launched by the GOP over the past 30 years, with massive support from the donor community. Yet most have failed, due to a combination of administrative, technical, and managerial problems and social and cultural constraints. Nevertheless, the current Government, with the strong personal support of President Zia-ul-Haq, is committed to a major population/family planning effort.

The GOP's Population Welfare Plan for the period 1980–1984 recognizes both the seriousness of the situation, and the need to address the problems which caused previous programs to fail. We expect the GOP's new Sixth Five-Year Plan to place special emphasis on population activities, and to call for renewed donor support for population/family planning programs.

As I have already indicated, two of our new projects are in this area. They will help strengthen the GOP's institutional capability for population planning, research and evaluation, and provide logistic and commodity support for the provision of contraceptives through the public and private sectors.

AID's Narcotics Related Activities

In response to Section 126 of the Foreign Assistance Act (the Gilman Amendment),[23] AID is giving priority attention to efforts aimed at narcotics reduction. We are using our overall aid package as leverage to encourage the GOP to enforce its legislation banning the cultivation, possession, sale, and use of opium poppies.

AID is providing—or plans to provide—a significant portion of its new assistance in the poppy-growing areas of the country, in order to develop viable economic alternatives for those Pakistanis currently engaged in illicit narcotics cultivation and production. I have already mentioned the two AID projects designed to impact on the poppy-growing regions of the country. The Tribal Areas project will involve the development of water resources, rural road construction, and other rural development activities. The other Area Development project (which is currently being designed, and which will probably be in the Gadoon area) will also include a mix of rural development activities.

Other AID narcotics related actions include:

—The inclusion of so-called "poppy clauses" in most of the countrywide rural development, agriculture, irrigation, rural electrification, and energy projects,

—A written commitment from the GOP that none of AID's assistance will be used in any way that might contribute to illicit narcotics production;

—Close collaboration with the Department of State's International Narcotics Matters staff in the design and implementation of its rural development project in the Malakand Agency of the NWFP, and —The establishment of a full-time U.S. narcotics project management officer on the staff of USAID/Islamabad. His function is to assure that—to the maximum extent possible—the entire U.S. project portfolio contributes to the narcotics reduction effort.

AID's development activities are, of course, just one part of a larger effort by the GOP and several U.S. Government agencies to reduce the flow of illicit drugs from Pakistan to the United States. I understand that in recent months there have been encouraging signs of progress being made on the enforcement side of the problem, with effective legal and police action by appropriate Pakistani federal and provincial organizations.

Progress on the development side is a longer-term proposition. We believe that our development activities will, in time, make a meaningful contribution to the total narcotics reduction effort.

The Afghan Refugees

AID's bilateral aid program does not directly support the Afghan refugee program; none of the ESF funds or PL 480 Title I food aid which we are requesting for FY 1984 are for the Afghan refugee effort. U.S. contributions to the refugee program are channeled through the World Food Program, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and the American Red Cross. The overall responsibility for channeling these U.S. contributions is vested in the Department of State's Bureau of Refugee Affairs. AID has an oversight role on the food shipments.

[23] Section 126, by Representative Benjamin A. Gilman, was added to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, by Section 110 of the International Development Cooperation Act of 1979, P.L. 96–53, approved August 14, 1979; 93 Stat. 363; 22 USC 2151x.

At the end of calendar year 1982, the GOP had a total of 2.7 million Afghan refugees officially registered in Pakistan and receiving assistance. About 2.1 million were located in the NWFP, with the remainder in Baluchistan.

The GOP bears full responsibility for the entire refugee relief effort, and the burden on Pakistani resources is considerable. During the current fiscal year, the GOP will provide approximately $238 million of its own funds for direct support to the refugees. The indirect cost to Pakistan in terms of the depletion of natural resources, overcrowding of existing social service institutions, and higher unemployment and inflation in the refugee areas is virtually incalculable. Nevertheless, the Pakistanis continue to show remarkable support and good will to the Afghanis.

The table on the following page summarizes the levels of assistance currently being provided by the donor community.[24] Missing from the table are the large but never publicly revealed contributions from the Middle East oil countries. As the table indicates, the United States is the largest single donor.[25]

Our contributions to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) support that organization's provision of tents, clothing, shoes, quilts, and medicine to the refugees. Our contributions to the International Committee for the Red Cross support its relief work in the refugee camps. We are providing Title II food (primarily wheat and edible oil) to the World Food Program (WFP).

Conclusion

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on the AID situation in Pakistan. Our new aid program clearly provides us with two major opportunities: (1) to make a substantial contribution to the overall U.S. effort to reestablish a long-term political, security, and economic relationship with Pakistan; and (2) to contribute to a significant improvement in the lives of the Pakistani people.

The United States has provided economic assistance in considerable amounts to Pakistan over the past 30 years; studies have shown that our assistance has played an important role in Pakistan's development. We are confident that the assistance we have proposed for FY 1982–87 will have a significant impact on Pakistan's future development.

Linking Foreign Aid to Efforts To Deal With Illicit Narcotics Production

. . . . . .

MR. SOLARZ. Yes. Under the terms of the Rodino amendment, as you probably know, the President is directed to suspend aid or military sales to any country when he determines that the country in question is not taking adequate steps to control production or shipment of illicit narcotics.[27] Now, I gather it would be your testimony that in the case of Pakistan the President would be able to make such a determination, the determination being that the Pakistani Government is not taking adequate steps to control production or shipment of illicit narcotics?

MR. DICARLO. My problem with that, sir, is this: I don't know what "adequate measures to prevent" means. In drafting a statute, if adequate prevention means enough measures to prevent the drug from coming into the United States, if that is what it means, then I would say that there is not a country on the face of the Earth that is doing that.

MR. SOLARZ. I wasn't here when this legislation was adopted.

MR. DICARLO. I know. Though by a new standard I just saw this morning in a document—this was just given to me this morning as I walked in—there was a definition placed in a new bill (S. 813) [28] as to what constitutes adequate standards. I would say clearly under that definition, Pakistan would comply with it and would pass it with flying colors.

MR. SOLARZ. What legislation is this?

MR. DICARLO. That was a newly revised version of Senator Moynihan's bill of last year—S. 2670 [29]—which did not define what adequate measures was.

MR. SOLARZ. But this year's version does define it?

MR. DICARLO. I think it defines it in such a way that Pakistan would very easily pass the standard.

MR. SOLARZ. And could you read us the definition?

MR. DICARLO. This is under subdivision (d) (S. 813) and it states:

> "The term shall be deemed to mean only those actions which result in tangible, significant and substantial reductions in the levels of production or stockpiles or supplies to the United States of opium or any of its illicit derivatives."

I would say there are substantial reductions in Pakistani production. We have heard testimony and we have information that the production is beneath the level of Pakistani use. Therefore, they must be drawing down their stockpiles. So I would say under that definition, they would certainly meet that standard.

MR. SOLARZ. Right.

Well, would you support legislation to define adequate in those terms?

MR. DICARLO. No sir, I would not support that kind of legislation. The only legislation I would—

MR. SOLARZ. Why not?

MR. DICARLO. I would like to base my answer on the Senator's former bill, because I have read that and I have not read this bill. I would not support that bill, No. 1, because it is so vague, so indefinite that no one can make a proper assessment of really—where it was to apply and what it was to apply to.

No. 2, under the original bill—and I have not read this portion of the bill to see how it applies today—we would use the NNICC as the sole standard to determine adequate measures of compliance or noncompliance. I don't believe the NNICC, which has produced estimates a year or two after the figures come about, can under any circumstances be a proper standard.

No. 3, I think you might get involved in a dispute over what are adequate measures? Does it mean a country is spending enough of its resources? Does that mean that I would have to go into Pakistan to determine what percentage of their budget was being spent? You have other problems.

MR. SOLARZ. Let me ask you this—

MR. DICARLO. But I will get to the major point. I am an advocate for control, but I believe legislation of this type hurts the narcotics program for this reason: Where we are placing in the law that says we are going to give a person, we are going to have to have a certification of whether they are doing a good job or a bad job. Once we don't certify them, as not doing or doing a bad job, where does that put me when I go around to them or other nations are telling them that they are not doing enough? We have given them a certification.

In addition to that, what kind of position do you want to place the executive in? Do you want to make a choice between placing our missiles in Italy or making a determination that perhaps we don't think they are spending enugh money in their budgets on narcotics control? I don't mean to say they are not spending enough, but this is the kind of thing that this type of legislation would do.

MR. SOLARZ. Let me ask you this. You made some very good points, obviously very thoughtful ones. They would have to be carefully considered. Do you think there ought to be any relationship between our foreign aid program in a country or our military sales to that country, and their efforts to deal with illegal or illicit opium production or refinement?

MR. DICARLO. I think that all of the facts and circumstances—our relationship between governments, what interests that government, what interests our Government—should all be taken into consideration in determining all assistance to a government. But I don't believe, even though I am an advocate for one issue, that we can base our relationship with the government on one sole issue, and I think that course would be disastrous.

MR. SOLARZ. So I gather you would be opposed to legislation that would flatly prohibit say, aid to Pakistan or perhaps any other country if it did not eliminate the illegal production of opium?

MR. DICARLO. I am not an expert, but I think the Congress has that before it every time a bill comes up. It can make that determination. What I oppose, however, would be to say that you are going to place the executive department in a position of coming in with some sort of a rating slip rated on one issue, and then based on that, saying no assistance, where we have other interests which could even be paramount.

MR. SOLARZ. Yes. In the case of Pakistan, and maybe in addition to yourselves, the Pakistani Desk Officer could answer, what would be the consequences if we adopted a provision requiring the termination of our military and economic aid program to Pakistan unless the Pakistanis had significantly or had in effect eliminated opium production in the country, virtually eliminated it, recognizing you could never eliminate it completely.

What would be the consequences? Would in fact the Pakistani Government proceed to virtually eliminate it regardless of the domestic price they had to pay, or would they simply throw up their hands and say, you have imposed an unacceptable requirement on us, and thanks, but we will have to do without your aid. What would be the consequences of the adoption of such a requirement?

MR. DICARLO. The consequences in Pakistan, I would leave to the Pakistani Desk. I would submit this is not only a bill for Pakistan, it deals with every country that processes heroin, every country where opium is grown, and I assure you if this came on the floor, it would be amended by Florida representatives to include coca and marihuana. I would also like to add that this kind of legislation not only cuts off assistance, but also cuts off all trade.

MR. SOLARZ. I am not necessarily advocating it, but I am saying what do you think would be the consequences in the Pakistani case if we adopted a requirement prohibiting any military or economic assistance unless they virtually eliminated opium production, and let's say the processing of opium as well.

MR. KIRBY. It seems to me—one can of course only speculate, but I would speculate that we would risk damage to a broad range of interests in Pakistan. First of all, on the narcotics control front, I think it is entirely conceivable that, to choose your formulation, the Pakistani Government would simply throw up its hands and say, well, under the conditions the United States is imposing, we don't think we can maintain any kind of worthwhile relationship with you.

I think if that happened, that is, if the aid relationship were totally ruptured, it would have serious implications for our efforts in the narcotics control field. I think it might well also have implications for our efforts to encourage nuclear nonproliferation in the subcontinent. I think it could even have implications for the close cooperation we are hoping to foster with Pakistan in other fields as well.

MR. SOLARZ. Is there any possibility at all that the Pakistani Government might decide to take whatever actions were necessary to eliminate the production, or wouldn't that even be considered on the grounds that it is impossible?

MR. KIRBY. Again, still speculating, and that is all I can do, I think a lot would depend on the language of the legislation.

I think the Pakistanis are serious people, their government is serious. I would identify myself with all the remarks this morning that we have heard about the will, the expressed will and intent on the part of the Pakistan Government to come to grips with the narcotics problem.

MR. SOLARZ. Please try to answer the question.

MR. KIRBY. I think that before deciding whether to cool relations with the United States markedly they would examine whether there is anything more they can do and I think they would examine the pace at which they thought they could proceed. I think they would in fact be willing to proceed up to the limits of their capacity. But I think—

MR. SOLARZ. But do the limits of their capacity fall short of the requirements of that legislation as I have described it?

MR. KIRBY. Clearly, in my judgment.

MR. SOLARZ. It does?

MR. KIRBY. I think so. I am not an attorney.

MR. SOLARZ. Your testimony would be that if we required the virtual elimination of production and refinement of opium in Pakistan by, say, within 1 year or even 3 or 4 years, that we would be establishing a requirement the government simply couldn't meet, even if it wanted to. Is that what you are saying?

MR. KIRBY. I think that is right. I can't get into the number of years. We already heard testimony this morning that says we don't have a collective judgment on how fast the Pakistanis could proceed even if the resources were available. [30]

MR. SOLARZ. We are talking here—most of the testimony has been basically on the merged areas. [31] That was several years into the future under the best of circumstances. But then you still have the tribal areas where there is ample room to increase production.

The reason I pose this question is that one can argue whether it is in the interest of the United States to make our entire relationship with the country hinge on their willingness to perform a certain action even if it is within their capacity to perform, because we have a multitude of interests, obviously. But it certainly doesn't make any sense to make our entire relationship hinge on the willingness of a government to perform an action which it lacks the capacity to perform even if it wants to perform.

I guess what I am asking you for is a judgment as to, not the wisdom of doing this, because as Dr. DiCarlo points out, you could argue we have a multiplicity of interests and even if they could do it, it would be unwise to establish this requirement. I am asking for a judgment about if we impose the requirement, could they, if they wanted to, meet the requirement? Or given the realities, is it simply beyond their capacity, no matter how great their determination?

Mr. DiCarlo.

MR. DICARLO. I would say if they wanted to put the effort in, do all the things they did before, the kinds of efforts they had to do, they probably can, considering the terrain, and technology involved. They would not be able to achieve a great deal more than they are now achieving, technically speaking, using acreage—

MR. SOLARZ. But you are saying two things. Let me make sure.

MR. DICARLO. This goes back to bringing the army in, all the policemen in, everything else.

MR. SOLARZ. You are saying two things. First, if they did all that, they could presumably substantially reduce production, but even then, not completely eliminate it.

---

[30] An amendment to Section 481 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, introduced by Senator Paula Hawkins, October 19, 1983, providing for the suspension of assistance to any country not meeting projected reductions in illicit drug production, was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 96–0, October 19, 1983, as part of the Senate bill authorizing Department of State appropriations for fiscal years 1984 and 1985. The House bill contained no comparable provision. The conference committee substituted a provision similar to the Senate amendment with additions providing flexibility to the President in determining whether to suspend U.S. assistance to an illicit narcotics-producing nation. It was enacted as Section 1003 of the Department of State Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1984 and 1985, P.L. 98–164, approved November 22, 1983; 97 Stat. 1053.

[31] The Northwest Frontier Province where the heroin was produced is divided into settled, merged, and tribal areas.

Second I presume you would say it would be at the price of tremendous domestic upheaval?

MR. DICARLO. If you had this whole area taken in one fell swoop, yes. Do it tomorrow, do it completely by next year is what I am speaking to.

One problem—not a problem, a comment I would like to make. I think the worst thing that can happen is again doing something, doing it because the United States alone wants it done. One of the substantial problems we have is to make this become an international matter, to make it become a problem that Pakistan wants to eliminate because it perceives it to be a problem it has to face. To have us come in there and say, hey, if you don't do this, you are not going to get any money from the United States, is to again put on center stage that the only reason the Pakistani Government is doing something is because of pressure from the United States, and that is not true in the case of Pakistan.

MR. SOLARZ. You have raised the question, as has the representative from the Pakistan desk, of the problems that might be created for us in terms of our other interests in Pakistan—nuclear proliferation, Afghanistan, Indo-Pakistani relations, and the like. Looking at it purely through the prism of our concern over the narcotics problem, would it be your judgment, as the relevant Assistant Secretary of State, that legislation hinging our aid to Pakistan to either the virtual elimination of opium production and refining or making substantially greater progress than they have in eliminating it would be helpful or not? Is it your testimony that purely in terms of our ability to get the Pakistanis to make more progress in eliminating opium production and refining—such a requirement in the legislation would be helpful or unhelpful, productive or counterproductive?

MR. DICARLO. I would say first of all, it would be counterproductive because it sets a precedent for dealing with other countries and other states, and its impacts on our total efforts in the world would be devastating and would not be profitable even if we limited it to Pakistan.

MR. SOLARZ. Right.

MR. DICARLO. As far as, if you are asking me whether Pakistan was the only nation in the world we were dealing with and we had no other interests in Pakistan but a narcotics problem and we didn't have to worry about the worldwide impact and effects, it could have some marginal basis of accelerating it. We intend to go back—you mentioned an important point before. Where do we go from here? We have our first projects in and being developed. We have seen them accepted. They are now being absorbed in Pakistan. We would hope to go back to them and say where do we go from here in the remaining areas?

MR. SOLARZ. Actually, your testimony somewhat surprises me. Because I would have thought you would have said, forgetting everything else, forgetting our relationship with other countries, forgetting the precedent for how we deal with this problem elsewhere, and the multiplicity of our problems with Pakistan, looking at purely Pakistan with the narcotics problem alone, I would have thought you would have said that we have established a relationship with Pakistan on this issue, they have started to make progress on it, they have a program which has worked in some limited areas, that we have got their commitment to expand the program in other areas and if we establish such a requirement which they are likely to conclude is beyond their capacity to meet, the chances are that they will walk away from the existing program, which is beginning to work.

MR. DICARLO. You would have to take that in connection with my prior statements. I don't believe they can meet the requirement that it is going to be eliminated. That is a given.

My answer to that question is that marginally you may get something more done. You might destroy the relationship between two parties in the process of doing it although you may accomplish something marginally. But if the criterion you are using is the almost total elimination, I believe I have already answered that when I compared it to Mexico. Even in the case of Mexico where we have a government which will do all it can, where you have rugged terrain—in Mexico the areas are much more under the control of the government than they are in this area—you are still producing heroin which makes a fairly substantial portion of that which is imported into the United States.

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Islamabad, July 4, 1983 (Extracts) [32]

"Relationships Between the United States and Pakistan . . . Have Been Advanced"

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I would first like to express my appreciation to President Zia, to Foreign Minister Yaqub Khan, and to the people of Islamabad and the people of Pakistan generally for the hospitality with which I have been received, by the very thoughtful and enlightening conversations and the seriousness of purpose by which this visit has been treated. It has been a very fine experience for me, and I have benefited greatly from it. I feel that the relationships between the United States and Pakistan, important as they are, have been advanced through our discussions of a great many bilateral matters. First of all, those covered by our Joint Commission effort, where there are a number of things already in motion and others that will be developed by the Commission activities. [33] Second, by our discussion of various important bilateral matters. Particularly, it was interesting to me that on three different occasions we were able to discuss the narcotics problem, and I am greatly heartened by the reports that I was given on that. Finally, it has been a distinct privilege for me and my party to have this visit, marked as it has been by the chance to talk with the Afghan refugees and all the events surrounding that yesterday, [34] to have this visit capped by a most hospitable and warm dinner last night with President Zia and a wide ranging conversation with him and his colleagues. So again I express my appreciation for not only the hospitality but also the content that has come with it during this visit. Now I will be glad to have questions.

Q. Mr. Secretary of State, while one can appreciate America's concern for strategic and security needs, what is the Reagan administration's concern for the violation of human rights and the absence of social justice to the peoples of Asia?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, the people of the United States, the President, are concerned about human rights problems everywhere in the world, including in the United States. It is a subject that is built into the character of the American people, and so we are always alert to problems and we try in as constructive a way as we can to help in doing something about them.

Q. Your Excellency, this is Mir Abdul Aziz of UPP. I think that your government is aware of the burning issue of the future of the state of Jammu and Kashmir which has been disturbing the relations between India and Pakistan for the last 35 years. In the recent elections in Indian-held Kashmir, not only Mrs. Indira Gandhi's party but all other Indian parties have been rejected by the muslims of Kashmir which proves that the issue of Kashmir is very much there and can prove at any time a danger. The point is what steps the American Government is going to take to solve the issue of Kashmir which is very much there?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I am not going to comment on questions of that kind, beyond saying this, that I found in India and I found in Pakistan a desire to improve the relationship between India and Pakistan. From the standpoint of the United States, a country that values its relationship with both countries, we certainly applaud that effort, we hope that it will, over a period of time, be eminently successful.

During an official working visit to East and South Asia and the Middle East, June 25–July 7, 1983, Secretary Shultz visited Pakistan, July 2–4, 1983.

[33] The agreement establishing the Pakistan-U.S. Joint Commission on Economic, Commercial, Scientific, Technological, Educational, and Cultural Cooperation, signed at Washington and entered into force, December 6, 1982, is printed in TIAS 10623.

[34] For a statement by Secretary Shultz at the Nasrbagh Refugee Camp, July 3, 1983, see document 414.

Q. After the inaugural session of the Pakistan-US Joint Commission,[35] the economic relations between the two countries will take a new turn. What do you say? And when do you think the next meeting of the Joint Commission will be held?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, the work of the Joint Commission, I am sure, will follow the suggestions made by Minister Yaqub Khan at the meeting, namely that we will establish three subcommissions. These subcommissions will get into the operational detail, and when they have produced something substantive for us to look at in the Joint Commission as a whole, then we will meet about that. We've had our overall meeting and we have put this process in motion. I think, as I remember your statement, you hope and I concur that we ought to have these subcommissions going before the end of the year. Again I call your attention to the fact that in each of the important areas involved there is already a lot of activity, so it isn't as though you have a standing start and you have to generate things. There is motion there. We think it can be accelerated, expanded, and qualitatively improved by the work of the subcommissions and the Joint Commission.

Q. The 3.2 billion [dollar][36] deal between Pakistan and the United States is an important part of the economic assistance, but the recent congressional debates and the cuts authorized to foreign assistance have been a cause of concern here. Have you given any assurances to the Pakistani side regarding the American commitment for foreign assistance?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. We have discussed this issue, and of course it is important to the President to get his program through the Congress. The issues involved, as we have discussed them here with President Zia, the Foreign Minister, are basically twofold. On one hand, there is the level and flow of assistance in terms of its magnitude and composition; and on the other hand, there is the question of the ability to plan for that continuing flow. Both problems are present. It is a problem that derives from our budget process in the United States, and we have done a variety of things about it including in particular the appointment of a commission headed by an eminent American, Frank Carlucci, who with a variety of others, and congressional involvement, are focusing on this issue.[37] But I think that we are going to [be broadly successful in][38] our effort and the picture looks good, but we do have always conflicts in the congressional authorization and appropriations process, and that is the Congress's constitutional [duty to][39] appropriate funds, and we work with them and trust that they will see matters our way.

Q. Your excellency, don't you feel that the Russian attitude toward Pakistan has become stiffer day by day? In this background, can we trust you regarding our security?

A. Well, what the Russian attitude is toward Pakistan is a question I think the Foreign Minister should address himself to. As far as the United States is concerned, we have a close relationship with Pakistan. We have a security relationship with Pakistan, and we share concerns about Soviet behavior, particularly as it is exhibited in Afghanistan. We are supporting each other in the effort to deter Soviet aggression there, and I might say we have the same attitude as a worldwide proposition.

Q. How do you find the long-term prospects of a strong and enduring relationship with Pakistan?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I think the prospects for the relationship of the United States and Pakistan in the long-term are excellent, and the reason is that we are building this relationship on a solid foundation of bilateral interests that we have with each other. And then we are moving from that to interests we have in common about various problems around the world. But the foundation is the direct relationship between the United States and Pakistan, and as that grows it tends to be self-reinforcing. We are looking at it just as you implied in your question—as a long-term proposition and not as some sort of a quick relationship.

Q. How do you view your meeting with Zia Ul Haq?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It was an excellent meeting from my standpoint. First of all, the President organized it as a small group of people, so we were able to sit around for the entire time and have intense conversation. We covered a wide range of subjects, and I found it a very worthwhile conversation. I might say, having met with President Zia before—this is my first time in Pakistan and over an extended period of time, that he comes across as a man of great ability and with a very wide range of knowledge and insights, and so I benefited greatly from the conversation.

Q. Does the American Government have interest in the restoration of elected democracy in Pakistan? Was this the subject of discussion with President Zia and what is the American reaction to such proposals as he might have been making?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Of course, we are always interested in movements in the direction of democracy. It is my understanding that there will be a statement about this subject. I don't know what the contents of it will be, but there will be a statement about this subject in the middle of August. We look forward to that with keen anticipation.

. . . . . .

Q. Why is the United States still opposing the peaceful nuclear program of Pakistan?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The United States Government is not opposing the development of nuclear power for peaceful uses in Pakistan. It was notable to me that President Zia went out of his way to assure me that that, and only that, was the objective of the Government of Pakistan. We discussed this last night.

Support For Ending Martial Law and Returning Pakistan to Elected Government

. . . . . .

Q. Do you have anything on Zia's political program in Pakistan and/or the violence that they had over the weekend?

A. Yes. With respect to the plans that President Zia announced about the ending of martial law in March 1985,[41] we welcome any step toward ending martial law and returning Pakistan to an elected government.

I can't really speak to the demonstrations other than to say that they were planned long in advance to coincide with Pakistan's independence day[42] and with President Zia's announcement. I would note there have been reports that indicate there were also demonstrations in favor of

Address by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs (Marshall) Before the International Nuclear Law Association, San Francisco, September 12, 1983 (Extracts) [43]

U.S. Opposition to Pakistani Unsafeguarded Nuclear Power Development

The meetings of the International Nuclear Law Association (INLA) every 2 years provide a timely opportunity to reflect on international nuclear energy development and nonproliferation policies. As nuclear lawyers, we are specialists engaged in negotiating, contracting, and other pursuits which in some manner relate to nuclear energy—a technology which can provide the answers to our energy security needs but a technology which, if misused, can lead to profound consequences. Indeed, this concern has been a cause of frustration in many of our legal endeavors, but hopefully we can view it as a challenge to be overcome through the exercise of our legal skills. The problems posed by proliferation obviously cannot be ignored in our work in the nuclear field, and, indeed, we have the opportunity, through our efforts in international lawmaking, to make meaningful contributions to preventing the further spread of nuclear arms. With this premise in mind, I would like to assess what has been accomplished since the beginning of the administration of President Reagan and what challenges remain in reaching nonproliferation goals and improving international nuclear cooperation. Let me first reflect on some historical background.

Eight years ago, at the time of the INLA meeting in 1975, many of the nonproliferation problems the international community now faces were already before us or were looming on the horizon. A nuclear device had been detonated the previous year in India, and there were growing concerns in some quarters that additional proliferation would follow.

In 1977 a new administration had established itself in Washington with some strong views on how best to deal with proliferation. By the time of the INLA meeting that year, that administration had announced its nonproliferation policy and how it would be carried out. This policy included some approaches which departed quite significantly from previous U.S. practices. By 1979, when INLA next met, the full effect of the new U.S. policy had been experienced in varying ways in the United States and around the world. Many aspects of this policy were not well-received by other nations engaged in nuclear power development. Much of the new U.S. effort centered around an initiative to seek abandonment of reprocessing spent fuel in favor of a once-through cycle.

In January 1981, when the Reagan administration assumed office in Washington, it was immediately confronted with a number of proliferation concerns. One of a serious magnitude centered principally on certain extant activities and intentions in South Asia. A general problem that was readily apparent was that cooperation with other suppliers had been hampered by their dissatisfaction with the policies of the previous administration. This was particularly true with respect to controlling exports of nuclear equipment of a sensitive nature and preventing exports for unsafeguarded purposes.

Since early 1981, the United States has undertaken a major effort in South Asia to deal with the underlying causes that might lead to proliferation in the subcontinent. The United States has provided significant foreign assistance to Pakistan to improve upon our longtime alliance. For example, nearly $275 million was provided in 1982 and $585 million is estimated for 1983 which amounts to a doubling of our efforts—much of this in the form of increased military assistance.

Stability in South Asia had become understandably shaken in late 1979 by the Soviet invasion and occupation of neighboring Afghanistan. U.S. assistance has permitted Pakistan to strengthen its conventional defensive capability. This serves to bolster its stability and thus reduce its motivation for acquiring nuclear explosives. In addition there have been discussions between our two countries at the highest levels which have led to greater understanding of the need to avoid activities which raise concerns regarding proliferation in the region.

The United States does remain concerned with certain Pakistani plans—specifically any unsafeguarded operation of its new labs reprocessing plant and its continued efforts to complete construction of an unsafeguarded enrichment plant. Because of the development of these unsafeguarded facilities, built in large part through the use of imported Western technology and equipment, our position has been that suppliers should not cooperate in the development of the nuclear power station now planned to be built in Pakistan. This position is consistent with longstanding U.S. policy of seeking to have all nations require comprehensive safeguards as a condition of major new supply. We hardly believe it appropriate for Western suppliers to provide Pakistan with nuclear technology while the government there continues with its development of unsafeguarded facilities which have a destabilizing effect on the global nonproliferation regime.

What will evolve in Pakistan, and India as well, remains to be seen, of course. The United States intends for its part to continue to take actions to bolster security in the South Asian region in furtherance of its approach of dealing with the underlying causes of proliferation.

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), Islamabad, October 2, 1983 (Extracts) [44]

U.S. Role in Strengthening the Defense of Pakistan

Good Morning, ladies and gentlemen. I have a very short statement here and then I'll be glad to try to take any of your questions. We've had a very beneficial and a very full schedule of events here in our visit to Pakistan, and this has been my first visit to this very beautiful and strategically located and important country. Indeed I am told this is the first visit that any United States Secretary of Defense has made to Pakistan, and I would just like to say that we've had extraordinarily cordial treatment, very warm hospitality, fully living up to the reputation of this country, and very informative discussions with the President, with the Minister of Defense, [45] who is here this morning, and with other senior officials. And I think these have been very useful in every way. We've all increased our understanding of Pakistan's enormously important position and the efforts that Pakistan is making to increase the strength of her own defense and therefore that of the free world. I was especially moved yesterday by my trip to the northwest frontier and the refugee camp, [46] and I could certainly share the anguish that anyone must feel over the cruel and current fate of their homeland, and of their families and themselves, and this of course is all directly due to the Soviet invasion of their homeland. Along with all other free men, I can also share the refugees' determination to see Afganistan rid of Soviet forces and to see its independence restored. In this regard, I think we can all say now that we have even greater admiration for the very courageous and hospitable role that Pakistan has played in receiving and caring for these millions of refugees. I'd also like to emphasize the value which the United States places on its relationship in all of its forms, military, economic, and just as friends with Pakistan. We recognize fully the contributions that Pakistan is making as a leading nonaligned and Islamic state to regional peace and security, and we are very proud in the United States to have a role in trying to help the people of Pakistan to strengthen their own defenses and to help advance their economic development. And I'll be very glad now to try to take any of your questions.

Q. Before you came here. . . . [inaudible].[47] Can you discuss this point during the talks here and what was the result of it?

A. The FMS program that we have for Pakistan is of course governed by our laws and our rules and those rules require annual appropriations by the Congress. Our administration and our government has made a commitment to Pakistan for the full amount of the aid—some $3.2 billion—over the period of years called for in the program.[48] We will make every effort we can to make sure that every dollar of that is appropriated by the Congress and distributed to Pakistan. Obviously we have no complete control over the Congress, but we will make every possible effort that we can, and I think a very encouraging thing is the fact that two congressional delegations have called on the leaders of Pakistan very recently and have been able to see for themselves not only the need, the importance of Pakistan remaining strong and free, and I would very much hope that on the basis of that and other visits which are to come [and] other visits which we've had, that the full amount will be appropriated. We'll certainly try our very best, I can assure you of that. Because we're absolutely committed to doing everything we can to get the full amount for Pakistan.

Q. In view of serious airspace violations by Afghanistan, what will be your and the Defense Department's reaction if Pakistan decides to shoot down a MIG–21?

A. Well, I never answer hypothetical questions, but any violation of any country's airspace or landspace or sea, of course, is a very serious violation. There is no way that this last violation can possibly have been called accidental.[49] And deliberate violations of that kind are fully in keeping with the policy of the Soviet Government as demonstrated by the way in which they shot down the Korean airliner without any compunction whatever, murdering 269 men, women, and children who were totally innocent of any participation. It is a serious violation by the Soviets and their further, additional violations would certainly compound the problem.

Q. You have been aware that the Indian Prime Minister and the Indian Minister of External Affairs[50] have been issuing statements which are tantamount to interference in Pakistan's internal affairs and if there are people in Pakistan who fear that they may interfere in Pakistan's internal

[49] At a press conference in Islamabad on September 20, 1983, Pakistani Foreign Secretary Niaz A. Naik said that Afghan aircraft violated Pakistan's airspace 10 times, September 18–19, 1983. He confirmed that on September 18, 1983, six MiG aircraft bombed the area near Parachinar injuring six persons. Naik said that he had protested nine additional violations to the Afghan Chargé in Islamabad, September 20, 1983, and that Pakistan had discussed the intensification of violations of its airspace with the Soviet Chargé in Islamabad. He said that Pakistan in accord with its policy of patience and restraint did not order its aircraft sent to the area of the violations to take action against the intruders. (Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: South Asia, September 21, 1983, p. F1) A letter of September 21, 1983, from the Pakistani Representative to the United Nations, S. Shah Nawaz, to U.N. Secretary-General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, informed the United Nations of these violations of Pakistan's airspace and of Pakistan's protest to Afghanistan over them. affairs, what will be the reaction of the American Government at the time? [51]

A. Well, the American Government's reaction, of course, would depend on what actions were taken. We certainly do not interfere in the internal affairs of any country, including Pakistan, and I wouldn't have any further comment on that. I think the Pakistani Government is fully capable of taking care of any problems that might be caused by anything that could be construed as interference, but I make no comment on it.

Q. Is the United States concerned with the anti-American feeling in the political opposition in Pakistan? I refer to the burning of the American flag in a public meeting in Karachi last week and the statement made by the MRD on your arrival that if the U.S. aid continues then the United States will suffer the same fate here that it suffered in Iran. [52]

A. Well, there is anti-American feeling in a great many places, including America, and I think that what we have to bear in mind is what the majority of the people feel, what the government itself, what position they're taking, and I would say that I came with an awareness of the importance of maintaining very good and friendly and cordial, mutually cooperative relationships with Pakistan, and certainly I leave this morning with that feeling very much reinforced, and I know that there will be sporadic outbursts from time to time of people who are on the other side, people who occasionally support the Soviet Union, people who feel that any assistance to any country is somehow wrong, but I haven't encountered anything but very strong and warmly supportive opinion with respect to the United States and I think that we all can be very grateful for that in the United States. There are certainly going to be individuals and individual demonstrations from time to time—the things of the kind you referred to—but that is not anything that I think either would or should be allowed to interfere with the kind of relationship that we need in this sort of a very troubled world, parts of which were described by this gentleman's question just a moment ago. [53]

Q. Does the current administration accept the Carter Doctine regarding the Gulf? [54]

A. Well, I don't know that there has been any change in the American position before, during, or after the Carter or the Reagan administration with respect to the importance of maintaining freedom and independence of the Gulf states and free access to its resources.

Q. Could you discuss some issues related to the strategy consensus between the United States and Pakistan in view of the trouble in [inaudible]?

A. Well, I don't know what a strategy consensus is. We discussed the fact that we have a lot of shared objectives with respect to the maintenance of freedom. We discussed a number of things including assessments, our mutual assessments of the nature of the Soviet threat, and we concluded, as we've done every time before [51] In a letter of September 4, 1983, to Prime Minister Indira Gandhi of India, President Zia-ul-Haq of Pakistan urged the Indian Government to observe the principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of Pakistan in letter and spirit. President Zia referred to a letter of August 26, 1983, from Prime Minister Gandhi to him and to a statement by her mentioning the internal situation in Pakistan and steps taken by the Pakistani Government toward its nationals. For information, see Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Daily Report: South Asia, September 26, 1983, p. F1.

[52] The statement under reference by the Movement for Restoration of Democracy, a coalition of nine Pakistani opposition political parties, was not further identified.

[53] The question under reference reads as follows: "In your airport statement referring to the brutality of the Russian forces in Afghanistan you referred to the recent incident of shooting down of the passenger plane of Korea. I think during the period of four years this was the third act of brutality, barbarism, and aggression: Poland, Afghanistan and this shooting, these evils have shaken the world conscience up to the level of condemning the Russian positions. How many more issues, do you think, of this nature will require to awaken us to realizing the need of some positive and concrete steps to stop this thing?"

[54] The statement in President Carter's State of the Union Address before a joint session of Congress, January 23, 1980, referred to as the Carter Doctrine reads as follows: "An attempt by any outside force to gain control of the Persian Gulf region will be regarded as an assault on the vital interests of the United States of America, and such an assault will be repelled by any means necessary, including military force." (American Foreign Policy: Basic Documents, 1977–1980, p. 55)

when we've had discussions, that it is vital that we work together and work in a mutually supportive way to secure these shared objectives.

Q. The Soviet Union has provided India the latest weaponry and it has also brought the latest weaponry into Afghanistan. Don't you think that Pakistan forces need modernization and latest weaponry?

A. Well we're giving and working with Pakistan to try to provide very advanced weaponry. We don't have anything much more advanced than the F–16, and we are doing all that we and Pakistan feel is essential to the very necessary strengthening of the Pakistan Defense Forces. As I said earlier, I very much hope that we'll work very vigorously to make sure that we continue to do that in accordance with the agreed upon plan, the plan agreed upon by both Pakistan and the United States, and that calls for the transfer of some very advanced weaponry.

Thank you very much.

Chapter 13. East Asia

A. Regional Policies and Developments

1. General Statements of U.S. Policy in Asia

Document 443

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (International Security Affairs) (Armitage) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 23, 1983 [1]

Security Assistance in East Asia

Mr. Chairman, thank you for this opportunity to offer comments from a Defense perspective on the administration's FY 1984 foreign assistance request for East Asia and on its FY 1983 supplemental request. We feel very strongly as a Department and I am personally convinced that a strong, coherent, and reliable security assistance program, adequately funded by Congress, is an absolutely essential complement to our efforts to strengthen America's defenses. Had you not asked me, I would have asked you for this opportunity to register my strongest support for the administration's foreign assistance requests which are under consideration by this committee, particularly those portions pertaining to East Asia and the Pacific. I have been heavily involved in their preparation. I am certain that they are fully justified. If anything, they are less than we really need because of our efforts to keep the requests to minimum prudent levels in view of economic constraints.

Mr. Chairman, you asked that I address several questions in my statement. Some parts of these questions are more appropriately addressed by others, for example, those which deal with the administration's general foreign policy stance and the mix between economic and security assistance. On those, I will defer to my colleagues. In my remarks, I will address those portions of each question which are of particular concern to Defense.

The security of East Asia and the Pacific is vital to the security of the United States. Five of the seven defense agreements to which the United States is a party are located there, including bilateral treaties with Japan, Korea, and the Philippines; the Manila Pact [2] which adds Thailand to our treaty partners; and the ANZUS treaty. [3] Each and every one of these agreements is more important today than on the day it was signed. The security of the United States has become increasingly interdependent with that of each of its Pacific allies.

During the past decade and a half the Soviets have taken disturbing steps to improve their military capabilities and expand their influence throughout the region. Their efforts continue unabated. The war between Vietnamese occupation forces and the Khmer resistance forces continues in Kampuchea with cross-border incursions into Thailand and attendant dangers to the security of our Southeast Asia ally. North Korea continues to expand and modernize its armed forces which are offensively configured and which already exceed any rational measure of purely defensive requirements.

READEX FICHE

To maintain the security of the United States, our allies, and our SLOCs against the growing Soviet threat and to maintain regional security, we rely principally on our allies to meet local threats while maintaining forward deployed forces in Korea, Japan, and elsewhere in the Pacific to fulfill our commitments to our allies and to meet the Soviet threat. We are urging all of our allies to do more in the common defense. Three of our six Pacific allies are capable of doing so without U.S. security assistance. However, the other three look to us for financial support and they—the Republic of Korea, Thailand, and the Philippines—would receive the major portion of the East Asia FY 1984 request for security assistance. Korea and Thailand are also the only countries in the region for which we are seeking increases over the FY 1983 FMS credit request.

Both we and our Japanese allies consider stability on the Korean Peninsula to be essential to the security of Northeast Asia. The U.S. commitment to the defense of the ROK is manifest in our forces stationed there who, if deterrence failed, would be engaged immediately alongside ROK forces under the only combined US/Allied command outside NATO. The least expensive and most effective way to improve the capabilities of the US/ROK Combined Forces Command to defeat, and thereby deter, a North Korean attack is by assisting the ROK to improve the capabilities of its forces. Increased FMS credits for Korea therefore are the most cost effective way to accomplish the improvements needed to defend our interests in Northeast Asia.

Increased credits are also essential to our credibility with our Korean allies, who at great sacrifice are increasing their defense capabilities and contributing to the costs of U.S. forces as well. The Koreans believe that their efforts make it not unreasonable to ask the United States to help them make their purchases now, when they are needed, by offering substantial amounts of credit. Successive Secretaries of Defense have agreed and pledged their best efforts to provide the needed credits. However, as one of the largest programs not earmarked traditionally by Congress, the Korea program is usually the one to suffer most when Congress cuts the budget or leaves us with a continuing resolution. As a reliable ally who is doing virtually all that we ask in its defense efforts, the ROK deserves better treatment.

The United States is committed to the security of Thailand by the Manila Pact. American troop presence is the main symbol of our commitment to our other frontline East Asian ally, Korea. For Thailand, the symbol is our willingness to provide security assistance support. Not only Thailand, but the other ASEAN states and, undoubtedly, Vietnam and the Soviet Union as well, look to our security assistance for Thailand—the ASEAN frontline state—as a major indicator of U.S. security interests in the region.

Unhampered use of the facilities at Clark AB and Subic Naval Base is very important to our forward deployments in the Western Pacific and to our ability to project forces into the Indian Ocean. This is the strategic rationale for making good on the levels of assistance pledged by President Carter at the conclusion of the 1979 amendment to the Military Bases Agreement.[4] The value of the bases is further enhanced by improvements in the capability of the Philippines to contribute with the United States to the mutual defense of their country, including defense of the bases.

The remaining major recipients of security assistance in East Asia are Indonesia and Malaysia. Although nonaligned, Indonesia and Malaysia are friendly nations who maintain positions on numerous issues, including rights of passage through critical SLOCs, which are compatible with U.S. policy. United States support for efforts to modernize the defense forces of these countries helps to maintain their confidence in their ability to resist intimidation from the growing Soviet power projection capability in Southeast Asia. It thereby helps assure friendly flanks for the strategic straits through which shipping critical to the security and well-being of the United States and its allies must pass.

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, there is strong and compelling strategic rationale for our security assistance to all of our major East Asia and recipients. Our security assistance programs complement and support U.S. forward deployments in the region. Moreover, through their contributions to standardization and interoperability of equipment and to mutual understanding of tactics and operating procedures, they enhance our collective ability to deal with the increased threats to peace and security in East Asia.

[4] For text of President Carter's pledge, which was contained in his letter to Ferdinand E. Marcos, President of the Republic of the Philippines, dated January 4, 1979, as well as the 1979 amendment to the Military Bases Agreement, see, respectively, 30 UST 886 and 30 UST 863.

In addition to security assistance, we are engaged in a broad range of planning and training activities with our Asian friends and allies which improve our ability to coordinate efforts and enhance our joint ability to deal with regional threats and with the regional manifestation of the global Soviet threat. Secretary Weinberger visited each of our East Asian allies last year to assure them of the continued steadfast commitment of the United States to their security. He also urged them to improve their defenses and work with us to improve the coordination of our efforts. In our annual consultations with Japan we made progress in refining our respective roles and missions in the defense of Japan. Joint planning and joint training exercises with our Asian allies further improve our capabilities for wartime cooperation.

The International Military Education and Training (IMET) program is probably the most cost-effective program we have for enhancing cooperation with our friends and allies. By helping countries afford technical training of more personnel in U.S. military schools, it improves their ability to make best use of U.S.-origin equipment. Common equipment and common procedures enhance cooperation.

The most enduring payoff of IMET, however, is probably its professional education component. The payoffs are intangible and hard to document or measure. But every United States military officer I know who has had duties requiring him to deal with foreign military forces attests to the value of IMET. Professional military education in the United States will not guarantee that a foreign officer will always agree with American ideas but it does increase the probability that any disagreements will be substantive rather than the result of misunderstanding or faulty assumptions. Moreover, the associations formed with American officers can generate a reservoir of good will toward the U.S. Armed Forces which will enhance future cooperation throughout the foreign student's career. It makes a tremendous difference in our ability to communicate and coordinate when there is preexisting mutual understanding and when we can begin without many of the cultural and perceptual obstacles that might otherwise exist.

A major problem in carrying out the IMET program has been brought about by our budget process itself. Most training, particularly the longer courses, involves major personnel actions which require dislocation of the affected officer and his family, require assignment of a replacement, etc. The better military establishments plan these actions well in advance. For IMET recipients, this means programming personnel for the training on the basis of the administration's request; it would be too late if they waited until the budget is approved. If the budget is cut, requiring reductions in the country programs, many foreign soldiers are inconvenienced, some of them severely. In those cases, what should have been a good experience which promotes a positive U.S. image, becomes its opposite. We put the recipient countries in a dilemma. If they underprogram, they risk being unable to fill the training quotas when they are available; if they program fully, they risk the human costs I have described. Most adopt the latter course rather than risk losing training. The program is a small item in the total budget. We should be able to fully fund it.

Turning now to specific country requests, I will address your remaining questions on the relative portion of each country's defense effort underwritten by U.S. aid, likely consequences of FY 1983 cuts, and reasons for the country levels. I will not repeat the statistics presented by Assistant Secretary Wolfowitz. [5]

Indonesia spends 3 percent of GNP on defense, 11.4 percent of the total budget. Our security assistance is equivalent to 1.5 percent of the Indonesian defense budget. Failure to pass the supplemental request would jeopardize ongoing programs for C–130 overhaul and purchase of ammunition war reserves which require $36 million in FY 1983, and provide no support for Indonesia's modernization programs. Failure to provide requested FY 1984 levels could cause serious impairment of Indonesia's modernization programs and new procurement, including artillery, communications and logistics support systems. It would have repercussions on the credibility of assurances given by the President and the Secretary of Defense that the United States would continue its strong support for Indonesia's defense requirements.

FMS credits underwrite a significant portion of the ROK's defense procurement from the United States which is expected to total $4.7 billion during the period FY 82–86. Korea spends 6 percent of GNP on defense—more than 35 percent of its budget—and over 25 percent of its defense budget is spent in the United States. Our security assistance equates to 3.6 percent of the ROK defense budget. Over $200 million of ROK annual procurement from the United States is for spares and logistical support for its existing inventory of almost exclusively U.S. equipment. The remainder is for new equipment purchases.

North Korea spends more than 20 percent of the GNP of its garrison state economy on the military and its offensively configured forces enjoy a substantial quantitative advantage over the South. The ROK must modernize its defenses with some urgency if it is to keep this gap from widening and build the foundation for eventually closing it. The second ROK Force Improvement Plan (FIP II) is designed to accomplish critically needed modernization by 1986. The Country Team, U.S. commanders in Korea, and our Pacific commanders support the plan and the need to accomplish it on time. FIP II involves new equipment purchases from the United States of $3.2 billion and requires increased credit if it is to be completed on time. The FMS credit levels requested for FY 83 and FY 84 are only marginally adequate; reduced amounts under the continuing resolution are clearly inadequate.

Until the ROK officially evaluates any unanticipated credit reduction and revises FIP II accordingly, we will not be in a position to identify which specific procurements will have to be cancelled or deferred if we do not get our FY 1983 supplemental and FY 1984 requests. Possibilities include planned procurements of Copperhead, Stinger, tanks, Howitzers, I-Hawk, Tow, and attack helicopters. Although the ROK probably could continue its highest priority purchases on time, it would have to stretch out others like artillery components and helicopters, despite its critical needs for more firepower and tactical mobility to offset North Korea's advantages.

Malaysia spends almost 10 percent of GNP on defense. Our small aid program equates to only 0.5 percent of that effort. The modest levels requested for Malaysia would only partially support substantial tactical aircraft and armored car purchases Malaysia is currently negotiating with U.S. companies. Reduction of FMS credits below the levels of previous years at a time when Malaysian projected purchases are increasing may not cause these particular sales to be cancelled, but it will reduce the attractiveness of future purchases from the United States in comparison with European sources. European countries, which supply much of Malaysia's equipment, typically manage to guarantee financing for at least part of each sale. Our failure to provide similar consideration would be seen as lack of USG interest in Malaysia's modest modernization efforts.

In the Philippines our security assistance equates to 7.3 percent of the total defense budget, which approximates 2 percent of GNP. This proportion is the largest among the East Asian recipients. The FY 1984 levels are the last increment of a $500 million package which President Carter pledged his best efforts to provide at the time of the 1979 amendment to the Military Bases Agreement. Failure to provide these levels would jeopardize the fifth-year review of the agreement which is being conducted during 1983.

The increased threat caused by the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea prompted Thailand to more than double its annual FMS purchases from the United States to accomplish much needed modernization. During FY 79–82, Thailand spent over $900 million on new military purchases from the United States, only 20 percent of which ($182 million) was underwritten by FMS credits.

Thailand spends 4% of its GNP on defense—almost 20 percent of its budget. U.S. security assistance amounts to approximately 5 percent of what the Thai spend on defense. Thailand spends 8 percent of GNP on development. This proportion is appropriate for a developing country which still faces an insurgency. However, it limits the extent to which Thailand can finance without credit the hardware it needs for modernization. The Thai estimate that they need to spend approximately $350 million per year for capital purchases to replace attrition and carry out their most important modest modernization programs. The Thai budget can only support capital expenditures of approximately $200 million, leaving a $150 million annual shortfall.

Credits underwrite only part of the total Thai procurement from the United States. Therefore, we cannot be sure which specific programs would be cancelled or delayed if requested FMS credit and MAP levels are not restored for FY 83 and maintained for FY 84. However, it is apparent that since we have already restrained our requests to a minimum level short of the $150 million needed by Thailand, further reductions are not possible without serious delays in some or all of the important modernization programs. Procurements which may have to be delayed or cancelled might include attack aircraft, tactical mobility and logistics aircraft, antitank and antiair munitions, tanks and Howitzers, and naval patrol craft.

Mr. Chairman, security assistance is an indispensable component of our efforts to strengthen free world defenses against the growing threats to world peace and security. In East Asia, it is a particularly vital part of our bilateral security relationships with the countries of the region. We believe that the levels requested are the minimum support we can prudently provide to the defense improvements and modernization of recipient countries' armed forces in view of U.S. commitments in the region and the nature of the threats posed by Vietnam, North Korea, and the Soviet Union to regional stability and peace.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Wolfowitz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 23, 1983 (Extracts) [6]

U.S. Interests and Objectives in East Asia

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am delighted to have this opportunity to present both our FY 84 foreign assistance request and the need for a supplemental appropriation for FY 1983. I will explain how both relate to U.S. interests in the Pacific and how the funding levels requested for both years relate to our foreign policy objectives in the Pacific. . . .

U.S. Interests And Objectives In East Asia

Program resources for East Asian and Pacific countries are allocated to support the following regional foreign policy objectives:

—Protection of our treaty relationships with such recipient countries as Korea, the Philippines, and Thailand. Assistance to these countries also bolsters our relationships with other treaty allies such as Japan, Australia, and New Zealand which do not receive credit or grant assistance but nevertheless view U.S. assistance to other key Pacific nations as an indicator of our resolve to remain a Pacific power.

—Strengthen the security of two frontline states, Korea and Thailand, to help deter North Korean or Vietnamese aggression.

—Maintain unhampered use of military facilities in the Philippines.

—Maintain and enhance defense relations with East Asian countries with strategic proximity to key sea lanes of communication in the region and those that link East Asia to the Indian Ocean and the Middle East. These include Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, and Thailand.

—Assure continued access to significant commercial markets and basic raw materials. This includes all of the ASEAN countries, Japan, and Korea. East Asia's rapidly growing economies and their ties to the United States are of increasing importance.

—Strengthen ASEAN and U.S. ties to ASEAN. ASEAN has emerged as a major force for stability in Southeast Asia and is of central importance to U.S. interests in the region.

—Maintain and strengthen our ties in the South Pacific, thus blocking Soviet attempts to gain influence.

—Manage refugee flows through continued assistance to and cooperation with Thailand and other countries of first asylum.

—Impede the flow of narcotics, through support for suppression efforts by Burma and Thailand.

—While we continue our military assistance to help friendly states deter aggression, we continue our efforts to promote peaceful solutions to regional rivalries, since armed conflict may spawn a wider war. Thus, we support recent efforts by the Republic of Korea to stimulate a constructive dialogue with the North. Given North Korea's stubborn insistence on a change of government in the South and U.S. withdrawal as prerequisites to progress, only a strong, confident South can sustain peaceful overtures to the North. Similarly, we support ASEAN efforts to seek a peaceful resolution of the Kampuchean problem, but only a strong, confident Thailand can continue to play its current constructive role as the ASEAN frontline state around which the other ASEAN states and most of the international community have rallied.

Economic assistance and working with host governments to reduce the abject poverty and social strains that spawn domestic violence are still other means by which we seek to realize our foreign policy objectives in the region.

Both military and economic assistance are useful components of our efforts to improve human rights practices in the region. Governments which are reasonably free from either the threat of military aggression by superior forces or the kind of domestic upheaval that invites external intervention, are better able to implement human rights policies. Moreover, the closer relationship with the United States fostered by our assistance programs, make it more likely that our concern with human rights will be given some consideration. Hopefully, more governments are beginning to recognize, as we most certainly do, that abuses of human rights undermine the legitimacy of a government, and may become a destabilizing factor, and thereby, vitiate other components of our strategy.

. . . . . .

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION—FY 1983

As you know, we are requesting a supplemental appropriation for FY 1983 to restore the requested levels of FMS guaranteed credits and FMS MAP. The current FMS levels under the CR [7] pose serious problems for us in terms of our key Pacific relationships, the gravest being with Korea and Thailand.

Notwithstanding East Asia's vast geography, rich resources and significant contribution to many of our highest foreign policy objectives, our requested level of FMS guaranteed credits for FY 1983 amounted to only $388.5 million or some 9 percent of the global request level. This request level would be an increase of 14.1 percent over the FY 82 level of $340.7 million in nominal dollars and, of course much less an increase in real terms. The $271 million in FMS which can be feasibly allocated to East Asia under the CR is a 20.5 percent reduction below the FY 82 funded level and is 30.2 percent below the FY 83 request level. I might also mention that a by-product of the lower worldwide level has been to reduce East Asia's percentage of FMS guarantees from 9 percent of the larger worldwide request level of $4323.30 million to 7.4 percent of the smaller CR level of $3638 million. Both congressional earmarks and the requirement to fund new high priority programs outside of East Asia have contributed to this effect.

[7] Reference is to House Joint Resolution 631, Ninety-seventh Congress, enacted as P.L. 97-377, December 21, 1982, a continuing resolution making further appropriations for fiscal year 1983; for text, see 96 Stat. 1830.

Regarding FMS MAP, we face a similar situation. The $9 million proposed for East Asia under the CR level, although double the FY 82 funded level of $4.5 million, is a 64 percent reduction from the FY 83 request level of $25 million. Moreover, the FY 82 funded level itself was far below the concessionality requested for the Thai program in that the $4.5 million MAP program was in lieu of an original request for $50 million in direct credits. Our original FY 83 request for a $25 million FMS MAP program is designed to provide a degree of concessionality that would both help compensate for last year's shortfall, and permit reduction of concessional financing beginning with the FY 1984 program. As with FMS guarantees, the reduction in FMS MAP worldwide levels under the CR has had the effect of reducing the percentage of the total available to East Asia. Thus, under the CR, East Asia would receive 3.6 percent of the worldwide allocation for country programs of $250 million vice 5.8 percent of $427 million under the original request level. Let me now turn to some of the country programs, that is those for which we are requesting a supplemental appropriation.

. . . . . .

FY 1984 Foreign Assistance Request

Regional Overview

Fiscal year 1983 was the first year in which this Administration integrated military and economic assistance into a single strategic package. The FY 84 foreign assistance proposal continues to refine this concept in linking all components of U.S. assistance to our strategic interests and foreign policy objectives.

Although my remarks concern primarily security assistance, that is FMS Guaranteed Credits, FMS MAP, ESF, and IMET, I will touch on the total request to include Development Assistance and P.L. 480. [8]

Our total East Asia and Pacific foreign assistance request for the aforementioned kinds of bilateral assistance during FY 84 is $722 million, or an increase of less than 5 percent over the FY 83 request level of $689 million. It exceeds the FY 82 funded level of $606 million by 19.1 percent. Thus, full funding of the requested levels for FY 84 could well be a decrease in real terms from fully funded FY 83 programs. Even for the 2-year period, full funding would, at best, keep pace with inflation.

Our Development Assistance request level of approximately $168.9 million is virtually a straight line from FY 83 and exceeds the FY 82 funded level of about $163 million by only 3.7 percent. Our requested levels for P.L. 480 of $30 million for Title I and $17 million for Title II, respectively, both represent virtually a straight line from the revised FY 83 request.

Some $180 million of our requested economic assistance (DA and P.L. 480), or 83.3 percent would go to Indonesia, the Philippines, and Thailand. Thus, most of our resources would be allocated to a country with which we have a Military Bases Agreement (MBA), [9] the ASEAN frontline state, and to Indonesia which occupies a key strategic position, both geographically and politically, and is the poorest country in ASEAN. The remaining portion to be allocated to Burma, and regional projects are small in dollar amounts but politically and economically significant as we shall discuss later.

Turning to our FY 84 military assistance request levels, you can see that most, in fact about 87 percent of the total FMS guarantees, FMS MAP, ESF, and IMET requested is to protect our treaty relationships with Korea, the Philippines, and Thailand. I should note that the FY 84 military assistance request of $506.09 million is less than a 5 percent increase over the FY 83 requested level of $482.65 million; in other words no increase at all in real terms. The FY 84 request level exceeds the FY 82 funded level of $407.103 million by 24.3 percent in nominal dollars, and thus does little more than keep pace with inflation.

Our request for FMS guaranteed credits for FY 84 totals $436.5 million. It exceeds the FY 83 request level of $388.5 million by 12.3 percent and the FY 82 funded level of $340.7 by some 28.1 percent. Thus, if fully funded for both FY 83 and FY 84, our overall FMS request is an extremely small increase in real terms. In addition to FMS guaranteed credits, we have requested $5 million in FMS MAP for Thailand, a decrease of $20 million from the FY 83 requested level. The reduced request was necessitated by the shortfall of MAP funds available and other global priorities. Nevertheless, a MAP program has significance in Thailand and throughout ASEAN as an indicator of U.S. commitment to the region.

The modest nominal dollar increase sought in East Asia's overall FMS (both guaranteed credits and MAP) level is targeted on two frontline states: Korea and Thailand. The FMS requests for our other three FMS recipients, the Philippines, Indonesia, and Malaysia are all straight-lined from the FY 83 request. We believe that these request levels, devised as they have been with an eye on severe resource constraints, and on the increasing Soviet, North Korean and Vietnamese threats in the region, represent the minimum resources to protect our frontline treaty allies and preserve our base agreements.

Our ESF request level of $55 million represents a $5 million reduction from the FY 83 request level. This would retain the $50 million level for the Philippines as part of the Military Bases Agreement (MBA), but permit reduction of the ESF to Thailand in anticipation of a decreasingly adverse impact on Thai citizens from refugee flows. The lower request level also is predicated on full funding of Thailand's FY 83 ESF request level of $10 million.

Our IMET request for FY 84 of $9.59 million represents a 4.8 percent increase over the FY 83 request level of $9.15 million, and a 38.7 percent increase over the FY 82 funded level of $6.91. IMET is perhaps our most cost-effective form of military assistance. For FY 84, we are requesting slight increases for seven of our current IMET recipients, straight-lining two of them from FY 83, and proposing one new $30,000 program for Tonga, a country whose government has frequently supported U.S. objectives in regional organizations, and has rejected Soviet approaches in the form of aid offers and the establishment of a diplomatic mission. Let me now address some of the specific country programs proposed for FY 84.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I would stress the importance of our programs in maintaining our basic relationships with friends and allies in the area. Our military assistance programs reflect the high priority we place on our treaty relationships. Our economic programs support our political interests, as well as allow us to play an appropriate, constructive role in the social, economic development of East Asia. [10]

Address by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the World Affairs Council of San Francisco, San Francisco, March 5, 1983 [11]

The United States and East Asia: A Partnership for the Future

Phil Habib's magnificent work in the Middle East has made him almost a legend—and in his own time no less. We salute him for his tireless efforts and for what those efforts have achieved. But remember: in the course of his outstanding career, he has been involved in every part of the world. In East Asia and the Pacific, he served with distinction as Ambassador and Assistant Secretary. The Ambassador's residence in Seoul is known admiringly as "the house Habib built." Phil will agree and note ruefully that he never lived in it. I have just returned from a trip to Phil's old stomping ground convinced more than ever that if you want to understand the future, you must—like Phil—understand the Pacific region.

[10] Because of the turbulent situation in El Salvador, President Reagan, on March 11, 1983, decided to grant more aid to this country. The additional grant required a revision to the FY 1983 supplemental request for other regions, including East Asia. The revised FY 1983 supplemental request was submitted to Congress on March 11, 1983, and may be found in the Addendum to the Statement of Paul D. Wolfowitz, Foreign Assistance Legislation for FY 1984–85, Part 5, p. 53.

My recent trip to Northeast Asia, [12] and 2 days of meetings with our Chiefs of Missions from all of the Asian Pacific area, underlined for me the importance of this vibrant area for the United States and for the world. The dynamism that I saw convinces me that, as important as the region is today, it will only be more important tomorrow. The people are smart, they learn, they work, they have resources. They have an important future and we should be part of it.

Nothing underscores the direct interest of the United States in this region more than two simple facts:

—We trade more today with the nations of the Asian Pacific than with any other region on Earth.

—We have fought three wars in the Pacific in the last 40 years. We do not want to fight another and this is a reason why the United States will continue to maintain a presence there.

My trip left me with many strong impressions. Some features of the region, such as its economic and political progress, offer great hope. Others, such as the poverty and injustice that can still be found and the menacing military postures of Vietnam, North Korea, and the Soviet Union, present all too familiar challenges. But all observers would agree that the region is less troubled than it was in the early 1970's.

The great majority of nations in the region have used the last decade well. They have developed a new self-confidence, and they have much to be self-confident about. It is a confidence born of economic success and of an emerging political maturity. Responsible leadership has come to the fore in Asia and the Pacific. The result is that our relations with most nations of the region are strong and getting stronger. If there is a symbol of the dramatic change that has marked the region in recent years, and of the benefits that such developments can bring to us all, it is perhaps China's emerging role as a constructive force. But this is only one of many important factors in the region's success and in the progress that has been made since earlier years of the post World War II period.

The new success and maturity in Asia today provides a pattern for the future, but, as well, valuable lessons for the present. Tonight, I would like to discuss four of these lessons.

First, there is a need for a global, not merely a regional view,

Second, despite great diversity, a growing community of interests is apparent in the Pacific region;

Third, the extension of economic and political freedom is of essential importance to the region's future; and Fourth, the United States has both vital interests and a unique and critical role to play in the area.

First and foremost, the trip reinforced what we all know: the fate of regions and nations around the world are intertwined. No one area of the world can pull up the drawbridge and ignore problems elsewhere.

Thirty years ago, in his famous farewell address to Congress, General MacArthur said: "The issues are global and so interlocked that to consider the problems of one sector oblivious to those of another is but to court disaster for the whole. While Asia is commonly referred to as the gateway to Europe, it is no less true that Europe is the gateway to Asia. And the broad influence of the one cannot fail to have its impact upon the other."

MacArthur's statement is today more true than ever.

—Decisions about nuclear missile deployments in Europe could have a major impact upon Asian security, a fact dramatized by proposals by the Soviet Union which would have the effect of shifting the Soviet intermediate range missile threat from Europe to Asia.

—Decisions on trade and free markets in Asian lands influence the actions of legislators in Washington, and governments worldwide. The world is watching Japan in particular to see if its markets will be more open to competition from abroad.

[12] Reference is to the trip made by Secretary Shultz to East Asia from January 29 to February 10, 1983. He visited Japan, China, Korea, and Hong Kong to meet with the leaders of these countries and to conduct a dialog on a wide range of bilateral and international issues.

—The continued growth of Asian economies is an essential element of U.S. and European recovery, while improvement in those economies will send waves coursing across the Pacific;

—The sea lanes and resources of the region are not only of strategic importance to the countries in the region, they are crucial to the defense of the Indian Ocean, East Africa and the Middle East;

As East Asian and Pacific nations prosper, we hope to see them adopt an increasingly global view. Indeed, we already see encouraging steps in this direction;

—East Asian and Pacific nations, and most importantly Japan, have acknowledged their responsibilities for strengthening GATT and maintaining an open international trading system, as they see with growing clarity the threat of protectionism around the world;

—Even smaller Asian countries, such as Korea, see that they must consider modification of their own protectionist policies (local content legislation, for example) to help ensure their own continued access to larger markets;

—On the security front, Australia, New Zealand, and Fiji have contributed peacekeeping forces for the Sinai;

—ASEAN governments are playing an effective and constructive role in the nonaligned movement, the Islamic Conference, and other international fora;

—Japan has provided economic assistance to states in the Middle East and Caribbean; and —China, while not yet a wealthy nation, has proven itself among the most sophisticated, with a decidedly global approach to economic and security issues and a clear view of the importance of resisting Soviet aggression.

As the Pacific region gains strength and confidence, it will be increasingly aware of, and increasingly influential in, the global agenda.

The second lesson about the Pacific region is that our policy must reflect the growing community of interests among nations there in preserving peace and promoting economic progress. There are no broad regional institutions like NATO and the EC to provide a framework for regional cooperation. The great differences and historical animosities that separate different countries probably preclude the establishment of such institutions for the immediate future. But, despite enormous diversity, the nations of the region are increasingly cooperating with one another. This new and encouraging pattern is driven by two factors:

—The immense stake that they have in continued economic growth and an open world economy; and —A clear-eyed perception of the military threat posed by the forces of the Soviet Union, Vietnam, and North Korea.

Economically, the area leads the world in economic growth. During the 1960's, Japan's annual rate of growth averaged above 10 percent. Later, during the 1970's, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, and Korea all achieved average growth rates above 8 percent, while the Philippines, Thailand, Indonesia, and Malaysia posted average growth rates of from 6 to 8 percent—all above the average even for developing countries.

These economic achievements have given the nations of the Asian Pacific a new weight in the world. For example, the region now accounts for one-sixth of total world trade. These achievements are not accidental. They are the fruit of a commitment to hard work, a willingness to sacrifice immediate benefits for future growth, and generally sound policies of economic management. But Pacific region nations recognize that continued success is dependent on a healthy world economy.

Nations of the region are similarly aware of the keen threat to the region's security posed by the Soviet Union and its clients. A decade and a half ago, Soviet warships seldom ventured south into the Pacific. Now, the Soviets have their largest fleet in that ocean, backed by modern, long-range bombers. Soviet land forces in the region have also grown during that time, from 20 to more than 50 divisions. Most ominously of all, some 100 intermediate range SS-20 missiles, each equipped with three warheads, threaten Asia.

With massive Soviet assistance, 180,000 Vietnamese troops occupy Kampuchea, use toxin and chemical weapons on innocent civilians, and threaten the peace and stability of Southeast Asia. The North Koreans, who spend 20 percent of their GNP on their armed forces, threaten their southern neighbors with an armed force of over 700,000, one of the largest armies in the world. When you visit the DMZ in Korea, as I did recently, the tension is palpable. You know what it means to confront real danger, as American soldiers and their South Korean allies do every day.

Nonetheless, common economic and security concerns are breaking down communication barriers, reducing historical animosities, and spurring the nations of the region to take responsible steps in their own interests. Let me give just a few examples.

The Japanese Government has acknowledged its responsibility for maintaining an open world economy and is opening its own markets for freer trade. The new Prime Minister's attitude toward this effort is refreshingly operational, recognizing that procedures for, say, licensing, inspection, and registration are as important as policy pronouncements. In addition, Japan has affirmed its commitment to undertake broader responsibilities for its own defense, appropriate to its abilities and its constitutional requirements.

Prime Minister Nakasone's recent visit to Seoul, and Japan's sizeable foreign assistance to Korea, have put the important Japanese-Korean relationship on a new and stronger footing.

The ASEAN states have put behind them many of their differences. They are working effectively together to resist Vietnamese aggression and to mobilize international support for a peaceful outcome in Kampuchea.

Thailand, Malaysia, Indonesia, the Philippines, Australia, Hong Kong, Japan, and China have all played major roles in handling the massive exodus of Indochinese refugees.

The new Pacific Island states are building both regional and national institutions simultaneously, with the help of their neighbors in Australia and New Zealand.

The Republic of Korea has initiated a productive dialog with states in the region.

And China has begun to seek closer cooperation with a number of its neighbors and to play a constructive regional role, especially in its efforts to combat Vietnam's aggression in Kampuchea and elsewhere.

Clearly, there is more that can be done, and more that we would like to see done. We will continue to urge Japan to assume a greater share of the burden of its own defense and to open its own market to the free competition that Japanese products enjoy in the United States. But both we and Japan must also look beyond these bilateral concerns to our shared responsibilities. As President Reagan recently said, "... no two nations are more mutually dependent than the United States and Japan. ... Our partnership is so essential. We have a strong obligation to our own peoples, to each other, to insure its continued vitality." [13]

As Japan's weight has grown, so too have its responsibilities. Decisions on trade issues, bank credit to developing countries in Asia and Latin America, and official economic assistance must reflect Japan's global interests. If we are patient, as well as persistent, we can do more than just maintain the remarkable post World War II record of Japanese-American cooperation. We can build on it and make it an increasingly important part of our future.

China's new, more constructive, though guarded, role is welcome, and a closer relationship with China will benefit the people of both our countries. However, frustrations and problems in our relationship are inevitable. They will arise not only out of differences concerning Taiwan, but out of the differences between our systems. We believe that these problems can be managed and that the community of interests that promises further progress is real. Our relationship with China has brought tangible results and can be a potent force for stability in the future of the region. As President Reagan has said, "Our relationship with the People's Republic of China is important not only for stability and peace in Asia but around the globe. ... Despite our differences, it is clear that both sides value this relationship and are committed to improve it." [14]

[13] Reference is to the remarks made by President Reagan following a breakfast meeting with Prime Minister Nakasone of Japan at the White House, January 19, 1983. For text, see Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, January 24, 1983, pp. 67–68. All ellipses are in the source text.

Progress in U.S.–China relations need not come at the expense of relations with our other friends in the region, including our close unofficial relationship with the people of Taiwan. To the contrary, it can contribute to the peace and economic progress of the entire region. The key to managing our differences over Taiwan lies in observing the commitments made in our three joint communiqués and allowing the parties themselves to resolve their differences peacefully with the passage of time. To improve our relations we must both work to reduce impediments to expanding trade in technology, as well as other economic relations, consistent with our long-term security needs. We must also seek to resolve any misunderstanding or dispute through consultations and negotiations rather than by unilateral action.

In so doing we work to build a long-term, enduring, and constructive relationship on a basis of mutual confidence. As I made clear in Beijing, Chinese leaders will find the United States ready to join with them on that basis in pursuing our common interests in peace and modernization. We value Sino-American relations and want them to advance.

The third lesson is the importance of economic and political freedom for the region's progress and security. Our bilateral relations are on their most solid footing with those countries that share our commitment to democratic values. We believe that democratic nations are more likely to follow the just and sensible policies that will best serve the future of the region, and the globe.

The Pacific region's economic growth has shown the efficiency of a free-market system. The progress of the ASEAN states, South Korea, Hong Kong and Taiwan has become a model of successful development for the Third World.

Political progress is more difficult to gauge than economic change. And usually it seems to move at a slower and less even pace than we would all desire. But a long-range perspective of free market nations in East Asia and the Pacific clearly reveals, I believe, a trend towards the growth of democratic institutional arrangements for economic and political conduct.

Japan is the most obvious example, but younger nations are moving in a similar direction. Indonesia last year added to an increasingly long record of regularly held elections. And Malaysia has accomplished that most difficult task: peaceful changes of leadership through an electoral process. The new Pacific nations have laid strong foundations for popular participation in government. The Republic of Korea, despite continuing intense pressure from the north that creates severe internal pressures as well, has taken additional welcome steps recently toward liberalization and toward an eventual constitutional transition of power in 1987.

The extension of democratic processes and institutions and the respect of human rights in general are integral elements to the achievement of lasting progress and legitimacy. Abuses of human rights undermine the progress, legitimacy, and even the stability of governments, thereby vitiating other gains.

In the end, economic and political freedom, both important in their own right, are closely intertwined with security concerns. For economic and political progress provides the resources for defense, and, at once, reduces the risks of internal chaos and the opportunities for external aggression. As President Reagan has said, "Economic freedom is the world's mightiest engine for abundance and social justice."

The fourth and final lesson is that our role in the region is unique. We are the one nation of the region with both a worldwide view and the capacity to implement a worldwide policy. As a great power, we have great responsibilities. We have borne them well and we must continue to do so.

It is necessary and proper that we encourage those countries that share the benefits of a peaceful and prosperous world order to assume greater responsibilities for maintaining it. We will not ask how we can perform that task by ourselves or how we can get others to do it for us, but how we can combine our strength with those who share our commitment to peace and economic progress. Fortunately, in the Pacific region there are many who share those interests, and their strength is growing.

[14] Reference is to remarks made by President Reagan before the 23d Annual Washington Conference of the American Legion, February 22, 1983; see document 1.

Our goal in asking others to increase their efforts is to gain added strength together, not to decrease our own efforts. The United States will remain a Pacific power. Although specific tasks may change, our overall responsibilities will not be diminished in importance nor shifted to others. This is particularly true of our security relationships with our friends and allies in the area:

—Our treaty commitments—particularly to the frontline states of Korea and Thailand—are essential to give our partners the self-confidence necessary to face potential threats.

—These commitments and our alliances with Japan, with Australia and New Zealand, with the Philippines and others, provide a security framework and coordinating element in a region where broader alliance arrangements are not feasible.

—And because our influence is so broadly felt throughout the region, the way we handle each of our bilateral relationships affects the interests of many others. As we seek, for example, to build a stronger relationship with China and to manage the differences between us, we must remember that the interests of many other friends in the region may be affected as well.

—In Asia, as in the rest of the world, there remain threats that only the United States can meet. If we do not play our role, the shadow cast by Soviet military power will threaten the region's hopes for progress.

In playing that security role in the world, we intend to be attentive to Asian interests. That specifically includes our approach to the Geneva negotiations with the Soviet Union on intermediate-range nuclear missiles. As President Reagan recently said, "Soviet proposals which have the effect merely of shifting the threat from Europe to Asia cannot be considered reasonable. Security in this sense is—and will remain—indivisible."

In the years since the Vietnam War ended, we have made great progress in overcoming the inevitable doubts that arose in the region about the will and capability of the United States to fulfill its important role in Asia. President Reagan's strong efforts to continue that progress have increased the credibility of our role in Asia, and, in the process, increased the self-confidence of our friends in the area as well.

If it is true that much of the future will be shaped in Asia, then our policies toward this region are of special importance. The record of the nations of the Asian Pacific in recent years is encouraging too. Not that the region is free of problems. Far from it. But most of the nations of the region—despite enormous differences of every kind—share a realistic and confident approach toward solving problems. And a dynamic community of economic, political and security interests has begun to take shape:

—Most nations of the area have faced—and many still face—immense problems of poverty and dislocation. But these problems are being addressed with imagination, with self-reliance and with remarkable success.

—The countries of the region face great threats from the Soviet Union, Vietnam, and North Korea. But they are meeting these threats with realism and with a determination not to be intimidated.

—Great national and cultural differences, deepened by historical antagonisms, place obstacles in the way of cooperation among nations of the region. But increasingly these nations are recognizing the overriding importance of working together in the interest of peace and economic progress.

We Americans recognize—and welcome—this progress. Our Asian Pacific partners are developing rewarding relationships not only with us but with each other. They also are joining with us in cooperative efforts that extend beyond the Pacific region and increasingly bring their positive influence into the world at large. These steps are the basis for a global role that will fit the region's growing strength and responsibilities. We Americans are determined to join in these steps to further our community of interests. The results will have much to say about the future—for us and for others throughout the world.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Brown) Before Two Subcommittees of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, October 19, 1983 (Extracts) [15]

The Soviet Role in Asia

Mr. Chairmen, the administration welcomes this opportunity to testify today before the House Subcommittees on Europe and the Middle East and on Asian and Pacific Affairs concerning the Soviet role in Asia. Only a handful of issues have as high a priority in our foreign policy, or indeed in that of the Soviets, as events in this broad arc of nations stretching from the Pacific Ocean to the Persian Gulf. The region is of rapidly increasing importance to both East and West in terms of security, trade and political development.

Soviet policy toward this vast area—comprehends a diverse mixture of ethnic, religious, cultural, and political patterns—and is itself diverse. And although it would be difficult to identify a unified Soviet perspective or strategy for the entire region, we can speak of a distinct Soviet style in handling problems which arise here, and indeed everywhere, when the USSR perceives its interests are engaged.

A few weeks ago this style was revealed with a clarity rarely seen in international affairs. Once in a very great while an event will occur which cuts through all ambiguities and provides the world with an unvarnished view of a state's motivations and essential character. The tragedy of Korean Airlines Flight 7 [16] was such an event. This incident is striking because it symbolizes, at one stroke, so much that is wrong about the character of Soviet policy toward its Asian neighbors—the heavy emphasis on military intimidation, the easy resort to force, the absence of any sense of trust, the inability to communicate, and the paranoia that exists just below the surface of an unconvincing rhetoric of peace and good will.

It also highlights a continuing Soviet frustration: Moscow's inability to convert its impressive and growing military presence in Asia, the Pacific and Indian Oceans into a coherent role in a regional community through which the Soviets could project their political and economic influence. (Only in India can Soviet nonmilitary diplomacy be said to be really effective.) In a sense, Soviet reliance on military power and use of force is undermining these broader goals and making it more, rather than less, difficult for the USSR to achieve the status and influence in Asia which it so clearly desires.

This failure is serious because it is clear that the Soviets assign Asia a priority in their foreign policy second only to Europe and are devoting increasing resources of every kind to consolidate the USSR's position as an Asian power.

Soviet diplomatic weakness in Asia has been accompanied, however, by an unprecedented military buildup aimed at the United States and its friends and allies. The USSR can now rapidly deploy large naval and air forces throughout the Pacific and Indian Oceans, which for the first time pose a significant direct conventional threat to U.S. forces, facilities and lines of communication and supply. So while we should not assess the USSR's position in Asia without noting the very real problems Moscow faces, we cannot afford to be complacent, especially given the impressive power it can deploy in the region.

Asia is important to the Soviets for several reasons. Three-quarters of the USSR is in Asia, and one-third of the Asian landmass is Soviet territory. Some 50 million people, or about 20 percent of the Soviet population, are Asian. And a major thrust of Russian history for the last several centuries has been an expansion of the Russian, and then the Soviet, empire to the East. Today, much of the hope for improving the Soviet economy depends upon tapping the rich mineral and energy resources of the Soviet Far East. In addition, ideology and nationalism impel a Soviet assertiveness in Asia as elsewhere, as well as a more general striving, as one high Soviet official has put it, to see that no problem, anywhere, can be solved without Soviet participation.

Moreover, the Soviets realize that their presence in Asia is inseparable from their global strategic position. They remain aware of the possibility that, in a general conflict, the Soviet Union might have to fight a two-front war. Thus, the Soviets seek a military presence in Asia to intimidate all possible opponents. Besides matching or surpassing U.S. military capabilities in the area, Moscow strives to deter China from becoming a major military power, especially one closely linked to the industrial democracies. It seeks as well to discourage Japanese self-defense efforts and to weaken Tokyo's alliance with the United States and growing ties with China. Its greatest concern is that these three nations might be developing a pattern of cooperation on security issues which will isolate the USSR in a permanently disadvantageous military position in Northeast Asia.

In other parts of Asia—where their security concerns are not quite as acute as they are in Northeast Asia—the Soviets nevertheless have attempted to create conditions unfavorable to the development of political and economic arrangements which they cannot dominate or control. Given its tendency to apply manipulative solutions to such problems, Moscow has generally followed an opportunistic strategy of maintaining and exploiting local tensions, projecting influence through supplies of arms and military advisers and expanding its own direct military presence.

The Soviets have played upon Sino-Vietnamese differences, for example, to install themselves in Indochina. ASEAN efforts to achieve a political settlement in Kampuchea have been met with intimidation. They have exploited Indo-Pakistani tensions and the war between Iran and Iraq as well to expand their influence in New Delhi and Baghdad through arms supply relationships. And Moscow has acted with direct armed force in neighboring Afghanistan in an effort to achieve the dominance and control it desires.

But despite the heavy commitment of military resources to the region, the Soviets must be disappointed with the overall results. For this reliance on armed force has only thrown Soviet weaknesses into vivid relief. The truth is that a growing stress on Soviet military capabilities has been matched by the atrophy of political and economic instruments of foreign policy. Soviet trading relationships with Asian countries have declined in the last two decades: Moscow's share of total Japanese trade now is proportionally less now than it was in 1960 and Sino-Soviet trade is drastically reduced from the 1960 level, despite a recent upturn.

Politically, the Soviet Union has never achieved the influence it held in Asia during the 1950's, when both China and North Korea were pro-Soviet and pliant, and anti-Western feeling in the aftermath of colonialism was running at high-tide. Since then China has been transformed into an adversary cultivating ties with the West; Japan has become a major bulwark of the Western economic system and has deepened its political and security relationships with the United States; and interest in the Soviet model has practically disappeared from the region. Even North Korea has closer ties with Beijing than with Moscow and has openly criticized both the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea and the Soviets' own adventure in Afghanistan. Although Pyongyang belatedly gave grudging support to Moscow's position on the KAL incident, and Moscow has continued to signal its desire to improve relations with North Korea (even, initially, in the wake of the Rangoon bombing), the basic wariness in the relationship seems to have little abated.

All Soviet diplomatic initiatives—confidence-building measures, collective security schemes—are routinely met with suspicion, while Soviet diplomats themselves are expelled for espionage with embarrassing frequency from nations within the region.

In all the newly independent Pacific island states, governments have refused to receive Soviet diplomatic missions.

Worst of all, Soviet efforts have totally failed in their primary objective of weakening U.S. security ties and political and economic links with Asian countries.

In all of Asia—if one excepts Moscow's Mongolian ally which is completely subordinate—only Vietnam has institutionalized its relationship with the USSR through such actions as membership in CEMA and providing the Soviets with major military bases. There is strong evidence that the Soviet success here has been achieved only because of Hanoi's profound security and economic needs. Should Hanoi eventually turn from a predominantly militaristic foreign policy, it is doubtful it would continue to choose such exclusive dependence on the USSR.

Soviet political weakness in Asia and the Pacific also results from the strength of the region's non-Communist nations and the limited number of tensions which Moscow finds to exploit there. While most Soviet Asian associates—North Korea, Vietnam, the puppet regimes in Kampuchea and Afghanistan—are isolated, locked in tense confrontations with their neighbors, and suffering from economic stagnation, the pro-Western nations of Asia have developed broad and effective diplomatic and trading relations throughout the world and enjoy, collectively, the world's most impressive record of economic growth.

Politically, Asia now has largely passed through its era of decolonization and revolution and has entered into a period when most of the nations of the region are able to maintain the sort of political stability and economic development which make them immune to the pressures the Soviets traditionally bring to bear. The impressive unity and economic achievements of the ASEAN nations are especially notable in this regard.

Moreover, Soviet use of force in other areas has given Moscow a triple liability in pursuing its adventurist policies in Asia. Heavy Soviet commitment of military assets to Afghanistan and Eastern Europe limits Moscow's ability to expend resources elsewhere. In addition, Moscow's continued inability to work its will in places like Poland or Afghanistan brings into question all of its claims about the historical inevitability of Marxism and its ability to maintain control over present clients, much less manage new ones. Finally, Soviet militarism brings into being the very thing which it is intended to prevent: a widely shared determination to resist Soviet advances and a tendency for otherwise very disparate nations to cooperate in achieving this objective.

Mr. Chairmen, I believe that this summary of Soviet policy in Asia and the Pacific demonstrates that, despite the dramatic increase of Soviet military capabilities throughout the area and undoubted capacity to exploit opportunities, Moscow's political influence with individual governments is very shallow, uneven and imbalanced in the extreme. The situation varies from country to country, of course, and potentially short-term success stories such as the Soviet relationship with Vietnam are notable exceptions to the general rule. Nevertheless, there are serious weaknesses, as I have attempted to show, in the Soviet's ability to build and sustain long-term relationships in the region or to participate effectively in Asian political or economic arrangements. This is especially true in East Asia, where a community of interests—as yet mostly economic but fraught with lasting political significance—is quickly emerging. The Soviets and clients such as Vietnam are being left out of these developing relationships, while the United States and its closest allies in the area—Japan, Australia, and New Zealand—are very much a part of these trends.

The long-term injury to Soviet interests of this voluntary exclusion from the peaceful political and economic life of Asia should not be underestimated. It may not be impossible to imagine Moscow gaining some important tactical advantages, especially in use of Vietnamese facilities and exploitation of developments in the Iran–Iraq conflict, through further application of its familiar militaristic approach. But it is hard to see how the Soviets can achieve a meaningful permanent role in the rich economic and political life of most of this region without a fuller and richer diplomacy of their own. The longer the Soviets wait, the more difficult it will become for them to develop constructive and broad relationships with vital nations such as Japan, South Korea, Australia, New Zealand or the members of the ASEAN grouping. Yet without such connections, Soviet influence in Asia is almost wholly dependent on military power, and this sort of influence—although significant—is very limited indeed.

It is limited first because military relationships last only as long as the tensions and conflicts which bring them into being, and Asia is one region where the trends are toward peace and stability and away from revolution and war.

Moreover, it is limited because this administration is determined that the Soviets shall not acquire the dominant military position in Asia that they seek. We challenge the Soviet right to military domination because we wish to live in peace. But we are confident that we and our allies throughout the region have the unity and resources to protect our interests and match Soviet military capabilities at any level Moscow may choose. The United States also realizes that, although every nation must provide for its own defense, we have a special responsibility as the only country which can counter the provocative Soviet nuclear deployments aimed at our Asian allies and friends—and, more importantly, the only nation which can negotiate with the Soviets for meaningful reductions.

We recognize as well our responsibility to maintain sufficient military power in the region to constrain Soviet adventurism and underline our commitment to remain an Asian power. In a decade the strategic balance in military power has shifted from one of clear American superiority to one in which the balance has been described by senior military officers as too close to call. In this context, Asian and Pacific nations are closely watching U.S. intentions and performance in Asia to determine the extent of our long-term commitment to a major regional security role. Their risk/benefit analysis will be based on their perception of U.S. will and capacity to balance Soviet military power in their region at whatever levels Moscow chooses to maintain. Their perception of our willingness to do this is likely to be realistic and based on demonstrated U.S. efforts to enhance its strategic and conventional forces, as well as our security and economic assistance programs designed to assist them in attaining greater self-sufficiency.

This is even more so in the face of continued demonstrations of force by the USSR throughout the area—in the continued assault on the people of Afghanistan, in the use of chemical weapons there and in Indochina, and in the wanton violation of international standards of morality in the civilian air corridors which criss-cross the region. We are aware that if we permit the military balance in Asia and the Pacific to tip too far against the West, the USSR will be able to convert armed force into political influence and dominance.

We do not intend to let this happen. Our firmness on this point is crucial because the very contrast between the successful Soviet military buildup and Moscow's political and economic failures may result in a greatly increased danger of military confrontation in the region if the USSR concludes that force is successful, and opts for even greater reliance on military intimidation as its principal geopolitical instrument. With this in mind, many of our Asian friends have indicated privately that the future peace of Asia rests on our commitment to balance the Soviet threat. We must maintain our determination and ability to do so if we are to continue to enjoy a situation in Asia favorable to U.S. interests.

But we also are mindful of where our real strengths in Asia reside. As important as our own military posture is, our strength is not in arms alone but in our cultural and political ties with Asia, the interdependence of the great Asia–Pacific trading community of which we are a part, and the bonds which a talented Asian-American citizenry have forged between the New World and some of the oldest and most sophisticated civilizations on Earth.

Our own foreign policy in Asia is designed to develop these strengths into broad multifaceted relationships which will transcend considerations of tactical convenience and create a lasting community of common interests between the United States and the nations of Asia.

To give but one example, our still developing relationship with China is an event of momentous importance to both countries and to the stability of East Asia. We are, of course, aware of certain perspectives we share with the Chinese concerning Soviet activities in the region. We also recognize that a certain degree of cooperation in security matters could be natural and mutually beneficial as the relationship with China evolves. But the United States will neither press this possibility nor make it the centerpiece of our bilateral contacts with Beijing simply because we wish that relationship to rest on a far broader, firmer foundation than a common reaction to Soviet policy. Instead we will work for a balanced development of economic, political and people-to-people contacts with China and encourage China's greater participation in the regional and international arrangements which we support. We are convinced that only such a far-sighted approach will sustain U.S.-Chinese ties over the long term. And such an approach should also provide an even better basis for security cooperation if that should seem desirable to both sides in the future.

This prescription is good medicine for our more traditional relationships in Asia and the Pacific as well. In fact, we have long since achieved such sophisticated and sensitive relations with many of our allies—Japan, the Republic of Korea, Australia, and New Zealand. With others—ASEAN, Pakistan and our friends in the Pacific, South Asia and the Gulf—we are well on the way to achieving these patterns of broadly based trust and common interest. Moreover, this constructive engagement is open to all others in the area who prefer peaceful political and economic interaction to the use of force against their neighbors.

If the Soviets persist in their present course in Asia, it is these ties which will ultimately sustain us and our friends, and preserve our common welfare in the face of the challenge. If, on the other hand, the Soviets should ever decide to participate more fully in the peaceful political and economic life of Asia—of which they undeniably have a right to become a part—we will be equal to any degree of competition or cooperation they should care to undertake.

Thank you very much.

2. The ANZUS Pact

Document 447

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz), the Australian Foreign Minister (Hayden), and the New Zealand Foreign Minister (Cooper), July 19, 1983 (Extracts) [1]

32d ANZUS Council Meeting

. . . . . .

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I would like to express my gratitude to our friends from Australia and New Zealand who have come here and labored with us for 2 days. We covered a wide range of subjects, as the communiqué shows, [2] and from our standpoint we consider it to have been a very worthwhile discussion.

I would like to take the opportunity, as well, to thank Mr. Hayden who, when he visited Hanoi recently, took the occasion to raise with them the questions of our POW's and MIA's there. You have undertaken it when the Vietnamese visit you in Australia, you will continue to follow up on that subject and we appreciate that very much.

MR. HUGHES. If neither of the other two Ministers have any remarks, then we'll take some questions.

Q. To Mr. Hayden. Mr. Minister, when you came in on an on-the-record conference you said that there were two different interpretations of ANZUS in Australia, one that committed us to global responsibilities, the other one that committed the United States to the regional defense of Australia.

I understood one of your intentions here was to clarify this issue. I assume that items 3, 4, and 5 of the communiqué addressed that. They don't seem to say anything, and I wonder, has the issue clarified in your mind as to the nature of the treaty? [3] As a result of this meeting, has anything at all altered as to our understanding of the treaty, or the American understanding of it?

FOREIGN MINISTER HAYDEN. I don't think you should discriminate against this particular communiqué. It's been drafted according to the great traditions of these sorts of communiqués. But if I could go beyond that and say, for my part a number of matters have been clarified. For instance, it was implicitly stated at one point in the discussions, in the course of this morning's session by Admiral

The ANZUS meeting was held in Washington on July 18 and 19, 1983.

Crowe,[4] that each nation should contribute according to its abilities and in its area of greatest concern.

For me, that means very simply that we have explicitly declared that for Australia our role should be seen as one of regional concern. This is fairly consistent with the view I've expressed over a very long time, both when I was spokesman on defense matters for the Labor Party in the National Parliament and subsequently when I was leader of the opposition for the Labor Party.

And so the difficulties that we've had with the contradictory purposes being presented to our defense planning, that sometimes it was presumed we had a global role to fulfill somehow as an appendix associated with a superpower, and at other times we had a regional role, has been clarified, and I accept that clarification. For my part it will allow much more explicit and precise formulation of our defense thinking. It's the sort of defense structures that we establish for our defense forces.

Q. I would also like to address Mr. Hayden. Does this mean, Mr. Hayden, that you don't think that ANZUS involves us in any global responsibility?

MR. HAYDEN. ANZUS doesn't by the terms in which it's drafted. ANZUS refers to attacks on the metropolitan territory, the signatory members to territories they may administer, and refers to the area of the Pacific. It doesn't refer to international obligations. Yesterday, Mr. Shultz made this clear when he said that there would be circumstances where, if ANZUS doesn't commit Australia to U.S. diplomacy, for instance in the Middle East or Central America, we may or may not agree. If we do agree, it would be on the basis of other principles, although the spirit of ANZUS guides many things which we do even though ANZUS doesn't cover it.

So there is a multinational observer force in the Sinai which was committed by the previous government not under obligations arising from ANZUS but because of certain common views, I believe, they shared with the American administration. That's one illustration of the way in which decisions can be made which have an implication well beyond the obligations which are covered by ANZUS.

Q. I would like to follow that and ask all three Ministers what are the geographic limits to the ANZUS obligations and alliance possibilities. For example, would it include the Persian Gulf?

FOREIGN MINISTER COOPER. We have reviewed ANZUS. It's been going for 32 years successfully. The document comes out in my opinion strengthened. We have not given precision to the geographic areas. There is no manner in which we have looked at the latitude or the longitude. We have looked at the Pacific.

Obviously, the strongest points are in the Pacific. There is still the importance of the Indian Ocean. There's a relevance, of course, to the Americans and Australians in the Indian Ocean. There is relevance to New Zealand. There is less relevance to New Zealand in regard to, say, Central America. But if there was an attack on New Zealand, on Australia, and really if we're looking at where the attack might come from, we would probably say sometime in the future from the Soviet Union, we would believe that ANZUS covered the Pacific area. But we are very, very interested in the work that's done by the United States and other countries in bringing about peace in other areas.

We have been through the global responsibilities of the Western alliance countries in trying to create a bit of peace. But there is no doubt that ANZUS represents the Pacific, but no definition is given to the geographic area. That's probably one of the main reasons that it's survived intact so strongly as a treaty between the two antipodean countries and the United States.

Q. I would like my question to Mr. Cooper. Sir, it would seem from the wording of this communiqué that there is a more realistic understanding of the expression and intent of Article 4 which carries the American commitment as opposed to the comfortable myths of the past.

Would New Zealand, sir, have any reservations on this, perhaps, new understanding?

FOREIGN MINISTER COOPER. We don't really see a new understanding. As I have said, we believe that ANZUS has come through a review, which has been overdue, intact and, frankly, we look very close to end those. There's a lot of discussion about that particular article and it still commands each of the countries to looking at the problems that may be if there is some invasion or some military offensive against each other.

There is the clear responsibility to be involved in a treaty where freedoms are at stake. There will be different readings of that particular clause and it will be probably from the news media. The three countries, however, feel that ANZUS has served us and will continue to serve us very well.

Q. Sir, could I ask Mr. Hayden's response to that same question as perhaps a more realistic assessment to the wording and the intent of Article 4?

FOREIGN MINISTER HAYDEN. I think you ought to look at Articles 3, 4, and 5, but the obligations under ANZUS are fairly clear: In the event of threat or attack a response is required, and that response has to be provided according to constitutional processes of the respective partners. However, it would not be accurate to presume that the response guaranteed the automatic provision of military forces support. It may, but it would depend on the circumstances of the attack, and how each party weighed that up and concluded what was its proper response according to its constitutional processes.

It may be in certain circumstances that diplomatic responses or political/economic sanctions, or perhaps the supply of equipment, are judged to be the appropriate response. It is also presumed, underpinning the Treaty, is the expectation that each country will have provided a prudent level of self-defense capability commensurate with the resources which it has available. I think that eminently reasonable. In fact, when I read the principles which were enunciated in 1969 by former President Nixon of this country, at Guam, and last year a statement—I think at Maryland by Judge William Clark—which seems to be a restatement of those principles, I think they are eminently sensible and that they are in accord with the general principles which are explicit and implicit under the ANZUS arrangements. In short, I think all countries which are signatories to this Treaty have an obligation in the first place to make sure that they've taken prudent measures to develop their own force structures, and that those prudent measures are commensurate with what they could reasonably have provided in relation to the resources which they have available.

. . . . . .

MR. HUGHES. More ANZUS-related questions?

Yes, . . .

Q. Thank you. For Foreign Minister Cooper. Mr. Foreign Minister, did you get any indication that the United States will help New Zealand and Australia purchase military equipment to make those countries more effective ANZUS partners? And did you get any indication that President Reagan might visit New Zealand and Australia in November?

FOREIGN MINISTER COOPER. On the first question with regard to the purchase of military equipment, we were talking about ANZUS in regard to the general principles and any other discussions which take place in regard to the bilateral relationship. It's not easy for a country such as New Zealand, of a small size and an agricultural-producing country, to find the capital to buy expensive military equipment, and I'm sure that the United States Secretary of State is aware of that, as is the Defense Secretary.

On the second one, of course, we would like to see President Reagan visit New Zealand. I'm sure the Australians would, too. He is busy, and I know that he is taking a five-nation tour of the Southeast Asian area. Whether he can extend that or not, I don't know, but he is very welcome to visit our country at any time he can fit it into his very busy work in the United States and externally.

Q. Does Secretary Shultz have anything to add on those points?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No.

Q. Secretary Shultz, if I could take you back and follow up on Mr. Anderson's question a few minutes ago, could you, sir, comment on the United States view of the limits of the regional aspects of the ANZUS alliance?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think the hard kernel, in a sense, of the ANZUS Alliance is the undertaking to respond in the event of an attack on any of the countries involved. So that's the sort of direct central point. In our discussion we referred to that. Then there was also the phrase, "the spirit of ANZUS," and I take it to mean that these are three countries that, broadly speaking, have the same values and want to defend them, see that they prosper around the world, and so we are interested in what goes on anywhere, as the discussion that we had here shows.

As events unfold, it may turn out that two or three of us are involved in some part of the world, but the direct obligations of ANZUS are very particular, and the effect of ANZUS is to draw us together, to have us not only in a yearly consultative mode such as we've had here for the last couple of days, but that we see each other at other international meetings. There is a great deal of consultation back and forth through our ambassadors, and so it is a vehicle for sharing ideas and seeing how we can best defend the values that we all have in common.

Q. My question is to Mr. Shultz. Was the question of U.S. facilities, communications facilities, in Australia raised at any point in the meeting over the last few days? And what is your view of the proposition from Australia that the United States should make a specific statement of the functions of the three communication stations?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. The subject was discussed, but not extensively. The Australian delegation will be here further, and we considered that that was an appropriate subject for bilateral discussions, in particular, although in the agreements the ANZUS relationship is referred to as a sort of umbrella, so there will be further discussions.

Q. I'm sorry, a supplementary question, if I may? Do you have any objection to Australians, coming to a sign of appreciation of those facilities, as most Americans have access to understand?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I don't follow your question.

Q. It seems to be quite common knowledge in the United States of the role and function of those bases in general terms, and the specifics of that have not been spelled out for Australian consumption.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Not everything that's written about is correct. Not everything that's written about and that is correct is necessarily commented on officially here. I will simply say that there will be some bilateral discussions of these matters, and we'll see what happens in that event.

Q. I'd like to direct my question to both Mr. Shultz and Mr. Hayden, if I could.

There will be those in Australia who'd be astounded to find that the discussion about the security of our region didn't include specific discussion of the U.S. bases in Australia, which many Australians regard as the greatest of threats to our security.

Could you comment on that suggestion?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think the record should show that these matters were discussed, but that they also are reserved for more intensive discussion on a bilateral basis, so it isn't as though they're being ignored as your question implies.

FOREIGN MINISTER HAYDEN. I don't think many thoughtful Australians would be shocked, but there was some discussion on the matter, as Mr. Shultz pointed out, and as he also pointed out the discussion hasn't concluded. That will be followed up in bilateral discussions with appropriate people over the next couple of days.

I've already made the point here—but I've made it many times publicly over the past few years—that there are clear risks in having those facilities in Australia, but they're risks which we're prepared to accept as a government so that we can contribute toward a role of deterrence and arms verification, and so that we have some moral standing in the position we intend to take more actively in the United Nations and other international fora in support of arms control, arms reduction, and in that respect we've already appointed an Ambassador for Disarmament so we can take this more active role.

But if I can conclude quickly—anticipating the question that might come from some sources, having had it put to us before—there's no contradiction in those two purposes. We're not proposing unilateral disarmament of any particular country, and certainly not of the United States. That would be a nonsense proposition.

We should be prepared to defend our interests. There's nothing consistent [?], at the same time, to wish for and work for a more homogenous world, and that's what we'll be aiming at.

Q. Mr. Hayden, I think it was yesterday you said that your purpose here—what I'm aiming at is to establish what our responsibilities are, what our safeguards are, under ANZUS. Can you point to me in section 2, 3, 4, or 5 anything which in any way enlarges anyone's knowledge on what those safeguards and responsibilities are?

FOREIGN MINISTER HAYDEN. I think I've done that fairly effectively in answer to either the first, second or third question, which had been mentioned, when I spoke about the obligation for responses to be forthcoming in the event of threat or armed attack, but that didn't necessarily involve an automatic provision of military forces in support of a country subjected to threat or attack. But there were a range of responses available and which response was appropriate would be judged by the other signatory countries.

Secondly, in relation to the geographic region, it's a matter which we explored and certainly we agree it's not a limitless commitment for the signatory parties. On the other hand, there are benefits in not being specific, and that's something we acknowledged before we arrived here. If we are specific, then it encourages people to perhaps be adventurous in areas outside of the specific definition of responsibility that we put down in a geographic basis.

The other matter is, of course, that I've clarified with absolute conviction for myself—I believe my colleague, Defense Minister Scholes—that the role we can most certainly pursue is that of a regional role, that we get rid of the confusion and contradictions which were constantly arising for Australia, where, on the one hand, there would be an effort to fulfill a global role which always seemed to me to be a rather extravagant purpose, given the small size of Australia—population-wise—and the small aggregate resources we have compared to, say, large or superpowers. We have a high per capita income, but we're talking aggregate sense, what we can afford.

Secondly, to clear up the tendency in the past of some conservative sources in Australia to encourage Australians to believe that ANZUS covered every conceivable association with the United States and every conceivable action that we might take. What's been made clear is that ANZUS has clear limitations and that there may be things we do outside of those limitations or obligations. We may well do them because of the spirit that encouraged the formulation of ANZUS and its sustenance, but we don't do it because of ANZUS; we do it more because of deeper-seated commitments that led to the formulation of ANZUS.

Q. Mr. Shultz, this review of ANZUS which you have had this week happened at the suggestion of the Hawke Labor government.

Can you tell me when this was first raised? When the Hawke government asked for a review, whether there was any initial apprehension on the part of the Reagan administration about what that review might actually mean?

And can you also tell me whether you feel there's any advantage from America's point of view in the sorts of discussions you've had about the regional, global, (inaudible) or the geographical limits? Is there any advantage for Washington in the types of talks you've had?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I can't recall precisely when it was raised, probably through staff and ambassadorial levels. I think Mr. Hayden and I talked about it a little bit when we met in Paris in May, and we discussed it with Prime Minister Hawke when he was here, so I can't pin down precisely when this idea emerged.

But I think it's an excellent idea, and it was most worthwhile to go through the discussion that we did and to arrive at where we are. I think it's been a good exercise.

Q. Could I ask Mr. Shultz one last question, please?

MR. HUGHES. If it's ANZUS related. (Laughter)

Q. Do you agree, Mr. Shultz, that Australia has the right to be consulted on the use of Australian facilities at Northwest Cape in any act which will—in any firing order, for example, or in anything which could involve Australia in hostile acts?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. All the things connected with that facility—and I listened to your question and it was very all encompassing—will be discussed bilaterally, and we will rest on that point.

Communiqué Issued Following the 32d Meeting of the ANZUS Council, July 19, 1983 [5]

ANZUS Council Joint Communiqué

1. The 32nd meeting of the ANZUS Council was held in Washington, D.C. on July 18 and 19, 1983. Warren Cooper, Minister of Foreign Affairs, New Zealand; Bill Hayden, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Gordon Scholes, Minister for Defense, Australia; and George Shultz, Secretary of State and Caspar Weinberger, Secretary of Defense, United States represented their respective governments. Also participating were senior foreign affairs and defense officials of the three governments.

2. After the Secretary of State welcomed the ANZUS Delegations, the Council Members reviewed the ANZUS Alliance. It was the first such review since the ANZUS Treaty was signed in 1951. They noted that, although international political and strategic circumstances which prevailed at that time had changed, it is a sign of the resilience of the Treaty that it remains relevant and vitally important to the shared security concerns and strategic interests of the three partner governments.

3. The Council Members affirmed that the Alliance is firmly based on the partners' common traditions and concern to protect democratic values. They value highly the cooperative defense arrangements, facilitated by the Treaty since its conclusion, which have served their governments' mutual security interests and promoted a strengthening of each other's defense capability. In the spirit of the ANZUS Alliance, they noted that, beyond the activities of defense cooperation, the various efforts, individual and collective, by the partners to promote both regional and global development and stability have also served the cause of mutual security.

4. The Council acknowledged that the ANZUS Treaty does not absolve each Government from the primary responsibility to provide for its own security to the extent which its resources allow. It is for this reason that Article II of the Treaty provides that the parties will "by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack." The Council Members also noted that the ability of each country to defend itself is substantially enhanced by their common commitments under the Treaty. A range of responses is available to the parties to act to meet a common danger in accordance with their constitutional processes.

5. The Council also reaffirmed that the ANZUS Treaty is an agreement between sovereign and equal states committed to the democratic tradition. In accordance with that tradition, the respective states would at times have varying views and perspectives on various international political and economic issues. Such diversity does not affect their solidarity under the ANZUS Treaty, the maintenance of which reflects the fundamental interests of the three partners.

6. In order to strengthen the Alliance further and recognizing that national security cannot be assured by military strength alone, the Council Members considered a number of practical cooperative measures:

They agreed that ANZUS consultative processes could be strengthened through further periodic ANZUS Officials Talks. These talks, which were revived this year, would rotate between the three capitals and address issues or areas of common concern. Participants would include mid-level and senior officials expert on the issues or areas to be addressed.

They also agreed that the framework of ANZUS and bilateral defense cooperation requires a standardization of privileges and immunities and of jurisdictional and other matters for military service personnel and their families serving in each other's countries. The Members therefore agreed to give priority to early conclusion of a reciprocal ANZUS Status of Forces Agreement.

They expressed satisfaction with the continuing programs of exchanges, combined exercises and visits among the Treaty partners. They also reaffirmed the importance of these programs, of ongoing efforts to modernize and to assure supply of equipment, and of continuing to strengthen alliance defensive capabilities and thus deterrence of conflict.

7. Following the review of the ANZUS Alliance, the Council Members discussed a broad range of global issues and concerns which included the importance of the Western alliance, United States-Soviet relations, and East-West issues generally. The Council Members agreed that there are continuing threats to international peace, both globally and in a number of regions. These include the continuing Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, the Vietnamese occupation of Kampuchea, and the continuing growth in Soviet military power. The Council Members declared their commitment to negotiated solutions to major East-West problems and to other problems threatening international security.

8. The Council Members reaffirmed their commitment to the negotiation of effective, equitable, and verifiable arms control measures, including reductions of nuclear armaments. They agreed that President Reagan's proposals in the START and INF Negotiations offer a realistic opportunity for the two sides to achieve meaningful nuclear arms reductions, and expressed the hope that the Soviet Union would approach these negotiations with an equal commitment to world peace.

9. The Council Members reaffirmed their strong commitment to preventing the proliferation of nuclear weapons and agreed to intensify their efforts to strengthen the international non-proliferation regime through multilateral and bilateral measures. They recognized that the international non-proliferation regime is strengthened when the nuclear weapons states are able to demonstrate progress in fulfilling their solemn treaty promise to pursue negotiations on effective and verifiable measures to reduce nuclear armaments and to end the nuclear arms race. In this context they reaffirmed their governments' policies of working towards the goal of a comprehensive and fully verifiable nuclear test ban treaty, and they took note of the continued examination of verification and compliance issues related to a nuclear test ban in the Committee on Disarmament. They also undertook to work in a constructive and cooperative manner to ensure the success of the Third Review Conference of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons in 1985.

10. The Council Members noted that the international non-proliferation regime could be enhanced by measures designed to encourage the acceptance of comprehensive and full scope safeguards combined with binding undertakings by non-nuclear weapons states not to acquire a nuclear explosive capability. In addition they reaffirmed their commitment to seek improved national and international controls over the transfer of sensitive nuclear technology.

11. The Council Members condemned any actions in violation of the 1925 Geneva Protocol and the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention and reaffirmed their support for the efforts being made in the Committee on Disarmament to conclude a comprehensive and effectively verifiable ban on the production, development and stockpiling of chemical weapons.

12. The Council Members stressed their continued firm support for the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) and the continuing development of regional cooperation within that organization. They emphasized their support for the role that ASEAN plays in promoting peace, stability and economic progress in the region. They remain committed to continued economic and technical assistance to ASEAN countries and close consultation with the members of ASEAN on regional developments.

13. The Council Members reaffirmed their conviction that the conflict in Kampuchea should be settled by peaceful means. They support diplomatic efforts which would lead to a comprehensive political solution to the Kampuchean problem. The Council welcomed the efforts of Australian Foreign Minister Hayden to establish common ground in the search for a negotiated settlement.

14. In that context, the Council Members also expressed their strong support for the approach to a Kampuchean settlement set forth in the communique issued at the end of the recent ASEAN Ministerial meeting in Bangkok. They reaffirmed the need for the prompt withdrawal of Vietnamese troops under conditions that would allow for a peaceful transition and a comprehensive settlement that would enable the Khmer people freely to decide their own future, in accordance with the relevant UN resolutions. They considered that a negotiated settlement should be based on respect for the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Kampuchea, and the legitimate security interests of all parties to the conflict. The Council Members further agreed to continue essential humanitarian assistance to the Khmer people, recognizing that humanitarian needs would persist during the search for a solution.

15. The Council Members reviewed the tragic plight of Indochinese refugees and the impact that the refugee influx is having on the countries in the region. They acknowledged the important contribution made by ASEAN members in refugee assistance and processing, and urged continued worldwide participation in refugee resettlement and support for UNHCR programs in the area.

16. Reviewing developments in the South Pacific, the Council Members noted the strength of regional integrity and stability despite resource limitations and an adverse international economic climate. Recognizing the link between regional security and economic development, they pledged their commitment to continue and to expand practical co-operation with countries of the region.

17. The Council Members emphasized the importance of the ANZUS partners' programs of continued development assistance and of co-operation among the partners to ensure the effective practical implementation of their assistance programs. The continuing tripartite arrangements made by the United States, Australia and New Zealand for geoscientific research in the South Pacific under the Consultative Committee for Offshore Prospecting in the South Pacific represent a tangible demonstration of their cooperation in the development of the region.

18. The Council Members noted the very deep concern over nuclear issues in the South Pacific and Australia's proposal to discuss the concept of a South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone at the meeting of the South Pacific Forum in Canberra in August. In this connection they stressed the importance of upholding the principles of freedom of navigation and overflight as provided in international law. They also noted the importance to the Alliance and the region of security considerations, including access by allied aircraft and ships to airfields and ports in accordance with the sovereign right of states to receive such visits.

19. The Council Members noted that the security of the Pacific island states is closely related to that of the ANZUS partners. In this context defense cooperation programs of the ANZUS partners are continuing to make a substantial practical contribution to regional security.

20. Noting regional developments, the Council Members welcomed the constructive approach of France and South Pacific Forum countries to developing a dialogue on the future of New Caledonia. They also noted the major progress that had been made in the past year towards termination of the Micronesian Trusteeship. In particular, they welcomed the conclusion of plebiscites in Palau and in the Federated States of Micronesia (which had chosen free association with the United States), and noted that a similar plebiscite would be held in the Marshall Islands in September 1983. Related to these developments, they also welcomed the increasing participation of the Micronesian Governments in the affairs of the region and looked forward to the not distant future when the Micronesian states will play an even more active role in the region's organizations.

21. The Council Members noted the U.S. Senate's approval of the Pacific Islands Treaties by which the U.S. relinquished its claims to Tokelau and to various islands belonging to Kiribati, Tuvalu and the Cook Islands. Completion of that process provides a firm base for strengthened relations between the United States and those island states and territories and was welcomed by the Australian and New Zealand members.

22. The Council Members welcomed the continuing development of bilateral relations between China and individual ANZUS partners and noted the recent successful visits of the Chinese Premier to Australia and New Zealand. Pointing out the importance of China to the strategic balance, and to political stability within the Asia and Pacific region, they emphasized the need for continuing close relations between China and the ANZUS partners.

23. The Council Members noted Japan's efforts to increase its self-defense capability and the importance of defense co-operation arrangements between Japan and the United States. They welcomed Japan's willingness to play an increasingly active and constructive role in the political and economic affairs of the region and other areas of common strategic concern.

24. The Council Members reaffirmed their commitment to the sovereignty and independence of the Republic of Korea. They again called upon the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to take serious steps to reduce the level of tension in the area by entering into discussions with the Government of the Republic of Korea. They also expressed their support for proposals put forward by the Republic of Korea to establish such a dialogue.

25. Reviewing developments in Lebanon and the Middle East peace process, the Council Members declared their support for the Government of Lebanon and its effort to recover its full sovereignty, full control over its territory, and withdrawal of all external forces. The Agreement concluded between Lebanon and Israel is an important step toward this end. The Council Members expressed the hope that this step would soon be followed by a negotiation between Lebanon and Syria to advance the process of withdrawal of all external forces and to ensure Lebanon's independence and sovereignty. They called on all states in the Middle East to participate in a determined effort towards a just and lasting peace that ensures the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and security of each nation in the region. The Australian and New Zealand Council Members expressed their warm support for Secretary Shultz's efforts to bring about negotiations aimed at achieving a peaceful settlement of the situation in Lebanon and of the wider Middle East dispute. The Council Members also expressed the hope for a rapid resolution of the Iran–Iraq conflict.

26. The Council Members discussed the Indian Ocean area and agreed that vital Western economic and security interests are engaged there. They agreed that the proposal for an Indian Ocean Zone of Peace should stress fundamental norms of international behavior and should focus on basic causes of tension in the region. They further agreed that it should in no way restrict the right of individual and collective self-defense or existing navigation rights, including effective exercise of high seas freedoms of navigation and overflight, and straits transit passage in international straits. The proposal should be developed by agreement between the regional states and the major maritime users of the Indian Ocean, and should have as an important objective to bring about a lasting improvement in the security of the regional states, so facilitating political, social and economic development in the area.

27. The Council Members reaffirmed their concern over the continued occupation of Afghanistan by the Soviet Union. This flagrant violation of fundamental principles governing international relations and human rights continues to result in death and repression of the people of Afghanistan and the creation of the largest single refugee problem in the world. They unequivocally asserted that a peaceful settlement and political solution to the situation in Afghanistan remains contingent upon the total withdrawal of Soviet forces as envisaged in various UN General Assembly resolutions. They noted the efforts by the United Nations Secretary-General's Personal Representative on Afghanistan to secure a peaceful settlement through indirect negotiations.

28. The Council Members stressed the importance of the maintenance of peace and stability in South Asia. They strongly emphasized the need to sustain efforts to prevent nuclear proliferation on the subcontinent, and to enhance the security of friendly states in the region in light of the threat to the area stemming from the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

29. The Australian and New Zealand Council Members urged wide adherence to the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea as the most satisfactory means of achieving a secure framework for all aspects of the uses of the seas and, in particular, of protecting Western security interests of free movement of naval and merchant vessels. They emphasized the significance of the Convention for the straits and archipelagic states to their north and for the island countries of the Pacific region.

30. Noting the increasing international interest in Antarctica, the Council Members reaffirmed their conviction that the Antarctic Treaty, which gives effect to the principles and purposes of the United Nations and is open to all countries, continues to provide the best means of preserving peace and international cooperation in Antarctica, a region where all three nations have important and enduring interests. The Council Members agreed to continue their close cooperation concerning Antarctica and the strengthening of the Antarctic Treaty system.

31. The Council Members discussed global economic prospects and the outcome of the Williamsburg Summit. They welcomed the positive signs of economic recovery that had emerged within the past year, but expressed concern about continuing problems, including high levels of unemployment and indebtedness. The Council acknowledged the need for continued efforts to promote sustainable noninflationary economic growth.

32. The Council Members welcomed the firm determination of the major industrial countries at the Williamsburg Summit to halt and reverse the trend toward increased protectionism. The Council recognized the dangers posed to world economic recovery by the recent expansion of barriers to trade, including those for agricultural products, and the need to strengthen and improve the multilateral trading system. They agreed that the Member Countries should use the favorable conditions provided by the recovery to reverse protectionist trends, and to relax and dismantle progressively trade restrictions and trade-distorting domestic measures. The Members also welcomed the progress made at Williamsburg towards more intensified economic and monetary cooperation. In particular, the Council noted the initiative taken at the Williamsburg Summit for Ministers of Finance, in consultation with the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, to define the conditions for improving the international monetary system and to consider the part which might, in due course, be played in this process by a high level international monetary conference. The Council welcomed this as a useful approach to the monetary and related issues previously raised by New Zealand Prime Minister Muldoon.

33. The Council Members expressed their deep concern about the prospects for recovery in developing countries, noting that the burden of recession had fallen heavily on those countries. In this regard they stressed the importance of sound economic growth in the developed countries and of open markets. The Council urged all countries to take the actions required to assure an adequate flow of public and private resources to developing countries in order to alleviate international debt problems and sustain growth and trade.

34. The Council Members agreed to meet again in Wellington in 1984 at a time to be decided.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, February 23, 1983 [1]

Palauan Approval of Free Association With the United States

Final unofficial results of the February 10, 1983, plebiscite in Palau represent a strong victory for the Compact of Free Association. In the yes-or-no vote, Palauans awarded the Compact of Free Association a mandate of better than 62 percent. The voter turnout was very heavy, substantiating the high degree of support for the Compact in Palau.

Under the Compact, Palau will achieve its long-sought goal of full autonomy. The United States will assume the obligation and authority to defend the island nation. The Compact and its related agreements were negotiated over a 14-year period. Two other prospective freely associated states—the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia—will vote on the Compact in coming months. [2]

The United States recognizes that the plebiscite is a valid and sovereign act of self-determination by the people of Palau. The Compact they approved defines their relationship with the United States, as well as their international political status after the present trusteeship is terminated. Now that the people and Government of Palau have approved the Compact, it must receive majority approval in both Houses of the U.S. Congress.

The Palauan voters were asked other questions on the plebiscite ballot, including the political status they would prefer if free association were not approved. Slightly more than half of the voters chose to answer this question, which was optional. Here, the vote was about 56 percent in favor of a relationship with the United States closer than free association, and 44 percent in favor of independence.

The ballot included an internal referendum question which asked the voters to approve a Palauan-American agreement relating to hazardous, including nuclear, substances. A majority—53 percent—voted to approve this agreement. However, because of provisions in the Palau constitution, this, or a similar specific question, requires approval by a 75 percent margin before the Compact of Free Association can come into effect. This means that the Palauan authorities must now devise an acceptable method of reconciling their constitutional provisions to comply with the mandate of the Palauan electorate for free association with the United States. The United States has expressed its willingness to consult with Palau on this matter and awaits Palau's initiatives.

The Government of Palau mounted an intensive and thorough public education program in advance of the plebiscite. That program, which started more than five months before the vote, included translation of all the pertinent documents, radio and television programs and debates, town hall meetings and village discussions. An official team from the United Nations Trusteeship Council was in Palau to observe the final days of the education program, the voting and the tabulation of ballots. Their report is expected shortly. [3]

Palau is the westernmost chain of islands in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, which the United States has administered since 1947 under a Trusteeship Agreement with the United Nations. Palau, with a population of 15,000, is located east of the Philippines and south of Guam.

The Northern Mariana Islands, a fourth political jurisdiction in the Trust Territory, voted in 1975 to become a territory of the United States. Under this arrangement, the people of the Northern Mariana Islands, of which Saipan is the largest, will become U.S. citizens when the Trusteeship Agreement ends. All four political jurisdictions of the Trust Territory have locally elected constitutional governments. Palau's first such government was inaugurated on January 1, 1981.

Palau and the other island groups of the Trust Territory were administered by Japan under a League of Nations mandate after World War I. The United States liberated the islands from Japanese occupation during the last years of World War II. Palau was noted as the site of especially ferocious fighting during that campaign. Today, the islands of Palau, marked by their spectacular beauty and their unusually rich and diverse marine ecology, are positioning themselves for future economic development. Fishing, agriculture, and tourism are expected to contribute to this growth. The Compact of Free Association contains incentives for investment, trade, and business development and also guarantees economic development assistance from the United States.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs (Wolfowitz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, April 27, 1983 (Extracts) [4]

Request For Additional Funding For Foreign Policy Objectives in East Asia and the Pacific

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am delighted to have this opportunity to present both our FY 1984 foreign assistance request and the need for a supplemental appropriation for FY 1983. You have received my more detailed written statement, and I do not want to inflict on you a full recitation of the numbers and statistics set out there. However, I would like to give you a brief overview of how both requests relate to our foreign policy objectives in East Asia and the Pacific.

U.S. Interests And Objectives In East Asia

The Secretary's recent Northeast Asian trip, and my own just completed trip through Southeast Asia [5] underscored for me the serious need for additional foreign assistance. As important as Asia and the Pacific are today, they will only be more important tomorrow. There is perhaps no other area of the world about which this can be said with such confidence. There are myriad ways in which to support this view. But to make this point today, in shorthand, let me point to just two facts. First, we trade more today with East Asia and the Pacific than with any other region on Earth, including Western Europe; and East Asia's share of the pie is gaining. It is the fastest developing region in the world. Second, we have fought two wars since World War II, both in Asia. We do not want to fight another.

The resources we seek for East Asian and Pacific countries serve in numerous ways:

—They bolster our treaty relationships with Korea and Thailand, two frontline states, and with the Philippines, with which we have just entered important base negotiations.

—They reinforce our defense relations with countries, such as the ASEAN states, in strategic proximity to sea lanes of communication essential, not only to the region, but to access to the Indian Ocean and the Middle East, as well.

—They help to assure our access to key commercial markets and raw material.

—They strengthen movement towards democracy in those countries, such as the ASEAN states, that have become a voice for peace in the region.

These are some of the major benefits we gain, but I could have easily mentioned half a dozen more, such as managing refugee flows, impeding the flow of narcotics, promoting peaceful resolution of regional conflicts, and reducing the abject poverty and social strains that spawn domestic violence and weigh heavily on all of us.

All of these benefits serve as useful components of our efforts to improve human rights practices in the region. Governments which are secure and prosperous are better able to implement human rights policies. Closer ties with the United States, furthered by our assistance programs, make it more likely that our concern with human rights will be given consideration. Progress on human rights, vitally important on its own, in turn is an integral part of all our other concerns. Human rights abuses undermine the legitimacy, progress and even stability of governments, thereby, vitiating other components of our strategy.

Finally, let me make a point which is central to our strategic concerns in East

[5] Secretary Shultz's Northeast Asian visit was as follows: Tokyo (January 30–February 2), Beijing (February 2–6), Seoul (February 6–8), Hong Kong (February 8–10), and Tokyo (February 10). Wolfowitz's trip throughout Southeast Asia included the following capitals: Tokyo (March 29–31), Hong Kong (April 1), Jakarta (April 1–5), Bangkok (April 5–7), Kuala Lumpur (April 7–10), Manila (April 10–13), and Singapore (April 13–16).

Asia and the Pacific, a point which emerged unmistakingly in my recent visits to Southeast Asian capitals. There is a gap today between our essential commitments to our allies and friends in the region and the resources at hand to do the job. There is a clear danger that our statements on America's responsibilities as a world leader will, in the absence of more resources, be perceived as hollow rhetoric.
